If the number of out-of-State tourists to Wisconsin were doubled, it would produce an additional income for Wisconsin residents of at least $100 million annually. This additional economic activity would immediately result in great revenue gain for the State of Wisconsin and for its local governments, although the precise amount is in the nature of a guess. What is clear is that the increased tax revenue generated by an Ice Age National Park would vastly exceed the very minor tax losses that would flow from the creation of the park. As indicated above, many of the areas envisaged for possible inclusion in the Ice Age National Park complex are presently contained in State parks, National forest, county park, State forest, and are thus not on the tax rolls now. The new land to be acquired is very largely worthless for agriculture, and is hence on the tax rolls for negligible amounts.

An additional possibility for Wisconsin taxpayers presents itself if an Ice Age National Park were established. While the park concept, as set forth above, does not envisage the transfer to the Federal Government of the State and county forests and parks set forth above, the State and county governments might well wish to conclude at some later time that it would be more sensible to transfer these to the Federal Government and thus save very substantial maintenance and administration costs. Residents of Wyoming, for example, are very happy that the taxpayers all over the 49 States contribute to the upkeep of Yellowstone National Park, rather than just the citizens of Wyoming.

All told, the balance sheet of an Ice Age National Park shows a tremendous financial advantage for Wisconsin, as well as a great recreational achievement.

5. WOULD THE ESTABLISHMENT OF THE ICE AGE NATIONAL PARK INTERFERE WITH FISHING, HUNTING, OR LUMBERING NOW BEING CONDUCTED?

The answer is unequivocally no. Along the route of the proposed Ice Age National Park are some 29 public hunting areas. These would be in no way disturbed. To the extent that any lands contemplated for inclusion in the Ice Age National Park contained a hunting, fishing, or lumbering potential which would be interfered with by constituting them a national park proper, they could be designated a national recreational area, in which uses like hunting, fishing and lumbering are permitted.

Both the Democratic and Republican Parties in Wisconsin, in their 1958 platforms, called for support in principle for what is now called the Ice Age National Park. The honoring of that pledge will go far to make the Ice Age National Park a reality.

COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. EDMONDSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Public Works may have until midnight tonight to file a report on the bill (H.R. 3610) to amend the Federal Water Pollution Control Act.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

REIMBURSEMENT TO STATES FOR CERTAIN HIGHWAY SYSTEMS

Mr. EDMONDSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. EDMONDSON. Mr. Speaker, several Members of the House have during the last few days introduced bills to provide reimbursement to those States which have had portions of their highway system incorporated into the Interstate Highway System without receiving any payment from the Federal Government for those portions, and without any provision being made for reimbursement to the States for those portions of their highway systems.

I am today introducing a bill which not only authorizes appropriations over a 15-year period to reimburse all States so situated, but also to give to the States the option of using those funds to construct additional mileage of the primary road system or to use the funds for the purpose of converting their turnpike systems, or portions of them, to free highways. I think the Members will be interested to know that hearings have been announced by Chairman Buckley of the House Committee on Public Works to begin early in May on this subject, which I am sure is a matter of keen interest to all of the States that are finding a serious problem in the matter of financing their portions of the Interstate System.

MANAGEMENT OF THE NATIONAL FORESTS

Mr. McINTIRE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend my remarks and include therein an editorial.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine?

There was no objection.

Mr. McINTIRE. Mr. Speaker, interested citizens throughout the United States are warmly commending the U.S. Department of Agriculture relative to its forward-looking program designed to advance management and increase facilities of the national forests.

Of particular interest in this regard is the editorial appearing in the April 1959 issue of American Forests, published by the American Forestry Association. This editorial is entitled "Congratulations, Mr. Benson."

President Eisenhower and Secretary Benson have repeatedly emphasized the importance of our forest resources and the need for longtime objective planning.

I wish to warmly commend Assistant Secretary of Agriculture Ervin L. Peterson and Chief of the Forest Service Richard McCardle and their associates for the fine contribution they have made in advancing the ends of this outstanding program.

The editorial follows:

CONGRATULATIONS, MR. BENSON

A blueprint to provide more timber, water, recreation, wildlife, and other renewable natural resources from the Nation's increasingly valuable national forests was proposed on March 24 by Secretary of Agriculture Ezra Taft Benson. With special letters to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House, Secretary Benson submitted a program to advance management and increase facilities of the national forests in coming years to meet the needs of a growing population and an expanding economy. The proposed program defines needs on the forests in concrete terms as spelled out by two consecutive programs for American Forestry adopted by the American Forestry Association in 1947 and 1953. As such, the Secretary's proposal represents a sound approach to present problems on the forests, and it will receive wide support. In short, this program gives us something to build on.

Secretary Benson said the current proposal completes the program for full resource development of the national forests as called for by President Eisenhower in his special message to Congress on July 31, 1953. As a result of that message, management of the national forests has been substantially improved in recent years, the Secretary said. Tree planting has been doubled, forest fires have been materially reduced, and the timber harvest has reached new records. At the same time, the Secretary readily admits the forests still have a long way to go before they can begin to approximate the degree of intensive management presently practiced on some of the larger industrial forests.

However, if this program goes through as proposed the national forests will one day stand second to none anywhere in the world. For example, the Secretary proposed to ultimately treble present income from the forests, 90 percent of which will represent sale of standing timber. If the blueprint develops on schedule, the year 2000 will see timber sales reaching $350 million with an annual cut of 21 billion board feet of sawtimber. The immediate short term goal will be to hike the recent record cut of seven billion board feet to 11 billion within the next decade with harvesting developed in a manner that will accelerate cutting of stagnant stands, release advanced reproduction by removing the overstory of old growth, increase the salvage of dead, dying and diseased trees, and encourage reasonable distribution of sales among all sizes of operators.

At the same time, the Forest Service proposes to develop and apply on sale areas higher standards of regeneration, hazard reduction, salvage and erosion control. It will provide up-to-date inventories of all commercial forest lands, and timber management plans will be completed for all working circles, and when completed will be maintained by periodic reinventories and revisions. Approximately three-fourths of the 4.4 million acres of nonstocked and poorly stocked plantable lands will be seeded or planted. The productive condition of over 11 million of the 30 million acres of less than sawlog-size stands will be substantially improved by plantation care, pruning, weeding, thinning, release cutting, reinforcement planting of lightly stocked areas, and planting new burns in these stands.

Hand in hand with these production quotas and production goals goes a proposal to complete construction and reconstruction of 90,000 miles of access roads and 8,000 miles of trails at the earliest possible time. This represents about 19 percent of the total number of roads and trails ultimately called for. When fully installed, there will be 70,000 miles of forest highways, 542,000 miles of access roads, and the trail network will be reduced to 80,000 miles. There are now 24,400 miles of forest highways, 149,700 miles of forest development roads and 112,200 miles of trails. No single proposal in this comprehensive plan received louder cheers from AFA officers than did this plan to get the roads built so that the Forest Service can start practicing forestry on a scale never dreamed of in the days of Pinchot, Graves and Greeley.

Neither space nor time permits us to fully describe the improvements proposed for every use of the forest including water, range, and recreation resources. These will be fully covered in the May issue of American Forests and suffice it to say here there is something here for everybody, and if present plans materialize all of these important uses will be brought up to a state of perfection seldom dreamed of by most of us in even our wildest dreams. The programs proposed, in short, would put the national forest system in A–1, apple pie order and people everywhere would regard them as another wonder of the world. Water flow will be increased through more intensive management of watersheds—welcome news to 1,800 western towns and cities served by national forests water and for most irrigated farm lands and hydroelectric developments. Fuller development and use of grazing lands will result from large-scale reseeding of grasses on depleted ranges, control of poisonous plants, and construction of fences and water facilities. In carrying out the previously announced Operation Outdoors, the new proposals will see both parts of this program in full swing. Ten thousand new campground and picnic sites containing 102,000 family units are proposed. Improvement of 7,000 miles of the 81,000 miles of fishing streams and 56,000 acres of lakes by stabilizing banks, planting trees and cover, and constructing channel improvements are shown in the plans.

These, then, are just a few of the highlights in this remarkable plan, and returning to timber management again it occurs to us that here is one constructive answer to the series of stunning advertisements currently being featured by the lumber industry which have already rocked lumber's competitors back on their heels. In addition to selling wood, this old industry is telling the world in no uncertain terms that lumbermen believe in their product. Moreover, they imply that lumber has faith in forestry to produce enough wood of sufficient quantity and quality to stave off all challenges posed by wood substitutes.

With forestry showing the vision demonstrated in Secretary Benson's plan, all challenges will indeed be met and forestry in America will rise to new plateaus of achievement. Here, in truth, is a working model for balanced multiple use on forest land.

HARRY BRIDGES

Mr. ALGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALGER. Mr. Speaker, the brazen effrontery of Harry Bridges of the ILWU in his testimony before a House Committee this week should be carefully weighed by every Member and by every citizen in this country.

Here is a man who testifies publicly that he might do all he could to prevent American aid to Formosa should a shooting war again break out between "the Chinese Nationalists and the forces of the Chinese Peoples' Republic," or whatever the determined policy of this Nation, if contrary to his own beliefs. This man admits that his union might honor requests of Communist-dominated foreign transport unions, even those in Communist nations, not to work shipping in American ports if contrary to Communist interests; that he would thus take part in a sort of worldwide shipping boycott, if requested to by certain foreign union heads, some of them notoriously pro-Communist.

And how about Hawaii which is absolutely dependent on shipping and the ILWU? Here's the proof to support those who opposed Hawaiian statehood because of Harry Bridges and the stranglehold of the union. Just how far are we going to let union leaders flaunt the laws of this Nation? When are they to be subject to the same laws by which all other citizens are governed?

There is something we can do. The other body is now debating the labor bill. They can put teeth in the labor bill. We can do the same in the House. The people of this Nation and our friendly neighbors in the world deserve no less. Then the dictatorial power of the labor leaders and the monopolistic control of commerce by unions can be corrected. At this time a joint strike by Hoffa and the Teamsters and of Bridges and the ILWU could paralyze transportation and trade at home and abroad.

LABOR REFORM LEGISLATION

Mr. HIESTAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. HIESTAND. Mr. Speaker, probably the most important and most controversial measure we face at this session is legislation for labor reform, which, of course, involves also revisions to the Taft-Hartley law. Many bills have been introduced, but in general they follow along the lines of the Barden bills, H.R. 4473 and H.R. 4474, the McClellan bills, S. 1348, S. 1385, S. 1386, S. 1387, the Kearns-Goldwater bill, S. 748 and H.R. 3540, and the Kennedy bill, S. 1555, which the Senate is now considering.

FIFTY-FOUR SUBJECTS

A comparative analysis chart briefly summarizing these subjects has been made which should be of great value to all Members in considering these bills.

The chart follows:

Part 1. Basic individual rights

BASIC INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS

	Labor Bill of Rights Act of 1959 (Mr. BARDEN—H.R. 4473)	Labor-Management Basic Rights, Ethical Standards, and Disclosure Act of 1959 (Mr. MCCLELLAN—S. 1137)	Labor-Management Practices Act of 1959 (Mr. GOLDWATER—S. 748)	Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959 (Mr. KENNEDY—S. 1555)
	The bill provides that the certain basic human rights must be guaranteed and protected in the constitutions and bylaws of all unions. Democratic procedures must be adopted and followed by all unions.	Provides that the constitution and bylaws or other governing charter shall contain provisions to carry out certain objectives and guarantee certain basic rights of members.	Provides that rights relating to election and removal of officers be in constitutions.	There are no provisions in this bill requiring that basic human rights be guaranteed and protected under union constitutions or bylaws. Certain standards for the election of union officers are set forth. The members must look to the Secretary of Labor for protection of their rights through the Federal courts.
Protection against closed unions or discriminatory membership requirements.	Every employee in a bargaining unit shall be eligible for union membership if he meets the qualifications applied to all applicants.	Membership shall be open to all who can meet reasonable qualifications uniformly applied. The initiation fee shall not be in excess of 75 percent of the prevailing weekly wage in the locale for the same general type of work.	No provision.	No provision.
Freedom of speech and right to criticize.	Every member shall be free to speak freely and to criticize union officers, activities, and policies if he wishes.	Similar provision.	do	Do.
Freedom to meet and make plans.	Every member shall be free to meet with other members to discuss union affairs and to plan changes in the union policies, practices, officers, etc., and to campaign for or against any candidate for union office.	do	do	Do.
Equal rights and protection.	Every member shall have equal rights including all voting rights and privileges and equal protection of rules.	do	do	Do.
Freedom from excessive or arbitrary demands for money.	The rate of dues and initiation fee shall be changed only by a majority vote taken by secret ballot. Assessments may be levied only with the same approval.	do	do	Do.
Freedom to seek the full protection of the law.	No union shall take away its members' rights to sue in any Federal or State court or to institute action in any government agency or to petition any legislature or communicate with any legislator.	Similar—but with a proviso that the member must first exhaust all internal procedures if they do not require longer than 3 months.	do	Do.
Protections against unjust or too severe punishment and right to a fair and impartial trial.	No member of a union may be fired, expelled, suspended or otherwise disciplined except for a violation of a published and written rule which is not inconsistent with the protective provisions of the bill.	Similar provision	do	It shall be unlawful for any union or its officers, employees, etc., to fine, suspend, or otherwise discipline members for exercising any right provided by this bill (506(a)). It shall be unlawful for any person through the use of violence, force or economic reprisal, or threats thereof, to interfere with or coerce any union member in the exercise of the rights under this bill (506(b)).
	If disciplinary action is taken, the following procedures must be followed so that the member can have a full and fair hearing and an impartial review.	Similar. However, as is seen below, the due process protections are not spelled out in detail.	do	No provision.
Know rights	Accused member must be given copies of this law and the union's constitution and bylaws and informed of his rights thereunder.	do	do	Every union shall inform its members of the rights guaranteed them under this bill (508).
Know the charge	Member must be served with a written charge specifying the alleged offense in full detail.	do	do	No provision.

	Labor Bill of Rights Act of 1959 (Mr. BARDEN—H.R. 4473)	Labor-Management Basic Rights, Ethical Standards, and Disclosure Act of 1959 (Mr. McCLELLAN—S. 1137)	Labor-Management Practices Act of 1959 (Mr. GOLDWATER—S. 748)	Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959 (Mr. KENNEDY—S. 1555)
Time to prepare defense.	Member must be given reasonable time to prepare his defense.	Similar provision	No Provision.	No Provision.
Given a fair trial	Member must be given a fair trial at which the following due process protections are guaranteed:	States that the member shall be "afforded a full and fair hearing." No further details.	do	Do.
	Presumed innocent until proven guilty.
	Burden of the proof on the accuser.
	Trial held at a convenient time and place for the accused.
	Accused has the right of counsel of his own choosing.
	Accused may confront his accuser, call, examine and cross-examine witnesses.
	Accused may present rebuttal testimony.
	Accused has the right to require the trial body to require the presence of witnesses and the production of pertinent records and documents.
	The trial will be open wherever possible. The accused may elect a closed trial.
	The trial body shall be composed of fair and impartial persons. The accused may challenge any member of the trial body for cause and have 6 peremptory challenges.	No provision	do	Do.
	Where necessary to insure a fair trial the trial body may be selected from an outside agency or group.
	Witnesses shall be under oath.
	A verbatim record shall be made.
	The decision shall be in writing; shall summarize the evidence; shall state the grounds and reasons for the decision and be supported by the preponderance of the evidence.
	The decision shall be sent to the accused before any public release.
The right to appeal the decision.	There shall be a prompt and orderly appeal procedure to a fair and impartial tribunal.	The member shall be "afforded final review on a written transcript of the hearing by an impartial person or persons."	No provision	No provision.
	The accused shall have challenges for cause against members of the appeals body.	No provision	do	Do.
	Where necessary the members of the appeals body shall be selected from an outside agency or group.	Similar provision	do	Do.
	Penalties imposed by trial bodies shall be stayed until the final appeal is decided.	No provision	do	Do.
The right to a just decision.	The appeals tribunal shall set aside decisions for the following reasons:
	The decision was not supported by the preponderance of the evidence.
	It was discriminatory, arbitrary, or capricious.
	When the charged act was protected by union law, this bill, or other Federal or State laws.
	When accused was prejudiced by a denial of procedural rights.	do	do	Do.
	When there was a serious and substantial denial of procedural rights even though the accused was not prejudiced.
	When the discipline has been imposed without just cause.
	When the discipline was imposed to further personal or political aspirations.
	When the discipline was imposed to suppress legitimate personal or political aspirations.
The right to control officer's salaries and expenses or the limits thereof.	Salaries and general expense allowances to officers, etc., shall be fixed by a secret vote of the majority of members.	Salaries and general expense allowances or the limits thereof shall be established by the bylaws or by a resolution adopted by a general vote.	do	Do.
The right to vote freely and secretly.	Every member shall have the right to a secret vote without fear of reprisal.	Similar provision	Similar provision	Similar provision.
The right to run for, and hold, union office.	Every member shall have the right to become a candidate for, and hold office subject to fair qualifications applied without discrimination.	do	do	Similar provision (301(d)).

DEMOCRATIC PROCEDURES IN LOCAL UNIONS

	Labor Bill of Rights Act of 1959 (Mr. BARDEN—H.R. 4473)	Labor-Management Basic Rights, Ethical Standards, and Disclosure Act of 1959 (Mr. MCCLELLAN—S. 1137)	Labor-Management Practices Act of 1959 (Mr. GOLDWATER—S. 748)	Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959 (Mr. KENNEDY—S. 1555)
	Every labor union shall maintain or incorporate in its constitution and bylaws provision to guarantee and protect the following democratic processes and procedures:	Similar provision	Some provisions relating to the election and removal of responsible officers and their qualifications and terms of office.	No provisions have been made in this bill requiring that basic protections be incorporated into the local unions' constitution or bylaws. Procedures for the election and removal of officers must be incorporated into such documents (304).
An open list of members	A roster of members open to inspection by members.	do	No provision	No provision.
Open general meetings	At least 3 general meetings each year. At least 10 days' notice and an agenda.	do	do	Do.
Elections by secret ballot	Officers, stewards, etc., shall be elected by secret ballot at general membership meeting after 30 days' notice.	Same in principle. Candidates receiving the greatest number of votes shall be elected. Adequate election safeguards shall be provided.	Members, upon due notice, shall directly elect their local officers by secret vote and without restraint or coercion.	Members shall elect the officers named in the union constitution and the members of the executive board or similar governing body by secret ballot with at least 15 days' notice (301 (d)).
The right to run for office and to vote without fear or danger	Members shall be permitted to nominate candidates and to vote without coercion or restraint.	Similar. Not more than 5 percent of the membership shall be required to nominate.	Members shall have a reasonable opportunity to nominate or be candidates for union office subject to fair and uniformly applied standards.	Reasonable opportunity to nominate candidates without being subject to penalty, discipline, or improper interference or reprisal (301(d)).
Honest elections	Every member shall be entitled to 1 vote—secret ballot—no proxy votes.	Every member shall have identical voting rights. Adequate election safeguards will be provided.	Similar provision	Each member in good standing shall have 1 vote. The election shall be conducted in accord with the constitution and bylaws insofar as they are not inconsistent with the standards set up in this bill. There is no ban on proxy votes.
Frequent elections	Officers must be elected every 2 years.	Similar provision	Officers of local unions must be elected every 3 years.	Officers named in constitution and elected every 3 years (301(b)).
Removal of officers elected or appointed by governing bodies.	Officers, elected or appointed by a governing body such as the board of directors, trustees, or executive committee may be removed by a majority vote of the governing body.	do	No provision	302 (a) and (b). If there has been any violation by either international or local unions with respect to the election of officers any member may file a complaint with the Labor Secretary. If the Secretary finds probable cause to believe that such violations have occurred and were not remedied he may bring a civil action to set aside the invalid election and to direct the conduct of an election or hearing and vote upon the removal of officers. The election will be conducted under the supervision of the Secretary.
Removal of officers elected by the membership.	Officers elected by the membership as a whole may be removed by the governing body but only for cause shown and on notice and hearing and by a majority vote of the said governing body.	do	Members must have the opportunity to remove elected officers from office by a majority vote upon a showing that a substantial number of members desire a recall vote.	If there are no provisions in the union's constitution and bylaws for the removal of elected officers guilty of serious misconduct any member may complain to the Secretary of Labor. The Secretary shall promulgate rules and regulations for removing such officers for cause shown and after notice and hearing by a secret vote of the members (301 (g) and (h)).
Election of convention delegates.	Local delegates to international union conventions shall be elected by a majority secret vote of the members.	do	Similar provision	Delegates elected by secret ballot in accord with the union's constitution and bylaws (301 (e)).
Control of delegates' votes	Members shall have the right to instruct delegates who shall be bound by the instructions and subject to discipline if they disobey.	Delegates' votes will be recorded in such a way that it will be possible to determine how they voted.	No provision	No provision.
Records kept and open to inspection.	Records shall be maintained of all actions taken at general membership meetings, meetings of directors, trustees, and members of executive committees. The records shall be open to any member who has paid dues in the last dues-paying period.	Same in principle. No dues-paying qualification for record inspection. Also allows inspection by attorneys or representatives of members.	do	Do.
Financial records kept and open to inspection.	Detailed financial records shall be maintained and shall be open to inspection by such members as above.	Similar provision	Similar provision	Financial records adequate to prepare and verify the financial reports required by this bill will be kept and maintained. There is no provision for member inspection of the records but the contents of the reports shall be made available to the membership (101 (c)).
Records must be preserved	All the records shall be kept for 5 years.	do	Records relating to financial matters and trusteeships must be kept for 5 years.	The financial and trusteeship records for such periods as the Secretary of Labor may prescribe.
Protection of members' funds by investment.	All funds in excess of the amount of dues and assessments received in 1 year, other than the sum of pension and trust funds, shall be held in savings bank by investment or invested in a way prescribed by State laws for the investment of insurance company funds.	do	No provision	No provision.
No secret agreements	Copies of agreements made by the local and employers shall be sent within 30 days to each member affected.	A copy shall be sent upon request to any employee whose rights are affected. Copy will be available at the union's office for inspection by any member or employee affected.	do	Do.

DEMOCRATIC PROCEDURES IN INTERNATIONAL UNIONS

	Labor Bill of Rights Act of 1959 (Mr. BARDEN—H.R. 4473)	Labor-Management Basic Rights, Ethical Standards, and Disclosure Act of 1959 (Mr. MCCLELLAN—S. 1137)	Labor-Management Practices Act of 1959 (Mr. GOLDWATER—S. 748)	Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959 (Mr. KENNEDY—S. 1555)
Conventions must be held and officers elected; term of office.	Conventions must be held not less than once in every 4 years. Major officers, directors, members of the executive committee, etc., must be elected at these conventions.	Similar provision	Term of office for international officers shall not exceed 5 years. No direct provision for periodic conventions.	Officers named in the international constitution and bylaws shall be elected every 5 years. No direct provision for periodic conventions (301(a)).
Delegates right to vote	All delegates shall be entitled to vote on all officers or other transactions. The voting strength of each delegate will be such that each union member shall have an equal voice. No proxy vote.	do	No direct provision regulating delegate voting. Presumably the procedures for fair and honest elections would apply. There is no provision to assure that delegates' votes have weight proportionate to the number of members they represent.	When officers are elected by delegates the convention will be conducted according to the constitution and bylaws insofar as they are not inconsistent with this bill. No provision for weighting of delegates' votes (301(c)).
Officers' election	The officers mentioned above shall be elected by a secret vote of the delegates only. The individuals receiving the greatest number of votes cast shall be elected.	Same in principle but no need for a secret vote.	International officers may be elected directly by secret vote of the members or indirectly through delegates who were elected by the members by secret vote.	International officers named in constitution and bylaws and members of its executive board shall be elected either directly by a secret vote of the members or by a convention of delegates chosen by secret ballot (301(a)).
Membership control of officers' salaries and expenses.	Salaries or the limits thereof and general expense allowances must be voted by a majority of delegates.	Salaries and the limits thereof and expense allowances of officers of "local labor organizations" shall be set in the bylaws or a resolution adopted by general vote.	No provision	No provision.
No secret membership meetings.	Notices of meetings and conventions will be sent 30 days in advance to all constituent unions setting forth the subjects to be decided. Extraordinary meetings shall not be held except upon 15 days' notice by mail or 12 days' notice by telegram.	Similar provision	Election meetings "upon due notice."	No direct provision for notice of conventions or meetings. Notice must be made 15 days prior to holding an election (301(d)).
Records must be made, kept, and open to inspection.	Records of actions, and votes taken, and detailed financial records will be kept and maintained for 5 years from the making thereof. Records of actions taken and votes may be inspected by any member. Financial records may be inspected by any member of a constituent union who has been authorized by vote of the constituent union to inspect the records.	do	Records relating only to financial matters and trusteeships of subordinate unions must be kept for 5 years and be open to inspection by the Secretary of Labor and his representatives and union members at reasonable times. Election records and ballots preserved at least 1 year.	Records pertaining to elections and (301(e)) delegates' credentials must be kept for 1 year. Financial and trusteeship records must be kept for a period (105) designated by the Secretary of Labor. No provision for inspection by the membership of the records but the information contained in the reports shall be made available to the membership (101c).
Proper voting strength of delegates to conventions.	International unions are entitled to receive from each other constituent union a roster of its members so that the voting strength of each delegate to the convention may be determined.	do	No provision	No provision.
Protection of members' funds by investment.	All funds in excess of half of the dues and assessments received in 1 year, other than pension or trust funds, shall be held in savings banks or in securities approved by the State for the investment of insurance company funds.	Same in principle. All funds in excess of the amount of all dues and assessments received in a year shall be so invested.	do	Do.
Open labor agreements	Copies of labor agreements negotiated by the international shall be sent to each member and employee affected within 30 days after the making.	Copies of agreements made by the international are sent to each constituent union whose members are affected. They may be inspected by any member or employee affected at the union's office.	do	Do.
No "paper locals"	Local charters may be issued only to bona fide labor organizations.	Similar—and in addition the Labor Secretary must be notified of each charter within 15 days of issue.	do	Do.
Bonding of trustees	Trustees appointed to administer the affairs of constituent unions shall be bonded in an amount not less than half of the total dues and assessments received by the constituent union during the preceding fiscal year.	Not spelled out specifically for trustees but "all officers, agents, representatives, and employees" who handle union funds must be bonded.	do	Do.

DEMOCRATIC PROCEDURES IN BOTH INTERNATIONAL AND LOCAL UNIONS

Ballots preserved	All ballots must be preserved for 2 years.	Similar provision	Ballots and election records shall be preserved for not less than 1 year.	Ballots and election records shall be preserved for 1 year (301(d)).
Members' funds not used to keep persons in office or elect to office.	Funds from dues, assessments or similar levies on union members may not be used to promote the candidacy of any person or cause in a union election.	do	It is unlawful to contribute or use funds of any union or employer to promote the candidacy of anyone in a union election.	No union funds from dues, assessments, or similar levy and no employer's money shall be contributed or used to promote the candidacy of anyone in a union election (301(f)).
Member control of new organizations or funds.	No organization or fund may be created or financed by union funds except by a secret majority vote of the membership of the union setting up the new organization. Financial reports must be filed.	do	No provision	No provision.

DEMOCRATIC PROCEDURES IN BOTH INTERNATIONAL AND LOCAL UNIONS—Continued

	Labor Bill of Rights Act of 1959 (Mr. BARDEN—H.R. 4473)	Labor-Management Basic Rights, Ethical Standards, and Disclosure Act of 1959 (Mr. MCCLELLAN—S. 1137)	Labor-Management Practices Act of 1959 (Mr. GOLDWATER—S. 748)	Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959 (Mr. KENNEDY—S. 1555)
Removal of criminals from union office.	If any union officer of any kind is convicted of such a crime as murder, rape, arson, burglary, embezzlement, bribery, extortion, etc., he will be suspended from office. No individual may hold union office while he is ineligible to vote because of a criminal conviction.	Same in principle. More crimes listed.	No person shall serve as an officer or other representative of a union during any period in which he is ineligible to vote in any State election because of a conviction of a crime.	No person convicted of robbery, bribery, extortion, embezzlement, arson, violations of narcotics laws, murder, rape, assault, and other crimes of violence, shall serve as a union officer, or employee unless the Secretary of Labor determines that such a person's service as a union officer or employee would not be contrary to the purpose of this bill or his citizenship rights having been revoked as a result of such convictions has been restored (305(a)).
Member control of strikes	Strikes may not be called unless 30 days prior to the start of the strike there was a secret referendum of the employees involved and a majority voted for the strike. If a majority of employees in a constituent unit do not vote for the strike they will not be required to participate in or contribute support to the strike.	No provision	No provision	No provision.
Right to appeal for justice to the membership.	Every union member and officer shall have the right to petition the membership for a redress of any grievance.	do	do	Do.
No "loaded" or "rigged" meetings. All meetings must be conducted in a free and democratic manner.	Meetings will be conducted in a fair and orderly manner so that every member at a local meeting and every delegate at an international meeting will be able to speak fully and freely upon pertinent matters. All officers will be under the duty to respond honestly and fully to questions from the floor of any union meeting.	No provision	No provision	No provision.
No blanket approvals of actions taken by executive committees.	A vote to accept the minutes of an executive meeting shall not be construed as an approval, modification or ratification of any items in the minutes unless, on proper motion to approve, each item receives a majority secret vote of the members.	do	do	Do.
All candidates have an equal opportunity to present their case.	Each candidate for union office shall have access to the list of members and the right to present his case to them in any form. Incumbent officers shall have no advantage over rival candidates.	Every member of a union or his agent may inspect the union roster.	do	Local unions or their officers shall not discriminate for or against any candidate with respect to the use of the membership lists. Reasonable requests to distribute campaign material to the members at the candidate's expense will be complied with (301(b)).
No threats or acts of violence against members, their families and their property.	No union officer may threaten, or engage in violence against, any other union officer or member, or other person or their families or property.	Similar provision protecting "any member" against intimidation or coercion.	do	No person may use, or attempt to use or threaten to use violence or economic reprisals to restrain or coerce, etc., to interfere or restrain any member in the exercise of his rights under this bill (506(b)).
Membership control of local mergers and transfers of funds.	No local union may be merged with another local nor shall there be any involuntary transfer of members or funds unless ⅔ of the membership of each local shall approve by a secret vote.	Same in principle but instead of ⅔ vote only "approval by a general vote of each local * * *"	do	No provision.
Removal of officers for crime, taking the fifth and, etc.	Officers may be removed by a secret vote if they have been convicted of a crime; have taken the fifth or refused to answer questions of a Federal or State agency. A petition signed by 10 percent of the members will result in such an election.	The provisions for removing officers relate to "local labor organizations" only.	Every union must have procedures which insure to its members the opportunity to directly remove elected officers from office by majority vote upon a showing that a substantial number of the members desire a recall vote.	If there are no provisions in the union's constitution and bylaws for the removal of elected officers guilty of serious misconduct any member may complain to the Secretary of Labor. The Secretary shall promulgate rules and regulations for removing such officers for cause shown and after notice and hearing by a secret vote of the members (301(g) and (h)).
Removal for other causes	Any officer may be removed by a majority secret vote of the membership. A petition signed by 30 percent of the members will result in such an election.	The provisions for removal of officers relate only to "local organizations."	See above	See above.

OTHER PROTECTIONS

Fiduciary responsibility for union money and property.	Every union officer or representative who has custody of union money or property will be responsible for it in a fiduciary capacity notwithstanding any union grant of authority purporting to exempt him from such responsibility.	Similar provision	Does not set up fiduciary standards but provides that every officer or representative of a union having custody of union money or property must hold it for the benefit of the members and to further the objectives of the union. It requires him to invest and use such money in accordance with the above obligation in a manner authorized by the constitution and bylaws of the union.	No provision.

	Labor Bill of Rights Act of 1959 (Mr. BARDEN—H.R. 4473)	Labor-Management Basic Rights, Ethical Standards, and Disclosure Act of 1959 (Mr. McCLELLAN—S. 1137)	Labor-Management Practices Act of 1959 (Mr. GOLDWATER—S. 748)	Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959 (Mr. KENNEDY—S. 1555)
Suits to enjoin union officers and for the recovery of funds.	Any one or more members of a union may start an action in any court of jurisdiction for an injunction restraining any act or omission by any union officer violating any provision of this bill and for an accounting and restitution of any money contributed or spent in violation of any provision of the bill. The plaintiff in such actions shall be entitled to recover his costs and attorney's fees if the court finds that the action was instituted in good faith.	No union shall limit the right of any member or officer thereof to start an action before any court or agency whether or not the union or its officers are named as defendants. Members' rights to appear as witnesses must be protected. Members and officers must first exhaust internal procedures not requiring more than 3 months to final decision before starting action against the union or any officer thereof.	One or more of the officers or members of a union may maintain an action in any court of jurisdiction for any accounting or other appropriate relief for any act or omission with respect to the handling of the union's funds or money; or to remove from office criminals or violators of the bill or when a union or its officers permits such persons to assume or hold union office. Preserves any rights or remedies under existing Federal or State law.	Does not make any provision for members' suits to enforce proper and responsible handling of union funds and property except that a member may, if the union and its officers refuse, sue by leave of court to recover embezzled or misappropriated union funds from the person who was convicted criminally of the misappropriation. Court may allow costs and attorney's fees (109(b)).
Suits by employees	Any one or more employees of an employer subject to the bill, whether or not they are union members, may start an action in any court of jurisdiction to enjoin and restrain any act or omission of a labor union or its officers in violation of the employees' rights under the bill. Costs and fees as above.	No provision except as above.	No provision except as above.	No provision except as above.
Political contributions	It will be unlawful for any union or officer or representative thereof to use any money or property of a union which has been acquired directly or indirectly from members' payments required to maintain membership in the union to influence voters participating in, or to affect the results of, any election, or any referendum or proposed legislation or constitutional amendments, party primary, convention, etc. It shall be unlawful to coerce any member of a labor union into contributing money or services to any political organization. Nothing in this provision impairs the right of any officer or member to exercise his rights as an individual citizen.	Similar, but does not expressly include referendum or proposed legislation or constitutional amendments.	No provision	No provision. In fact, the bill permits the Labor Secretary to exempt from all reporting requirements "any labor organization or class thereof temporarily convened either for the sole purpose of negotiating a labor agreement or for carrying out educational activity" (106(b)).
Bonding of union officers and employees.	Every union officer or employee who handles the funds and property of a union must be bonded for not less than the aggregate income of the union for the prior year.	Bonds required: International officers not less than ¼ the gross income of the union for 1 year, or $250,000, whichever is the lesser. Local officers, not less than the total dues and assessments paid during a fiscal year.	do	No provision.
Use of the provisions of the bill.	The institution of any action by a union member to enforce any provision of this bill shall not become the grounds for union disciplinary action.	No express provision, but may be covered by general provision against coercion or intimidation to prevent exercise of rights under the bill.	The institution of any action by a member or members to recover funds or property or to enforce the fiduciary, officer election and removal, and trusteeship provisions of the bill shall not be grounds for disciplinary action against the member or members.	Similar to H.R. 4473 (506(a)).
Unions' responsibility for acts of its agents.	Unions shall be bound by the acts of their agents and unions may be sued as entities in U.S. courts.	Similar provision	No provision	No provision.
Embezzlement and concealment.	Embezzlement of union funds, property, assets or other things of value or the making of false entries in or the destruction or concealment of books or records is a crime. Imprisonment of 5 years, $10,000 fine, or both.	do	Criminal penalties for embezzlement, theft, or unlawful conversion of union funds or property to one's own or another's use. False entries in or the destruction of any records, books, etc., with the intent to defraud or mislead the union, the members, or others, are subject to the same penalties.	Embezzlement, theft, or conversion of funds or property of a union is a crime $10,000 fine, imprisonment up to 5 years, or both (109(a)). False entry in and destruction of union books or records, reports, or statements required by this bill is punishable by a $10,000 fine or 1 year prison or both (108(c)).
Bribery	The offering, demanding, giving or taking of bribes by either employer or union representatives is a crime. Fines of 3 times the bribe, or imprisonment for 3 years, or both.	Similar provision covering offering or giving of bribes by employers or taking of bribes by union representatives.	Similar to Barden bill	No bribery provision as such in the bill. It enlarges the Taft-Hartley ban on unlawful payments to union representatives to the extent that it would be unlawful to demand or request unlawful payments as well as to accept or agree to accept such payments (111).

TRUSTEESHIPS

	Labor Bill of Rights Act of 1959 (Mr. BARDEN—H.R. 4473)	Labor-Management Basic Rights, Ethical Standards, and Disclosure Act of 1959 (Mr. MCCLELLAN—S. 1137)	Labor-Management Practices Act of 1959 (Mr. GOLDWATER—S. 748)	Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959 (Mr. KENNEDY—S. 1555)
Must be reported	Every union which has assumed or assumes trusteeship over any subordinate organization shall report within 30 days of the imposition of the trusteeship to the Secretary of Labor and semiannually thereafter. The report signed by the president and secretary will contain the following:	Similar provision but reports to be made annually.	Similar provision. Also requires a certification that the standards set up in the bill are followed.	Similar to H.R. 4473.
	Name and address of the local.	Similar provision	Similar provision	Similar provision.
	The date of the trusteeship.	do	do
	A detailed statement of the reason for the trusteeship.	Similar provision—requires also reason for continuance.	Similar to S. 1137	Similar to S. 1137.
	The nature and extent of local member participation in the election of delegates and international officers.	Similar provision but no report required on officers' elections.	do	Similar to H.R. 4473.
	No provision	What remains to be done to restore local autonomy and steps taken toward that objective.	do	No provision.
	do	An account of funds taken from the local and a statement of the amount of normal per capita tax and assessments that would be payable if the local was not under trusteeship.	do	No provision (201).
	do	Details of the last general vote of the local membership to continue the trusteeship.	No provision	Do.
Administration	The international union will establish and administer trusteeships only in accord with the union's constitution.	Similar provision	Similar provision and also sets forth standards to which unions must conform.	Similar to H.R. 4473.
	Trusteeships will be established only to correct corruption or financial malpractice; to assure the performance of collective bargaining agreements; to restore democratic procedures or to carry out the legitimate objects of the union.	do	Similar provision	Similar provision (202).
Restrictions	When a local union is under trusteeship it shall be unlawful:
	To count the votes of its delegates in a convention or election of officers unless the delegates were elected by a secret vote of the membership.	do	do	Do.
	To transfer any funds out of the local except the per capita tax and assessments payable by locals not under trusteeship.	do	do	Similar provision (203).
Supervision	If there are violations of the above provisions a member or a local union may complain to the Secretary of Labor. The Secretary will investigate and if he finds probable cause to believe that violations occurred he will start action in a U.S. district court to prevent and restrain the violations and for other appropriate relief.	Similar provisions and any member or members acting for themselves or the local may act to enjoin or obtain other relief. Costs and attorney fees may be awarded the plaintiffs.	The Secretary of Labor may bring action if there is violation or there is about to be a violation. He may obtain injunctions to restrain and orders to enforce compliance.	Similar to H.R. 4473 (204).
Period of trusteeship	In any proceeding pursuant to the above, trusteeship established in accord with the union's procedural requirements and approved by the union's governing body after a fair hearing will be presumed valid for 1 year and shall not be subject to attack except where there is clear and convincing proof that the trusteeship was not established in good faith and for allowable purpose.	Trusteeships may be imposed only for lawful reasons and expire after 1 year unless there was a general vote on due notice of the local membership to continue it for 1 year. Each year there must be such a general vote on due notice for continuance.	Trusteeships shall not be for a period longer than is necessary for correction. Full autonomy will be restored promptly upon correction.	Similar to H.R. 4473 but the trusteeship will be valid for 18 months rather than a year (204(c)).
	After a year the trusteeship shall be presumed invalid in any such proceeding and its discontinuance shall be ordered unless the union can show that continuation is necessary for a lawful purpose. The continuance may be for a period the court deems appropriate but not longer than 1 year.	See above	In any action under this bill there will be no trusteeship longer than 18 months unless there is clear and convincing proof it is necessary in order to correct the situation. In such cases the extension of time shall not be in excess of 1 year.	Similar to H.R. 4473 except for 18-month period. Trusteeship may only be extended for such periods as the court deems appropriate (204(c)).

Part 2. Taft-Hartley amendments

COMPARISON OF VARIOUS LEGISLATIVE PROPOSALS TO AMEND THE TAFT-HARTLEY ACT

	A bill to amend the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 (Mr. BARDEN—H.R. 4474) Labor Bill of Rights Act of 1959 (Mr. BARDEN—H.R. 4473)	Various bills to amend the Labor-Management Act of 1947 and the United States Code (Mr. MCCLELLAN—S. 1348, S. 1386, S. 1387 and S. 1385.)	Labor-Management Practices Act of 1959 (Mr. GOLDWATER and others—S. 748)	Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959 (Mr. KENNEDY and others—S. 1555)
Secondary boycotts	Same as S. 748, except that H.R. 4474 would not legalize boycotts at construction sites, and would specify more fully the conditions under which farmed-out struck work could legally be boycotted.	Would protect innocent parties from secondary boycott abuses. "Particularly to prevent coercion by picketing at the premises of a secondary employer in order to prevent customers from doing business with the employer primarily involved in a labor dispute" (S. 1348).	Would strengthen present Taft-Hartley provisions to forbid direct coercion of employers to cease doing business with another and inducement of individual employees to refuse to perform services; and to broaden "secondary employers" to include railroads and municipalities. Would weaken present provisions, however, by legalizing boycotts of so-called farmed-out struck work, and boycotts at the site of construction work.	No provisions.
Picketing	Bans organizational picketing and picketing to force an employer to recognize or bargain with a union unless it has been certified by the NLRB as the representative of the employees involved (H.R. 4474).	Designed to make it an unfair labor practice for a union to picket or threaten to picket the premises of an employer in order to induce the employees to join the union, or to compel the employer to recognize the union, until a majority of the employees either in a National Labor Relations Board election, or by a petition to the employer, have designated the union as their bargaining representative (S. 1387).	Would forbid picketing to force an employer to recognize a union or his employees to select it, when another union has been recognized and has an existing contract that would bar a National Labor Relations Board election, or when a valid election has been held within the past 12 months, or when sufficient support for the picketing union among employees cannot be shown; or when picketing has been engaged in for a "reasonable period" and no election has been held.	Would forbid picketing for purpose of extortion (302(b)(3)).
No man's land and States rights.	Permits State courts or agencies to exercise jurisdiction in a labor dispute irrespective of whether the Federal law applies unless there is a direct conflict between the applicable provisions of the respective laws (H.R. 4474).	Designed to permit States to exercise jurisdiction over labor disputes to which the National Labor Relations Act applies but over which the National Labor Relations Board does not exercise jurisdiction (S. 1386).	Would authorize National Labor Relations Board by rule or otherwise to decline jurisdiction over disputes having little impact on commerce, and would permit the States to handle such cases.	Would require Board to "assert jurisdiction" over all cases except where "cession agreements" may be reached with State agencies to handle cases of local character. The agencies shall apply and enforce the provision of the Labor-Management Relations Act as interpreted by the Federal courts and the National Labor Relations Board (601(a)).
Economic strikers	Would retain present provision making permanently replaced strikers ineligible to vote, but provides "That in any lawful strike in which recognition was not an issue when the strike began, no direction of election pursuant to a petition filed after the commencement of the strike shall issue prior to the termination of such strike * * * or the expiration of a 3 months' period from the commencement of such strike, whichever occurs sooner."	No provision	Would amend act to permit strikers who are not entitled to reinstatement because their jobs have been filled by permanent replacements to vote in representation elections.	Similar provision (603).
Non-Communist affidavits	No change in Taft-Hartley but contains a provision declaring that nothing in the bill should be construed to interfere with, or limit, the rights of unions to protect themselves against subversive infiltration or domination (H.R. 4473).	do	Would require employers as well as union officers to file non-Communist affidavits.	Similar provision (112 (a) and (b)).
Building and construction unions.	No provision	do	Would permit prehire contracts, and National Labor Relations Board certification of union without election.	Would permit prehire contracts providing for— the union shop after 7 days. union referral of applicants for hiring. minimum requirements of experience, training, or seniority for employment (602(a)).
Involuntary reopening of union contract.	do	do	Would forbid forced or involuntary reopening of collective bargaining agreements during life of contract.	None.
Supervisors	Would keep the present definition.	do	Would keep the present definition.	Added a proviso to the definition of "supervisor" which would make "service assistants in the communications industry" eligible for union membership (604).
Rehearing representation elections.		do	Would authorize the National Labor Relations Board to conduct representation elections without a prior hearing where no substantial objection is made to such a proceeding (508).	Would permit the National Labor Relations Board to conduct prehearing representation elections where no agreement is reached for a consent election and there are no substantial issues of fact or law which should be resolved by a preelection hearing. The Board's decisions in such matters are not subject to court review unless they become the basis of an unfair labor practice charge.)
Hot cargo clauses	No provision	Would make unlawful a hot cargo contract under which an employer agrees in advance that he will not require his employees to handle goods or provide other services for the benefit of an employer who is involved in a labor dispute. Amend the United States Code (S. 1385).	No provision	No provision.

Mr. HIESTAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

JUVENILE DELINQUENCY

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, there is no problem before our Nation and before this Congress today that is more important than the problem of juvenile delinquency. This is greatly aggravated by the selling and mailing of obscene literature and pictures through the mail. At this particular time a subcommittee of the House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service is considering this matter under the very able chairmanship of my colleague, the gentlewoman from Pennsylvania [Mrs. GRANAHAN]. This morning we had a most informative and interesting presentation given to us by the Postmaster General of the United States, Mr. Arthur Summerfield. I am asking that this statement be placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and I am taking this time to urge my colleageus to read it and to inform themselves of the magnitude of this program. The Postmaster General stated, "It is estimated that $500 million is realized annually in mail order pornography and obscenity." Nothing can have a worse or more pernicious influence on the youth of our country who have this filth thrown at them. They do not want this sort of thing. We must strengthen the hands of the Department and see if we cannot correct it.

DEPARTMENTS OF LABOR, AND HEALTH, EDUCATION AND WELFARE

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Appropriations may have until midnight Tuesday next to file a report on the bill making appropriations for the Departments of Labor, and Health, Education and Welfare for the fiscal year 1960.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Rhode Island?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAIRD reserved all points of order on the bill.

THE SAGA OF JOHNNY APPLESEED

Mr. LEVERING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEVERING. Mr. Speaker, since tomorrow, Friday, April 24, is Arbor Day in my native State of Ohio, whose 17th District I am privileged to represent in Congress, I think it is fitting that I draw the attention of my colleagues to the saga of "Johnny Appleseed," one of the authentic folk heroes of an earlier day in America.

Arbor Day in Ohio always brings to mind the name of John Chapman—whom we know today as "Johnny Appleseed"—because, in his lifetime, he epitomized many of the qualities that, we like to believe, have become an integral part of the American dream.

Just as Kentucky had its Daniel Boone, Tennessee had its Davey Crockett, the Sangamon had its Abraham Lincoln, so did Ohio have its Johnny Appleseed, who planted his appleseeds and saw them grow into trees, while we of later generations have seen them blossom into folklore and tradition.

Not long ago, on March 15, an ancient and gnarled apple tree in Mansfield, Ohio, in my congressional district, fell before the onslaughts of a west wind. This tree, a picture of which was carried in Life magazine in February 1945, was believed to be about 140 years old, and to have been planted by John Chapman. It was the last of the authentic apple trees planted by Johnny Appleseed.

John Chapman was born on September 26, 1774, in Leominster, Mass. He died on March 18, 1845, in Fort Wayne, Ind. Although historians in both locations believe they know, we cannot be sure of his exact home at the time of his birth or of his exact burial place.

The Fort Wayne Sentinel in one of its weekly issues in March 1845, after noting the death of a local stonecutter on Tuesday last, also recorded the following:

> On the same day, to this neighborhood, at an advanced age, Mr. John Chapman (better known by the name of Johnny Appleseed). The deceased was well known through this region by his eccentricity and the strange garb he usually wore. He followed the occupation of a nurseryman, and has been a regular visitor here for upward of 20 years.

Separating the fact from the fiction of John Chapman—or Johnny Appleseed—is not easy, more than a century after his death, but I have referred to many books recently, striving to get the facts about him. I would like to pay particular tribute to E. Kenneth Dirlam, of Mansfield, Ohio, who was vice chairman of the Richland County Ohio Sesquicentennial Committee in 1953. Mr. Dirlam wrote the book, "John Chapman—By Occupation a Gatherer and Planter of Apple Seeds."

John Chapman, as I have noted, was born in Massachusetts. His father was Nathaniel Chapman, who, many years later, moved to near Mansfield, Ohio. John Chapman had an older sister. She and he were the only children born to the union of Nathaniel Chapman and Elizabeth Simons—she also spelled it Simonds and Symonds—who died in childbirth while her third child was being born. At that time, Nathaniel Chapman was away from home, fighting with the Minute Men. In fact, he served under Gen. George Washington and became a captain in the Revolutionary Army.

After the war, Nathaniel Chapman married again and fathered some 10 children. The oldest boy, by this second marriage, was named Nathaniel, too. All of the members of the second family were half-brothers and half-sisters to John Chapman, of course.

The best available records indicate that John Chapman grew up in Longmeadow, south of Springfield, Mass., and a little marker erected in 1936 in Stebbins Park, by the Springfield Garden Club, declares:

> He spent his boyhood in this pleasant valley or somewhere nearby. Here he received inspiration for his life work of spreading westward his gospel of beauty and service.

The Connecticut Valley, without doubt, was wonderful country for a boy in those days, for there were streams, and woods, and meadows. We can be sure—based on his later history—that John Chapman was an outdoorsman from his earliest days.

But John Chapman was not destined to live out his life in the peace and quiet of a New England valley. Somewhere, there was born in him a desire to move into the frontier country; somehow, he felt a call to service and adventure.

Johnny Appleseed was a man of vision. He saw that the frontier was developing and that the pioneers, moving westward, would be unable to carry apple seedlings with them. He took seeds, gathered in Pennsylvania, and planted orchards on rich bottom land. Then, he would take the seedlings and transplant them, or barter so many seedlings for the necessities of life. Yet, even though he was a man of vision, thinking of the future, Johnny Appleseed was a Yankee trader. He strove, in his lifetime, to feed and clothe and take care of himself and always to have enough of what it took to get him by. There are extant today notes that he signed, in borrowing money, and deeds that he signed in acquiring property, and promises to pay—in apple tree seedlings—that he gave to men in exchange for other property.

So we find, recorded in Hovey's Magazine of Horticulture, issue of April 1846, these words:

> About the time of the survey of the lands in the U.S. military district, northwest of the river Ohio, preparatory to their location by those holding the warrants which had been issued by the Government to the soldiers of the Revolutionary War, for services during that war, there came to the valley of the Muskingum and its tributaries, the Tuscarawas, Walhonding, Mohican, etc., a man whose real name, if ever known, is not now remembered by the oldest inhabitants here, but who was commonly known and called all over the country by the name of Johnny Appleseed.
> This man had imbibed so remarkable a passion for the rearing and cultivation of apple trees from the seed, and pursued it with so much zeal and perseverance, as to cause him to be regarded by the few settlers, just then beginning to make their appearance in the country, with a degree of almost superstitious admiration.
> Immediately upon his advent, he commenced the raising of apple trees from the seed, at a time when there were not, perhaps, 50 white men within the 40 miles square. He would clear a few rods of ground in some open part of the forest, girdle the trees standing upon it, surround it with a brush fence, and plant his apple seeds. This done, he would go off some 20 miles or so, select another favorable spot, and again go through the same operation. In this way, without family and without connection, he rambled from place to place, and employed his time, I may say his life.

When the settlers began to flock in and open their "clearings," old Appleseed was ready for them with his young trees; and it was not his fault if every one of them had not an orchard planted out and growing without delay.

Wherever he was born and reared, John Chapman walked into the American story one day in 1797, when, according to the earlier records, he was on the Allegheny and was caught, barefooted, in an early November snowstorm. Nothing daunted, he used his uncanny knowledge of the forests to protect himself against the weather. In the spring, he selected a spot on the Big Brokenshaw River and planted his first apple seeds.

After a few years in Pennsylvania, it is recorded that John Chapman showed up in the Licking Valley. This, Mr. Speaker, happens to be in my district, and I am proud to report to you that all of my district, particularly the area around Coshocton, Ashland, and Mansfield, is noted as "Johnny Appleseed country."

From all we can learn—

A. Banning Norton wrote in 1862, after interviewing numbers of the old, original residents of the Licking Valley—

we are of the opinion that contemporaneous with Craig was the oddest character in all our history, Johnny Chapman, alias Appleseed, who was discovered in this country when the Walkers, and Butlers, and Douglasses and others landed here, and whose name is found recorded among those voting at the first election ever held in this district.

John Butler had settled near the mouth of Owl Creek in 1803, William Douglass and Capt. James Walker came in 1804, and Ben Butler arrived in 1805.

All over this part of the country, it is possible to see notes, signed by John Chapman, and deeds in which his name is recorded. For instance, in September 1809, when he was 35 years old, John Chapman bought two town lots in Mount Vernon, paying out $50 in good U.S. money. It was said to be the first real estate he ever owned, and the transaction was witnessed by the tavern keeper, justice of the peace, the local merchant and the commander of the town militia.

He spent much time around Coshocton, Newark, Mansfield, and Ashland, as well as pushing farther westward, all the time, in seeking to serve the new settlers, who also were pushing westward. By the 1820's, John Chapman had what amounted to a chain of nurseries extending from western Pennsylvania, on across Ohio, into Indiana.

John Chapman has become legendary as Johnny Appleseed. But he was not a legend in his lifetime. He was a man, who was admired among men and excited a good deal of friendly and curious comment wherever he traveled, not unmixed with a good deal of awe. The stories about his escapades were numerous, even in his own day and time, for he was a rawboned, colorful character, who carried a Testament, a packet of seeds, and generally wore buckskin. Even in the late fall and early spring, he went barefooted, and he preferred the soft land of the primeval forest to the hard paths of civilization. He lived among the Indians many times and perhaps had as many friends among the red men as he did among the white men.

The picture that emerges, from all I have studied about John Chapman, Mr. Speaker, is that he was a resourceful, energetic, shrewd, thoughtful and courageous man. On more than one occasion, it is recorded, he warned veteran frontiersmen, who knew the Indians well, about incipient trouble from hostile redskins. From the records that are left, it is obvious that these veterans of the frontier held John Chapman in great respect and they always believed him when he gave warning.

John Chapman was a religious man. Despite his simple clothing and habits, he followed the great Swedish philosopher, Emanuel Swedenborg, whose scientific and philosophical knowledge was without peer in the world of his day. He founded what is known as the New Church—the Church of the New Jerusalem. John Chapman loved children, and it was his delight to sit and read the New Testament stories to them, as well as to regale them with tales of his own adventures among the Indians and in the great forests and mountains of the frontier. Most of all, judging from the records of his church, he delighted in spreading knowledge about the teaching of Emanuel Swedenborg. It was his aim to print all the writings of Emanuel Swedenborg and to distribute them through the western settlements of the United States.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that it is fitting that I pause, on this day before Arbor Day, to pay tribute again to John Chapman, better known as Johnny Appleseed. I believe that in the rush and confusion of this modern life, it is good for us to stop, once in a while, and to take a glance backward toward the men who helped to carve our Nation out of the wilderness, and, while doing so, helped to construct the spiritual and moral foundations that have meant so much to us through all the decades.

Johnny Appleseed is a worthy hero for modern Americans. It was recorded that he could cut down as many trees in 1 day as the average man could cut in 2 days. Yet, he was known to be a lithe and slender man, even in middle age. He could run for miles, long after most men had retired to the rocking chair. The paper that recorded his death also recorded that, despite his advanced age, particularly for those days, very few people took him for even 60 years of age.

In Harper's New Monthly magazine, issue of November 1871, we find these words:

In the summer of 1847, when his labors had literally borne fruit over a hundred thousand square miles of territory, at the close of a warm day, after traveling 20 miles, he entered the house of a settler in Allen County, Ind., and was, as usual, warmly welcomed. He declined to eat with the family, but accepted some bread and milk, which he partook of sitting on the doorstep and gazing on the setting sun. Later in the evening he delivered his "news right fresh from heaven" by reading the Beatitudes. Declining other accommodation, he slept, as usual, on the floor, and in the early morning he was found with his features all aglow with a supernal light, and his body so near death that his tongue refused its office. The physician, who was hastily summoned, pronounced him dying, but added that he had never seen a man in so placid a state at the approach of death. At 72 years of age, 46 of which had been devoted to his self-imposed mission, he ripened into death as naturally and beautifully as the seeds of his own planting had grown into fiber and bud and blossom and the matured fruit.

The number of essays, poems, and articles about Johnny Appleseed is legion. Many, many books have been written about him. He has been sung about and eulogized in plays and on the silver screen. Yet, the last word has never been said about him, and it probably never will, for the legend, based on fact, has become imbedded firmly in the folklore of our country. We are the richer because of it, and because of him.

Lydia Maria Child, in Saint Nicholas, written in 1880, has this poem about "Apple-Seed John," with which I want to conclude my remarks:

So he kept on traveling far and wide.
Till his old limbs failed him, and he died.
And he said at the last: "Tis a comfort to feel I've done good in the world, though not a great deal."
Weary travelers, journeying west,
In the shade of his trees find pleasant rest;
And they often stare, with glad surprise,
At the rosy fruit that round them lies.
And if they inquire whence came such trees,
Where not a bough once swayed in the breeze,
The answer still comes, as they travel on:
"These trees were planted by Apple-Seed John."

RAILROAD RETIREMENT AND UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACTS

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, within the past few days, I have read with great interest the majority and minority reports dealing with amendments to the Railroad Retirement and Unemployment Insurance Acts issued by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. In my judgment, every Member of the House ought to take a few minutes to read these documents. In my opinion, our duty as Congressmen is made abundantly clear after reading these reports.

As Members of the House know, we have been considering and discussing amendments to the Retirement and Unemployment Insurance Acts of the railroad employees for several years. Many obstacles have prevented action in this field. The Congress last year almost passed a bill, but the last minute rush of adjournment held the bill up.

I believe that it is safe to say that every Member of this House came back to Washington last January convinced that one of the first items of business on our schedule would be railroad retirement. After the election results of last November became apparent, one could safely assume that programs of betterment for people who work for wages might stand a better chance of passage.

May I strongly urge that every Member of the House give the most serious consideration to this matter. We must collectively assume the responsibility for not enacting the benefit increases that railroad people are entitled to. It is the duty of the House to see to it that we are not frustrated again in our desire to deal fairly with retired railroad employees.

Because I am the son of a railroad employee, I am probably more aware of the problems of those who work on the railroads than the average Member. On the other hand, however, I am certain that every Member of this House has many friends and associates in their districts who are railroaders. I am certain that you will all agree when I say that these people are good citizens. Railroad employment is often dangerous and exacting. An improved system of retirement and unemployment insurance is more than warranted for these people at this time.

From the time that the Railroad Retirement Act was first enacted, the owners of the railroads have been coming to the Congress pleading poverty. Railroad managers have never admitted that they could afford their share of the cost of a decent retirement system for their employees. The railroads are doing that again at this time. Lobbyists for the railroad owners are swarming over the Capitol saying that the enactment of improved retirement and unemployment benefits will bankrupt the carriers.

This is simply not so. The railroads have recovered from the temporary setback suffered last year. Car loadings and revenues are up in 1959. For that matter, despite all the cries of poverty that went along with the passage of the Smathers-Harris bill last year, the railroads had a pretty good year in 1958. We can expect that 1959 will be an excellent year for railroad earnings. So, I believe that the modest program of improvements in H.R. 1012 can be borne by employees and the industry. I hope that we will do what is necessary to help the thousands and thousands of loyal railroad employees, both active and retired, who are looking to us in their hour of need.

CLARE BOOTHE LUCE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentlewoman from New Jersey [Mrs. DWYER] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mrs. DWYER. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Foreign Relations of the other body is expected today to take action on the nomination of Mrs. Clare Boothe Luce to be the U.S. Ambassador to Brazil.

Whether the committee recommends approval or disapproval of this nomination, I think it is time to speak out in behalf of a woman who has served her country brilliantly under difficult conditions, and who—if given the opportunity—will make a contribution of the utmost importance in one of the key areas of the free world.

I cannot imagine, Mr. Speaker, a wiser or more fitting appointment than Clare Boothe Luce as U.S. Ambassador to Brazil. Her distinguished public record, both in politics and diplomacy, fully support this unqualified endorsement.

At this time, then, I believe it is appropriate to review her record briefly and to emphasize why I believe this appointment is worthy of the support of the entire Congress—even though we here in the House of Representatives have no formal part to play in advising and consenting to this appointment.

Clare Boothe Luce first entered public life, following a highly successful career as journalist, playwright, and editor, when she was elected to the House of Representatives from Connecticut in 1942. She immediately won apppointment to the wartime Committee on Military Affairs where she served with distinction and displayed a quick grasp of and critical insight into the complexities of military organization and operation during the most taxing war this Nation has ever fought.

In just 4 years in this body, Mr. Speaker, Mrs. Luce displayed in many ways the shrewd judgment and deep concern and farsighted wisdom that has been her hallmark in public life. She worked for long-range planning of American defenses—so that our country would never again be found unprepared and so militarily weak as to invite aggression. She bolstered the cause of guaranteeing the civil rights and liberties of all the people. She supported vigorously efforts to promote the health and welfare of our people. And she recognized and accepted the responsibility of the United States to help those less fortunate people in other countries.

It is particularly illustrative, Mr. Speaker, of her wisdom and sound judgment that 6 years before the Marshall plan went into effect, Clare Boothe Luce here in the House of Representatives urged that plans be made and legislation enacted providing for the economic rehabilitation of Europe and Asia after World War II.

Despite her successes in other fields, Clare Boothe Luce's greatest personal triumphs and most significant contributions were the result of her service as U.S. Ambassador to Italy—a post in which she proved over and over again her talent for diplomacy and her reliability in the most sensitive and delicate areas of public life.

It is no secret that Mrs. Luce's nomination as Ambassador to Italy was greeted both here and in Italy with many frankly stated doubts and reservations. Her appointment was made at a time of great crisis in the history of the Italian nation. Its economic life still shattered as a result of the devastation of World War II, its political life in turmoil between Communists on the left and Fascists on the right, Italy's Christian Democratic government looked to America for the friendship, the economic assistance, and the political support it urgently needed if Italy was ever to play its role as a major bastion of the free world.

Her achievements in this immensely difficult period were many. A few of the more important ones deserve special mention:

She negotiated the NATO Status of Forces Agreement with Italy, which gives the Western forces a firm military anchor in that strategic country.

She coordinated diplomatic overseas planning for the evacuation of 2,800 Americans from the Middle East by the U.S. 6th Fleet—a potentially hazardous operation but one that was carried out successfully, due in large measure to the careful and detailed planning that supported it.

And then there was the Trieste crisis. To mention Trieste in 1959, Mr. Speaker, is to conjure up a picture of an old and lovely city in the northeast corner of Italy astride the Adriatic Sea. But less than a half dozen years ago, Trieste was the center of an international crisis that could easily have led to war. Strategically located on the border between Western and Eastern Europe, Trieste was historically a bone of contention between Italy and Yugoslavia. Both countries claimed the city and appeared quite willing to fight for it.

The settlement negotiated in the Trieste crisis—to which many people in many countries contributed—still works. The fact that war was avoided and a damaging breach between two important countries was healed, however, was due—as much as to any other factor—to the negotiating skill and the round-the-clock hard work of the American Ambassador, Clare Boothe Luce.

At the time of the settlement, in fact, one of Italy's most respected newspapers said this of Mrs. Luce's work, "No one will ever know how much Italy owes to this fragile blonde."

Throughout her service in Italy, Mrs. Luce was a tower of strength on the side of free and democratic government in Italy. Her influence as American Ambassador and in the distribution of American economic aid was used wisely and well. Discreetly, yet firmly, she made the point that American aid was not intended to benefit Communist-dominated enterprises. As a partial result of her effective administration of American aid, Communist influence in Italian labor declined substantially.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this is an outstanding record, worthy of the highest ideals of American diplomacy.

Why, then, Mr. Speaker, has there been such outspoken criticism about the appointment of Mrs. Luce as Ambassador to Brazil? I would suggest that much of it is related, in a kind of reverse logic, to the very qualities of intellect and personality that have made her such an outstanding woman. Her brilliant mind and ready wit, her determination and her great capacity for sustained work, have made her liable to the same kind of half-envious opposition that has been directed at other well-known figures who possessed this same kind of ready brilliance.

But beyond this feeling, I suspect there is the complicating factor at work in Mrs. Luce's case that she is all too obviously a woman—a beautiful and talented woman who has successfully invaded an area of public life once considered as a sacred preserve of men.

But I am most concerned by the criticism directed against her on grounds that she was too outspoken in defense of democracy in Italy, too much opposed to the twin evils of communism and fascism. If this be "interference in a country's internal affairs," then perhaps we should have more of it. Many of our colleagues have noted, Mr. Speaker—and I believe correctly—that American diplomacy has suffered most when American diplomats have permitted themselves directly or indirectly to be leagued with totalitarian and authoritarian regimes. This, we can say with assurance, has never been the case with Clare Booth Luce.

But let the Italian people themselves testify to their own feeling about Ambassador Luce's "interference"—the convincing testimony of their impressive economic recovery and national prosperity, and the persuasive evidence of their substantial defeat of Communist and Fascist Parties and factions in their country's politics and labor.

No one could reasonably attribute the progress of a courageous people and a great nation to the work of a single ambassador. And I do not wish to credit Mrs. Luce with achievements that in truth belong to the Italian people. But the important consideration is this: That as Ambassador of the United States to Italy, Clare Boothe Luce was a happy symbol and an effective influence in realizing the mutual goals of our two countries, the growth of freedom and prosperity for the Italian people, and the strengthening of Italy as a major force in maintaining the security of the free world.

Georgetown University, I believe, has best summed up the case for Clare Boothe Luce. In awarding her an honorary degree, the univerity's citation read as follows:

> Georgetown University rejoices today in honoring one to whom Solomon's salute, rarely merited, is given with all appropriateness, "a valiant woman." * * * Her first and enduring hatred has been for sham and pretension * * * and she has exposed evil with luminous clarity. But always her purpose has been to heal, not to wound. Always her gifted intelligence has striven to serve the heart's dearest cause, which is love.

As a woman, it is my proud privilege today to pay tribute to Clare Boothe Luce, to give vigorous support to her appointment as Ambassador to Brazil, and to wish her renewed success in her new mission.

UNITED NATIONS CHARTER REVISION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. PORTER] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, today in Congress, in this House and in the other body, a concurrent resolution expressing the sense of Congress in regard to United Nations Charter revision and for other purposes is being introduced.

Those of us who are introducing the resolution believe a strengthening of the United Nations Charter is a positive step toward world law.

MAJOR POINTS OF THE RESOLUTION

This resolution contains two major points. We who are sponsors urge:

First. That the United States propose U.N. Charter review before the fall of 1960.

Second. That the President initiate high-level studies in the executive branch of the Government to determine what changes should be made in the U.N. Charter. The resolution also asks that the study include other international organization charters in which the United States is a party.

I want to discuss briefly some facts about United Nations Charter revision:

In order to provide for revision and amendment, the United Nations Charter provides two mechanisms. Article 108 provides for the General Assembly to recommend amendments. Article 109 specifies procedures for calling a charter review conference to draft revisions.

In 1955, charter review was placed on the agenda of the General Assembly. The General Assembly decided that a charter review conference should be held at an appropriate time and expressed the belief that review of the charter should be conducted under auspicious international circumstances.

Forty-three General Assembly member nations favored the motion. Six opposed it and nine abstained. Earlier the Security Council had voted as follows: nine in favor, one against and one abstaining.

In June 1957 the committee established by the General Assembly met. Members considered the time and place for a review conference. They concluded that the appropriate time and auspicious international circumstances referred to in the 12th General Assembly should be no later than the 14th General Assembly meeting in 1959. This recommendation was adopted by the General Assembly in resounding fashion—there were 54 voting in favor, 9 abstaining and not a single negative vote.

The Committee on Arrangements is scheduled to meet this summer.

ACHIEVING A JUST AND LASTING PEACE

The concurrent resolution we are introducing today incorporates many fundamental beliefs. It notes first that the basic purpose of the foreign policy of the United States is to achieve a just and lasting peace.

I am reminded of a statement made earlier this year by an outstanding American, Governor Adlai Stevenson, who was speaking before an intent audience of 4,000 in Constitution Hall in this city. Mr. Stevenson observed at that time:

> America's hope is to make concrete the image of brotherhood which we profess, and set to work to express our dedication in whatever effort or sacrifice the world's needs may dictate.

His remarks in the first lecture in memory of A. Powell Davies, the late pastor of All Souls' Church—Unitarian, of Washington, D.C.—were carried throughout the world by the wire services and syndicated columnists. His astute commentary was titled "The Political Relevance of Moral Principles." One of his major points was that we must never forget to reaffirm our freedoms.

DEVELOPING ENFORCEABLE WORLD LAW

Secondly, our resolution today notes there can be no just and lasting peace without the development of enforceable world law.

Thus we propose that it be the sense of the Congress that the United States position, at the forthcoming meeting of the Committee on Arrangements for a Conference for the Purpose of Reviewing the Charter should be that the Committee recommends to the 14th Session of the United Nations General Assembly that a review conference be held within 1 year—or by the fall of 1960.

One week, one month, one year is too short a time to achieve the aim of those working for brotherhood among all men. But one must start and it is a good time to get started.

The late George Bernard Shaw was not always cutting in his commentary, not always pessimistic.

He has written:

> We are all children of one Father and the sooner we stop calling each other names the better.

A man of another nation thousands of miles away from the home of George Bernard Shaw has discussed the four faces of peace. I refer to Gen. Carlos P. Romulo, Philippine Ambassador to the United States.

He has said:

> There was a time when we were told that we would have peace, but it is a peace by mutual terror. Now, it doesn't seem to be mutual any more. Modern technology seems to have made it possible for one nation to have such superiority, that it can shoot an intercontinental ballistics missile through outer space and destroy not only one nation but the whole world.
> It has also been said that peace has four faces, peace by power, peace by trade, peace by diplomacy, and peace by people. It would seem to me that peace by people should have been called instead peace by brotherhood because it is only when people of the world understand and believe in and carry out brotherhood that there can be real peace.

THE DELICATE BALANCE

The third section of our resolution notes that peace does not rest on law today but on the delicate balance of terror of armed forces.

None of us would ask that a person wring his hands, gnash his teeth and tear his hair, although I grant that such responses may be entirely defensible in the light of our present situation and in the light of our existing policies which are every day pushing us closer to atomic war and to the destruction of our civilization.

There is indeed a "delicate balance of terror of armed forces."

So as the mountain climber makes the initial preparation to best the obstacle he would surmount, we must make the initial preparations toward the attainment of workable world law.

A human being is a frail thing. He can easily be killed. Most of us are reluctantly reconciled to our own personal mortality, but we are appalled at the thought that our children may not have a chance to grow up because of our progress in the arts of weapon making. We would like to figure out how to save them.

TIME TO DEFINE OUR POLICY

We must accurately assess the danger. Are we too alarmist? No, we are not. Is there a balance of terror on which we can rely? No, there is not.

It is time to strengthen the United Nations through a Charter Review Conference. It is time to define our policy.

The fourth section of our resolution notes that the United Nations and other international organizations constitute an important influence for peace and need to be strengthened to achieve the rule of law in international relations.

HIGH-LEVEL STUDIES REQUESTED

Because we believe the United Nations and other international organizations are important influences for peace and need strengthening we are requesting that the President initiate high-level studies in the executive branch of the Government to determine what changes should be made in the Charter of the United Nations and other international organizations to which the United States is a party.

We are further requesting that the President report his findings within 6 months after the date of the approval of this resolution. We request that he report these findings to the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate and the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives.

Here in the House 11 Members today are joining me in introducing this resolution. They are the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY], the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. CARTER], the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK], the gentlewoman from Oregon [Mrs. GREEN], the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON], the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MEYER], the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORHEAD], the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RHODES], the gentleman from Alaska [Mr. RIVERS], the gentleman from California [Mr. ROOSEVELT], and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WOLF].

This resolution is also being introduced today in the other body by a distinguished group of Members there.

Mr. Speaker, at this time I request permission to incorporate at the close of my remarks the full text of this concurrent resolution and I hope that as my colleagues have the opportunity to read and examine it, they will see fit to join us in this step toward world peace through world law:

HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 147

Concurrent resolution expressing the sense of Congress in regard to United Nations Charter revision and for other purposes

Whereas the basic purpose of the foreign policy of the United States is to achieve a just and lasting peace; and

Whereas there can be no such peace without the development of enforceable world law; and

Whereas peace does not rest on law today but on the delicate balance of terror of armed force; and

Whereas the United Nations and other international organizations constitute an important influence for peace and need to be strengthened to achieve the rule of law in international relations; and

Whereas the United Nations General Assembly at its tenth session resolved that "a General Conference to review the Charter shall be held at an appropriate time"; and appointed a "committee consisting of all the members of the United Nations to consider, in consultation with the Secretary-General, the question of fixing a time and place for the Conference, and its organization and procedures"; and

Whereas the United Nations General Assembly at its twelfth session resolved "to keep in being the Committee on Arrangements for a Conference for the Purpose of Reviewing the Charter, * * * and to request the Committee to report, with recommendations, to the General Assembly not later than at its fourteenth session"; and

Whereas the said Committee is scheduled to meet in the summer of 1959 in advance of the fourteenth session of the General Assembly to be convened in New York in September of 1959: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress that the United States position, at the forthcoming meeting of the Committee on Arrangements for a Conference for the Purpose of Reviewing the Charter, should be that the Committee recommends to the fourteenth session of the United Nations General Assembly that a charter review conference be held within one year following the action of the Assembly on the recommendation of the Committee.

SEC. 2. The President is hereby requested to initiate high-level studies in the executive branch of the Government to determine what changes should be made in the Charter of the United Nations, and the charters of other international organizations to which the United States is a party, to promote a just and lasting peace through the development of enforceable world law. The President is further requested to report to the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate and the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives, within six months after the date of approval of this resolution, the results of such studies.

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PORTER. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the distinguished gentleman from Oregon. I think the gentleman from Oregon has demonstrated great leadership in the field of international understanding, and I know he has made a great contribution to the cause of world peace not only by this resolution but with respect to others on which he has taken the leadership. I have followed the United Nations since its formative days in San Francisco. I am vitally interested in this body and on Monday next I have a special order to discuss another approach which will make the United Nations an even more effective body for world peace. This resolution is timely for a review of the United Nations Charter. I would like to congratulate the gentleman again for thus bringing this information to this distinguished body.

Mr. PORTER. I thank the gentleman for his kind remarks.

Mr. MONAGAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PORTER. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. MONAGAN. I cannot say that I am completely familiar with the resolution of the gentleman, but I am particularly interested to hear the gentleman's remarks about the increasing power of today's weapons and the increasing complexity and increasing danger to the civilian population not only from the wartime use but from the peacetime testing of these weapons.

I am wondering whether or not the gentleman feels that there is a possibility of making great progress in the direction of regulating the use of such dangerous weapons.

Mr. PORTER. I thank the gentleman for his statement.

In answer to his question, I think not only is it possible but it is absolutely necessary. It must be done through a plan of collective security based on world law, a law which does not allow one nation an advantage over another.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PORTER. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. CARTER. It has been a real pleasure to sit here and listen to the gentleman's discussion of this resolution. I want to compliment the gentleman from Oregon for his leadership and his efforts in connection with world understanding and world laws. Those of us who for one reason or another walk closer to God find in this endeavor a very serious and a very conscientious leader in the gentleman from Oregon.

There is one more statement I would like to make. It is interesting to note that the League of Nations is our one step toward civilizing the area outside of the 3-mile limit. We need a world police force. We need world law before we can call ourselves a civilized world. We pass laws in this country to control various crimes, and we make our own society, and adjust ourselves in our behavior toward one another. But in the world itself and between nations there is a long way to go before we are a civilized world. It is a step in the right direction. As long as we prepare for war, as long as we build these great machines for destruction, it is going to be difficult to prevent implementation of their force and their purpose, unless through world law. We seek to control them and, if possible, prevent their use and prevent their manufacture, and return to civilized use all of this tremendous capacity that is being developed in the form of implements of force.

Mr. PORTER. The gentleman's statement is very much appreciated. With his help and the help of our colleagues and with divine help, we will move forward together to a world of peace and justice.

Mr. BOW. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PORTER. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BOW. I think the gentleman has brought to the attention of the House today a very important matter; that is, the question of peace through a rule of law. I think it should be pointed out, if the gentleman will permit, that the President in his state of the Union message this year spoke on the rule of law, and that this Nation is more concerned with peace through a rule of law than through conflict.

More recently, in his Gettysburg College address, the President made this reference:

> Another fact, basic to the entire problem of peace and security, is that America and her friends do not want war. They seek to substitute the rule of law for the rule of force.

Secretary of State Dulles, in perhaps the last major speech before his serious illness, discussed the same principle with the New York State Bar Association.

Mr. Dulles had this to say:

> In the swift flow of daily events it is easy to lose track of the broad strategy of our foreign policy. We seek peace, of course. But we seek it in what seems to us the only dependable way—the substitution of justice and law for force.

The most recent statement on this subject came in an address by Vice President NIXON before the Academy of Political Affairs in New York City. His subject was the rule of law, and he said:

> I am now convinced, and in this I reflect the steadfast purpose of the President, and the wholehearted support of the Secretary of State and the Attorney General, that the time has now come to take the initiative in the direction of establishment of the rule of law in the world to replace the law of force.

In this policy, members of the present administration are the spiritual heirs of the late, great Senator Robert A. Taft, whose memory we cherish. Senator Taft once said:

> I do not see how we can hope to secure permanent peace in the world except by establishing law between nations and equal justice under law. It may be a long hard course, but I believe that the public opinion of the world can be led along that course, so that the time will come when that public opinion will support the decision of any reasonable impartial tribunal based on justice.

Many people at times have criticized the late Senator as being an isolationist, but I think perhaps he was one of the first who, on the floor of the Senate of the United States, expressed his view of the necessity of the rule of law.

I think the gentleman from Oregon has brought an important matter to the attention of the House and, of course, the American Bar Association is very much interested in this and is doing great work in this field. Mr. Rhyne, an attorney of Washington, former president of the American Bar Association, did monumental work in this field of the rule of law.

I should like to ask the gentleman one question, if I may: Does the gentleman believe that by the adoption of the rule of law or going along with this idea of world law that perhaps we are beginning to find our way into the One World Federation?

Mr. PORTER. Before answering the gentleman's question let me thank him for pointing out that I recognize and appreciate the great support that world law has on his side of the aisle and from many people. Certainly we Democrats do not claim any monopoly on it. We do not regard the quest for world peace as a partisan matter at all. The question uppermost in the minds of all of us is how we can make the United Nations work more effectively, by revising the charter to make the United Nations a more effective instrument for world peace. The question has been asked if it means that we must give up part of our sovereignty. I think we could well afford to make some concessions for world peace. I do not think there is much argument on that. I do not think we will disagree on that.

Mr. BOW. May I say to the gentleman, if he will yield further, that my purpose in asking this question and any others I may ask is simply to bring the facts out into the open. I believe in the rule of law, and I am going to support the rule of law, but these are questions which have been troubling me, and I think they are questions that we will have to face as legislators with our constituents from time to time. I feel that we should make these inquiries early in the consideration of the question and bring the facts out in the open so people may know that what we are doing is not to destroy the sovereignty of the United States but to bring about a rule of law which may preserve the sovereignty of the United States.

The next question I would ask of the gentleman is asked so that we may have an explanation that in this matter we are not heading toward world government, but toward a world of peace and the rule of law through the courts.

Mr. PORTER. On the matter of bringing out the facts, if I may interrupt the gentleman, the gentleman is absolutely right. These matters should be discussed widely. There are two objections people use against the proposal of world law: One is, how does it affect our capacity to defend ourselves with respect to our enemies. The second is, will it detract from our sovereignty? There is great interest in this on the part of the American Bar Association and others. The answer, of course, is that we are not giving up any essential part of our sovereignty and certainly we are not weakening ourselves, but we are taking steps to keep us from becoming weak and extinct.

Mr. BOW. I think the gentleman will agree that the World Court as it exists at the Hague, which is part of the United Nations, decides about two cases a year. Apparently no one has been going to the Court. Does the gentleman care to make some comment upon that?

Mr. PORTER. Yes. I agree with the Humphrey and Morse position under which we would give up the right to decide what is domestic. The Court could say what is properly within its jurisdiction. I would be very much for the adoption of that position.

Mr. BOW. What the gentleman is saying, I believe, is that he is in favor of taking the Connelly provision of the bill away so that we do not reserve the right to determine whether it is a domestic question or not, but that would be a question determined by the Court itself, which, generally, is the right of courts to determine. It is not the litigant's right. It is up to the court to decide whether the court has jurisdiction. The court itself decides that jurisdictional question.

The gentleman will agree that perhaps the right of jurisdiction and determination of jurisdiction should be given to the Court so that we would not find ourselves in the position we were in when we filed a case against Russia involving the loss of a plane. Russia's reply was:

"That is a domestic problem, therefore the Court has no jurisdiction."

Mr. PORTER. Yes. I want to point out to the gentleman that we had a committee from this House visit The Hague and the World Court for the first time in history of that Court earlier this year. The Court was very pleased that we took an interest in it. I am glad to see Vice President NIXON's recommendation with respect to treaties and I hope we will be able to carry them out.

Mr. MEYER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PORTER. I yield to my friend from Vermont.

Mr. MEYER. I want to commend the gentleman for his excellent statement and I would like to ask if over and above the questions of religion, morality and brotherhood there are not many practical reasons why we should be greatly interested in developing world law?

Mr. PORTER. Yes, indeed. As Mr. Noel-Baker, the famous author of "The Arms Race" put it, the romanticists are the people today who think we can defend ourselves by force. The true realists say we can only find world peace on the basis of world law.

Mr. MEYER. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PORTER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. Speaker, it serves a very useful purpose to bring to the floor for discussion from time to time means and methods for the improvement of the rule of law and for the chartering of peace and security throughout the world. I should like to commend each speaker who has spoken on this subject. I was delighted to hear the gentleman from Oregon state he knows that the subject of revision of the United Nations charter is under daily study at the State Department at the present time, and it is. I recently checked on that matter.

Tomorrow I shall be at the United Nations where I hope to be discussing this, among several other things. The United Nations is in the district which I am proud to represent. Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge, although his home is in Massachusetts, now lives in my district, and I am proud to consider myself as his Representative. I know of the zest and zeal with which he has pursued this subject and the furthering of the rule of law in all areas where the United Nations can be a more productive and useful instrument. He and Francis Wilcox of the State Department have been working together for a long time on this subject.

Mr. PORTER. We would not have introduced this if we were satisfied with the administration's position. The administration's position does not favor charter review at this time. The administration does not favor strengthening the United Nations to the extent that we believe necessary. This has been ascertained in correspondence with the State Department. We believe that there needs to be a changed policy and an acceleration of effort.

Mr. LINDSAY. I would like to ask the gentleman whether or not, in view of the recognition that the gentleman has given to the continuing study the State Department is making on this subject, his resolution was discussed specifically with the State Department in advance of his introducing it in the House?

Mr. PORTER. We have consulted with them. We know the studies are going on, but unless the Congress speaks up, backed up by the people of the United States, the administration will not move forward imaginatively and courageously.

Mr. LINDSAY. My question was whether or not this specific resolution had been taken up with the State Department in advance of today.

Mr. PORTER. The original language of the resolution has been submitted and they have commented on it.

Mr. LINDSAY. I thank the gentleman.

THE YOUTH OF AMERICA

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I have been tremendously impressed this week in seeing and talking with the high school boys and girls, the boys and girls of the lower school grades, the young college men and college women, the Girl Scouts and the Boy Scouts, and the newsboys of the Lowell Evening Sun of my home city of Lowell who have visited the U.S. Capitol. I was tremendously impressed with their interest in government, their loyalty to their country and our national defense, and their anxiety to be educated so that they may be helpful. I was also very much impressed with the interest they showed in what is going on in the rest of the world, and their anxiety to be helpful. They realized the importance of our international relations. I was pleased, too, with their courtesy. Mr. Speaker, truly the United States is fortunate to have such fine young people in our country. I feel supremely confident that the future of the United States is going to be very safe in their hands. I am extremely grateful to them, and I wish them all good luck.

THE LEGAL PROFESSION AND WORLD PEACE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, Hon. Ross L. Malone, the outstanding president of the American Bar Association, spoke recently before the Bar Association of the District of Columbia.

Mr. Malone speaks pointedly of a problem which is of great concern to every American. He lays down a challenge to which an enthusiastic response from the legal profession will obviously be of tremendous influence and import to us all.

I think this address is so important and timely not only to my colleagues in the legal profession but also to all other colleagues in this House, that I take this opportunity to read it:

THE LEGAL PROFESSION AND WORLD PEACE

The history of the 20th century will record the birth of the atomic age on the plains of my native State of New Mexico on July 16, 1945, and the advent of its younger brother, the space age, on the plains of Siberia some 12 years later on October 4, 1957.

As in the case of the addition of children to any household, these two boisterous youngsters have made quite a change in the way of life of the world family and the individual countries which compose it. The impact of these two dates has been felt in every facet of American life today and the chain reactions which they triggered will continue to affect the lives of all of us for the foreseeable future.

The fact that the effects of these world-shaking events were felt sooner in some fields of endeavor than in others is no indication that these effects will be any less pronounced in those in which the impact was delayed.

Education was one of the first areas of activity in this country to be affected by these developments, and particularly by the sputnik era. A wholesome and perhaps long overdue reevaluation of our educational system has been a principal result.

The nature of the impact of these new eras upon the legal profession was not apparent immediately. Since precedent and not prognosis is our principal stock in trade perhaps it is not surprising that the full implication of these historic events was not at once clear to our profession. Today, however, the form of things to come is increasingly apparent. The new emphasis within the legal profession which must result from these great scientific achievements no longer can be ignored.

For instance, it is becoming very apparent today that the great emphasis upon scientific endeavor and the scholarship and recruitment programs undertaken to provide the scientists and engineers which society demands for the space age are siphoning off many of the best minds and most desirable young men and young women who, under normal conditions, would have selected law as a career. A lowering of the average ability of the replacements entering the legal profession is an inevitable result. More than that, there is impressive evidence indicative that this may be occurring at a time when we are no longer members of an overcrowded profession, having been converted by the past two decades to an undermanned profession, but that is another story.

I would like to discuss with you today another byproduct of the atomic and sputnik ages, one which relates not to the internal condition of our profession, as important as that is, but rather to its public obligation in the light of the developments of the nuclear space age in which we live.

The seeds of war lie dormant in every dispute between nations, awaiting the moisture of national pride and the heat of international disagreement to commence their germination. The settlement of those disputes, short of war, traditionally has been the function of diplomacy, a pursuit which, though not unknown to the legal profession, has never been considered within its realm of special competence. That is not surprising inasmuch as the arts of diplomacy are little if any more closely associated with the legal profession than with other vocations. Negotiation plays a part in the practice of every lawyer, but it is equally a part of the daily life of businessmen in almost every line of endeavor. At least as to this aspect of diplomacy it has not been considered that lawyers are any better qualified than persons of other callings.

True, many individual lawyers, responsive to their public responsibility, have entered the field of international politics in various capacities. They have made, and are making, major contributions to the effective use of diplomacy in the solution of problems between nations. However our profession, as such, has never recognized any special responsibility for leadership in this field and no one has suggested that such responsibility exists.

Today the people of the United States—indeed of the world—see the threatening cloud of nuclear warfare in a space age hanging ominously upon the world horizon. They see vexing problems arising between nations—problems which are, have been, and always will be inevitable. But today, the threat that they will burst the bonds of national restraint and trigger world war III has a new dimension—atomic annihilation for mankind.

The people of the world face that threat in the light of the certainty that there can be no winner of a war in our day. They look at the history of the use of diplomacy alone as a means of solving world problems and they are not reassured. As a result, there exists a greater demand today for an effective means of resolving disputes between nations than the world has ever seen. The urgency of that demand results primarily from the threat of atomic destruction, but secondarily from the intolerable burden of an atomic arms race in the space age—a burden felt equally on both sides of the Iron Curtain.

The forces generated by these conditions give support to every means by which it is sought to preserve the peace. They are daily increasing the effectiveness of the United Nations but as now functioning it does not—and cannot—satisfy the demand for an effective means for the solution of controversies between nations. As President Eisenhower has said, "There can be no peace without law." The corollary of that statement is that there can be no law without a court to apply it, having power to enforce its decisions.

With full recognition of those basic premises, the public increasingly is turning to law and lawyers to find the means which it seeks to effect peace through law on the international scene.

It is not surprising that in seeking an effective substitute for peace, the people of the world are turning as never before to the processes of the law as their last, desperate hope. They have seen the development of law administered by courts in their nations become an effective substitute for violence. They know that the removal of a subject of disagreement from the street corners and newspaper headlines to the relative calm and the ordered processes of the courtroom inevitably results in a cooling off period, which in itself contributes tremendously to a peaceful solution. They likewise realize that the adjudication of controversies by an independent court in the light of established principles of law and morality is a fair means of solving them, whatever the ultimate decision may be.

There are increasing evidences of this state of mind in this country today. More and more people are asking why the issues involved in the Quemoy and Matsu crisis and in the Berlin crisis are not susceptible of determination by a court. To the obvious answer that the other side would not agree to submit them to a court or be bound by a court's decision they reply: "Well, what's to be lost by trying?" At least we would have gained the initiative and have demonstrated our own good faith.

If world peace through law is ever to be more than a heartwarming cliche and a dream born of desperation, leadership must be provided—both leadership within this country and leadership among the nations of the world.

Upon whom falls the responsibility to provide that leadership? The answer within this country is obvious. It falls upon the legal profession of the United States. I can assure you that there is no doubt in the minds of the general public of the existence of that responsibility. We have had offers of assistance from many interested groups in our country, but all—uniformly—have said that they are looking to the lawyers to lead the way. And what of the leadership at the international level which is required? Surely, it should come from the nation in which the rule of law has reached its highest state of development. As President Eisenhower has pointed out, "Our Nation is ranged with those who seek attainment of human goals through a government of law."

A brilliant French political observer, Amaury de Riencourt, recently wrote of us, "Americans may not always be law abiding, but they are, like the old Romans, more law minded than any other nation."

There is no nation in the life of which law and lawyers play so important a part as they do in the United States. There is no nation in the basic concept of which the place of courts and the law is so firmly established. There is no nation in such a favorable position to provide leadership in the elevation of the rule of law and its application to problems between nations as the United States of America. We should overlook no opportunity to demonstrate to the world our dedication to this principle and our determination that it become the means of deciding the controversies between nations, which do not yield to diplomatic handling.

May we return now, to the leadership within the country which so clearly belongs to our profession. This obligation is twofold. We must:

1. Provide leadership in exploring the means of accomplishing the effective application of law to world problems; and

2. Educate the public as to the nature of the instrumentalities required, and to the action required to effectuate them.

The nature of the requirements for an effective system of adjudicating disputes is clearly within the special competence of lawyers. The drafting of the documents required to establish these instrumentalities is likewise an activity in which we are skilled. The time has come for the organized legal profession to devote its talents to a massive assault upon these problems.

Fortunately, individual members of our profession have attacked the problem and made significant contributions to the thought and literature upon the subject. Greenville Clark, of New York, who collaborated with Professor Sohn in the monumental work, "World Peace Through World Law," published last year by the Harvard Press, has made a tremendous contribution to our thinkig on the subject. Both in terms of the plan which he has proposed and the vehicle which he has provided for discussion and analysis of the problems which must be met in devising an effective means for applying law to world problems, Mr. Clark's work is of tremendous significance.

Fortunately, also, there are in our profession men like Arthur Dean, of New York, whose unique experience in international affairs, coupled with his tremendous career at the bar, gives him unparalleled qualification to contribute to the effort of the legal profesison in this field.

The second obligation which I mentioned is of equal, if not greater importance. We must acquaint the public with the importance and potentialities of this approach to world peace, and with the means necessary for its accomplishment.

As lawyers, you and I appreciate the implications of and the necessity for compulsory jurisdiction if a court is to function effectively in this or any other area. As lawyers, we appreciate the importance of an effective means of enforcement if the judgment of a court is to be more than a pious pronouncement of principle. There is a great lack of public understanding of such proposals. Fear of the unknown is a common attribute of mankind and there exists in this country and in the world unjustified fear of the principles and instrumentalities which would be required to accomplish the application of law to the solution of world problems. The obligation of the legal profession includes education of the public in these areas of our special competence in order to dispel the fear which otherwise would stand in the way of effective progress toward this means of solving world problems. The responsibilities of leadership in this area are many. They are heavy, but they are ours.

The American Bar Association has inaugurated a program through which we hope to make a significant contribution to the discharge of the responsibility for leadership which I have mentioned. Your own Charles S. Rhyne led a magnificent crusade last year as president of the American Bar Association to awaken the consciousness of the profession to the potentialities of law for the solution of world problems. This year he is serving as chairman of a distinguished committee directing the "second step toward this objective. This month his committee is sponsoring a series of regional conferences of lawyers in the United States, to explore the means whereby law can be applied to achieve an effective solution of problems between nations. Through this means we hope to bring to bear the ability of a cross section of our profession, including the best qualified men in it in this area, to arrive at a proposal which the American Bar Association can recommend to the people of the United States as a feasible and acceptable means of applying law to the solution of world problems.

Obviously such a proposal requires not only acceptance in this country, but acceptance on both sides of the Iron Curtain before it can make any effective contribution to the end for which it is designed. The obstacles to such acceptance are both apparent and real, but they are not insuperable. The bonds which exist throughout the legal profession of the world provide a vehicle by which we can proceed, removed at least to some extent from governmental interference. It is those bonds through which we hope to initiate the world action which is required to bring about world acceptance of this concept.

During Mr. Rhyne's and my trip to Russia and Yugoslavia last summer, we found a very responsive interest on the part of the legal profession in the possibilities of such a program. The general principle which we are considering was presented by Mr. Rhyne to the International Bar Association at Cologne in July, and was approved by the lawyers of the free world attending the conference.

We envision the regional conferences in the United States to which I have referred as pilot projects for a world conference of lawyers to follow. Through it, we hope to marshal the ability and the influence of the legal profession of the world in support of a practical proposal for the achievement of world peace through the application of law. The response of the International Bar Association to the proposed world conference provides additional encouragement for the program.

We have no illusions as to the problems, both domestic and international, which must be solved before the objective which I have outlined can be accomplished, but in none of them do I find any excuse for further delay. We propose to launch an all-out attack upon these problems with the confidence that comes from knowledge that the resources and ingenuity of our profession have solved even more difficult problems in times past.

No one has any idea that the end which we seek can be accomplished overnight, but there is reason to believe that the untapped reservoirs of public opinion reacting to the threat of nuclear warfare may force progress in the undertaking exceeding our most optimistic hopes.

But difficult of accomplishment or not, and as real or as far ahead of us as our ultimate objective may be, the legal profession today has recognized its obligation to provide leadership in this field and is moving aggressively to discharge that obligation. I invite the cooperation and assistance of the members of your great organization in this undertaking which, if successful, will have constituted an accomplishment of our profession equal to, or perhaps greater than, the scientific developments of the past 15 years, which have made world peace the number one objective of all mankind.

NUCLEAR ELECTRIC POWER FACILITIES

Mr. HOSMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOSMER. Mr. Speaker, it is well that occasionally a trained observer look over and report on any type of activity. Recently such an observer, Mr. Don Shannon, of the Los Angeles Times Washington Bureau, investigated and reported on the state of nuclear electric power facilities in the United States. His series of five articles appearing in the Times are accurate and informative. They present information of value both to those of us in the Congress and to others who read this RECORD. Accordingly, I have obtained permission for Mr. Shannon's excellent work to be here reprinted.

The articles follow:

NEW ENGLAND'S NUCLEAR AIM IS LOW-COST POWER—PLANT BUILDING THERE EXPECTED TO BE FORERUNNER OF COMPETITIVE FACILITIES

(By Don Shannon)

ROWE, MASS., March 31.—Power-short New England hopes to produce the first competitively priced electrical energy from nuclear sources by 1965, when its pioneer atomic plant gives way to a second generation facility.

Faced with conventional-fuel costs 59 percent above the national average, 10 New England utilities serving 6 States have banded together as the Yankee Atomic Electric Co. to build a 134,000-kilowatt reactor in this remote mountain area of western Massachusetts.

The plant is expected to go into operation late next year, with an investment of $50 million.

Howard Cadwell, president of one of the partner companies and vice president of Yankee, told touring reporters today that his group regards this first project as partly research and partly a practical addition to New England's power supply.

NUCLEAR POWER NOW

"Nuclear power isn't something for the remote future, as far as we are concerned," he declared. "We're at the end of the line on conventional fuel power production."

The pressurized-water, enriched uranium-fueled reactor will produce electric power at a cost of 12 to 14 mills a kilowatt-hour, Cadwell said. While this might be prohibitive in most parts of the United States, the cost is not much above the New England average of 8 to 10 mills.

"We hope that Yankee's second-generation generating plan will be strongly competitive when it goes into operation by 1965." Cadwell added.

HOPE FOR INDUSTRY

Cadwell held out no hope that cheaper atomic power can bring back New England's vanished textile industry, but he contended that it will enable the area to bid for high energy consuming industries, such as chemical manufacturing.

Massachusetts is also seeking to establish an atomic industrial center, which would demand lower-cost energy.

Glenn Reed, project engineer at the powerplant, said the company chose the pressurized-water type of reactor—similar to that of the Nation's largest nuclear power producer, under construction at Indian Point, N.Y.—because it is at the most advanced developmental stage and can be built most quickly.

New England's need of results in a hurry also dictated the location of the first plant in an uninhabited area, eliminating the requirement for the extra-heavy concrete shielding installed at the suburban New York reactor.

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FIVE-FOOT STEEL SPHERE

Where the Indian Point reactor is half buried in bedrock, the Yankee plant is a 125-foot steel sphere raised above ground on concrete stilts. Instead of a 6-foot concrete shield completely enclosing the reactor, only the core of the Yankee reactor is guarded—by a lighter concrete shield inside the steel sphere.

Thus construction time has been cut to an anticipated 2½ years.

Yankee accepted a $5 million Federal grant for research and will also use without charge for its first 5 years an enriched uranium fuel package valued at $10 million.

"We would rather be free from the strings attached to Government help on our second plant," Cadwell said. "It won't be experimental—but it will be competitive—and we wouldn't expect help any more than we would ask help in building a conventional powerplant."

PRIVATELY FINANCED

The plant at Indian Point is being financed entirely by private capital.

Officials of New York Consolidated Edison Co., who showed the plant to newsmen yesterday, frankly admit the power to be produced there will cost almost twice as much as that obtainable from their newest conventional steam plant. But they are willing to pay as they learn.

"This is only a doorway," Frank Brower, the company's vice president for engineering explained. "The significant plant will be our second nuclear one."

The $2 billion power firm began blasting out the site on the rocky east bank of the Hudson, 24 miles north of Manhattan, in 1957 when management concluded that the only way to get experience in operating a nuclear plant was to build one.

It has a designed capacity of 275,000 kilowatts and is scheduled to go into operation in April 1961.

COST ESTIMATE DOUBLED

Although the present cost estimate of $100 million is twice the original, the company has refused to seek Government aid. Other privately financed projects under construction involve some degree of Federal subsidy, but Consolidated Edison plans to pay even for the fuel it will receive from the Atomic Energy Commission, the Nation's sole supply source.

"This will be the first opportunity to see what nuclear power really costs," Brower said.

Although Indian Point power is expected to cost between 13 and 14 mills, compared to 7.5 mills for the most efficient conventional steam plant, the new project includes $20 million spent in preparing a site which can accommodate additional generating capacity up to 2 million kilowatts. Plant design improvements, as well as a possible change from the pressurized-water, thorium-fueled reactor, are expected to help bring atomic power into a competitive price range.

MICHIGAN ATOMIC POWER PLANT BREEDS OWN FUEL—FIRST REACTOR OF THIS TYPE IN NATION SET UP DESPITE OPPOSITION BY UNIONS

(By Don Shannon)

MONROE, MICH., April 1.—The first commercial fast-breeder reactor powerplant in the United States is under construction near here at a depression-killed lakeside housing development named Laguna Beach in honor of the southern California resort.

The housing development was a casualty of the 1929 crash, leaving only a mission-style entrance gate and a network of canals, but the builders of the Enrico Fermi powerplant hope their project will be producing 150,000 kilowatts of electric power by 1961.

In addition to being the only large breeder reactor—the kind that produces nuclear fuel as it burns, and thus offsets power generation costs—the Enrico Fermi plant is the only nuclear power installation which has met with formal opposition.

OPPOSED BY UNIONS

Walter Reuther's United Auto Workers and two other unions opposed granting a construction permit and forced a hearing before the Atomic Energy Commission on charges that the design is not safe, and that the plant's financial backing is insufficient.

The AEC, however, granted an interim construction permit to the 25 midwestern, eastern and southern firms which combined to finance the $40 million cost of the reactor. And Arthur S. Griswold, vice president of the Detroit Edison Co., which is paying for the $17 million generating plant as well as sharing in the partnership, says he is confident an operating permit will be granted when construction is completed this summer.

Myron C. Beekman, director of Detroit Edison's nuclear power development, who is working with the partnership group—the Power Reactor Development Co.—said the reactor will undergo tests for a full year, and then will be operated at low power for another year at low capacity to doublecheck the plant's safety.

Alton P. Donnell, general manager of Atomic Power Development Associates, Inc., a broader group of private utilities and other companies performing research for the Enrico Fermi plant, explained to visiting newsmen why the fast-breeder reactor was chosen.

"When we started in 1956 the technology of the sodium-cooled, fast-breeder reactor was not nearly as well developed as that of the water-cooled, thermal reactor," Donnell said. "This is really experimental."

Donnell, a onetime member of the staff of Vice Admiral Rickover, boss of the Navy nuclear power program, worked on the pressurized, water-cooled, thermal reactors which the Navy standardized for use in nuclear submarines.

PRACTICAL EXPERIENCE

The submarines and the Atomic Energy Commission's Shippingport (Pa.) power plant provided the practical experience which led New York's Consolidated Edison and New England's Atomic Energy Corp. to adopt the water-cooled reactor for their initial ventures.

Atomic Power Associates and the Power Reactor Development Co. selected the fast-breeder for two reasons, Beekman said. First, as its name implies, the breeder creates new fissionable material in the form of plutonium, which can be sold or used as fuel. Second, a breeder operates at a much higher temperature, giving greater efficiency in the production of steam for power and consequent lower costs.

CHICAGO FIRM HELPED ON NUCLEAR POWERPLANT—SEVEN PARTNERS CONTRIBUTING $15 MILLION TO DEVELOP 180,000 KILOWATT REACTOR

(By Don Shannon)

MORRIS, ILL., April 2.—In the high stakes competition among U.S. utilities to become atomic power pioneers, Chicago's Commonwealth Edison Co. has found an angel for its first nuclear plant near here.

Like Detroit Edison and Yankee Atomic, Commonwealth has seven partners who are contributing $15 million for research and development of a 180,000-kilowatt boiling-water reactor on the Kankakee River southwest of Chicago.

Commonwealth is financing the remainder and will own the whole plant but it has a fixed contract with General Electric for only $45 million. Commonwealth officials say they do not know how much more than this it will cost General Electric to complete the job by October but industry estimates on the loss run as high as $25 million.

COST FOR KNOW-HOW

John J. Poer, project engineer for Commonwealth, told a press group which visited the Dresden reactor on a nationwide tour that he doubts if GE knows the actual cost, since much of it is assigned to the purchase of know-how. Poer explained that GE is anxious to break into the power reactor construction business where the rival Westinghouse Corp. preceded with contracts for the Atomic Energy Commission's Shippingport (Pa.) reactor and Yankee's plant at Rowe, Mass.

The situation is analogous to that of the private power companies generally who are sinking his money into admittedly experimental nuclear plants for fear that government agencies will hold a monopoly when the new power source becomes truly competitive with coal, gas, and oil. With the exception of high fuel cost areas, such as New England and Florida, there is little confidence that the first privately financed reactors will match conventional generators in cost.

NOT NEEDED

"We're really working on something that today Commonwealth doesn't need at all," Poer said, "because this is a cheap coal area."

Fred Hollenbeck, General Electric's project manager on the site, believes that power costs will run between 11 and 12 mills a kilowatt when full operation begins in mid-1960. This compares with 7½ mills at Commonwealth's best present plants.

"We are convinced that the boiling water reactor offers the greatest potential for economical nuclear power," he said.

CUT IN EFFICIENCY

Both Commonwealth and General Electric officials assert that the superiority of the boiling water reactor lies in its use of steam direct from the reactor to drive the power turbines. In the pressurized water reactor and the fast breeder reactor pressurized water and sodium respectively serve as heat transfer agents. While this separation of the heat source from the steam in the turbine prevents radioactivity in the power-generating section of a nuclear plant, it inevitably decreases efficiency.

Hollenbeck conceded that there will be radioactivity around the turbine of the Dresden station but he said experiments have shown that it will not be dangerous to workers filtering the condensed steam before its return to the nuclear core minimizes contamination. He said original plans called for a concrete shield around the turbine but this has been eliminated with AEC approval.

PACIFIC GAS & ELECTRIC CO. PLANS LARGE A-PLANT IN SAN FRANCISCO AREA

(By Don Shannon)

Times Staff Representative

SAN FRANCISCO, April 3.—Pacific Gas & Electric Co., the first U.S. utility to generate power from nuclear energy is ready to begin a major plant in the Bay area within a year, the company's president said today.

Norman R. Sutherland said at a press conference with reporters on a national tour of privately financed nuclear power facilities that Pacific Gas & Electric hopes to complete the plant by 1965. The company is already at work on a reactor at Humboldt Bay but it is of intermeditae size—50,000 to 60,000 kilowatt capacity. The next plant, Sutherland said, will be a minimum of 200,000 kilowatts and may range up to 350,000.

NOT SO LOONY

"We are looked on as a bit loony," the utility chief acknowledged, "but we think nuclear power can be competitive in 5 years, not 10 as some of the people in the East think."

Sutherland said the company chose Humboldt Bay for the location of its intermediate plant because Pacific Gas & Electric engineers determined that they could equal or better the cost of 8 mills a kilowatt-hour for power production with oil in the northern California area. The boiling water reactor—similar to the 180,000-kilowatt Dresden plant now under construction near Chicago by Commonwealth Edison—was picked because it offered the lowest capital cost. Pacific Gas & Electric has a contract guaranteeing completion at $19½ million.

GETTING NO HELP

"That's a firm price and there is no subsidy from anybody," Sutherland said. "We are getting no research and development contribution from the Federal Government and we even propose to pay for our own fuel."

Experiments at Vallecitos nuclear powerplant near Pleasanton, where the utility hooked up a 5,000-kilowatt turbine to a boiling water reactor built by General Electric Corp. in 1957, have shown that production above design capacity is possible with this type reactor. Sutherland said the original design of the Humboldt plant was for 50,000 kilowatts but the turbine has been modified to produce 70,000 and he is hopeful of eventual 75,000-kilowatt capacity.

"We would be aiming at a 6½ mill a kilowatt-hour cost in our big plant," he said.

EDISON UTILITY CAUTIOUS ABOUT NUCLEAR PLANTS—SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA POWER OFFICIAL SEES NO LARGE INVESTMENT AT PRESENT TIME

(By Don Shannon)

A Southern California Edison Co. official yesterday declared that his company is unlikely to follow other U.S. utilities in the building of a large atomic power plant, unless the price drops significantly.

Vice President W. L. Chadwick told newsmen concluding a national tour of privately financed nuclear power facilities that Southern California Edison is skeptical about cost figures claimed by other companies.

He said that, rather than risk the investment of millions of dollars in a plant which may become obsolete within a few years, the company prefers to continue experiments such as that at Santa Susana, near Chatsworth.

REACTOR DESCRIBED

Edison has been generating electricity in small quantities since July 1957, from the sodium-cooled reactor built there by Atomics International, a subsidiary of North American Aviation, Inc.

"It has afforded an opportunity to test operation of a sodium-cooled graphite-moderated reactor, but how soon it can be proved an economical power source we don't yet know," Chadwick commented.

While he described southern California as a high fuel-cost area, he said the company is presently generating power at about 6 mills per kilowatt hour—below costs of other metropolitan areas.

COSTS NEARLY UNIFORM

He said costs are nearly uniform throughout the system, so that there is no comparable situation to that of Pacific Gas and Electric in northern California. Pacific Gas and Electric Co. is proceeding with a 60,000 kilowatt boiling-water reactor at Humboldt Bay, where local production costs 8 mills.

Robert Dickinson, deputy director for sodium reactors of Atomics International, conceded that improved sodium reactor might match but "could hardly beat" Edison's present costs.

Both Dickinson and Chadwick said the biggest advantage of the sodium-cooled reactor is its high temperature steam production. Compared with the 400° to 500° temperatures produced by water-cooled reactors, the Santa Susana plant produces 850° steam and with improved fuel may go to 1,000°.

HOTTEST STEAM CLAIMED

"We've got the hottest steam in the country," Dickinson said, explaining that the higher the temperature the more efficient the transfer of heat.

He said the use of sodium as the coolant and heat transfer agency also gives the advantage of low-pressure operation. A metal which becomes liquid at 208°, sodium does not boil until it reaches 1,600°.

With almost no pressure in the reactor's cooling system, the sodium power plant needs no pressure containment sphere which has been required by the Atomic Energy Commission on pressurized reactors which might accidentally explode radioactive material into the atmosphere.

CHICAGO OPERATION

The steel and concrete containment sphere is estimated to cost $3 million for the Dresden boiling water reactor of Chicago's Commonwealth Edison Co., adding significantly to the capital cost of power generation.

Dickinson said the sodium reactor offers the greatest economy prospects in large sized plants. Asked if the 75,000-kilowatt plant which Atomics International is building at Hallam, Neb., will show such results, he replied that it will take at least a 200,000-kilowatt reactor to do so.

The cost advantage shows up at 200,000 kilowatts and above, he said, because the reactor's core does not have to be enlarged significantly to produce more power—only the heat exchange components.

LIFE SPAN COUNTS

A. C. Werden Jr., nuclear power engineer with Edison, cautioned that the 3,000 hours of operating time at Santa Susana is a short period in the necessary 30-year life span for an economical power station.

Werden said he doubts the eight-mill estimate for the Humboldt Bay reactor and predicted that costs may run nearer 10 mills. He also suggested that improvement in reactor fuels may produce great savings with research now under way.

CHARLES L. TAYLOR—"MAN OF THE YEAR" IN AGRICULTURE

Mr. NATCHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky.

There was no objection.

Mr. NATCHER. Mr. Speaker, it has been said that soil, water, vegetation, and wildlife are important, not so much for themselves but for the effect they have on people. Conservation means not just conserving topsoil, trees, and so forth, but conserving the values which make for the best way of life. In the congressional district of Kentucky which I have the honor to represent there resides a gentleman, Mr. Charles L. Taylor, who has devoted practically his entire life to the furtherance of agriculture, and in so doing he has ever kept in mind that our farm problem is basically a problem of conservation, of conserving not only the very roots of our national economy, but also a way of life.

On April 16, 1959, Charles L. Taylor was named Kentucky's "man of the year" in agriculture. The award was made by the Farm Press and Radio Association of Kentucky. Certainly it is fitting that Mr. Taylor's services should be recognized. There is no person in the State of Kentucky more deserving of the honor which has been bestowed upon him.

Charles L. Taylor was born and reared on a farm in Ohio County, Ky. Thus, by reason of birth, environment, and education he was especially well suited to become a leader in all phases of agricultural pursuits. Mr. Taylor was the first county agricultural agent in Hopkins County, Ky., the first county agricultural agent in Nelson County, Ky., and later he served as county agricultural agent in Henderson and Boyle Counties. Subsequent to receiving a master's degree in agriculture at the University of Wisconsin, he joined the faculty at Western Kentucky State College in Bowling Green, Ky., where he remained for 35 years and until his retirement. For 30 years Mr. Taylor headed the agricultural department at Western Kentucky State College, and, at the same time, he managed the college farm, which is one of the most up-to-date and flourishing college farms in this country. While imparting his knowledge of agriculture to his students, Mr. Taylor has also put into practice the theories he advocates. In the early 1930's he and his brother bought a rundown, badly eroded farm near Bowling Green, Ky. Through wise management, sound financing, good conservation, and soil-building practices, this farm has become an example of productivity and rehabilitation. Mr. Taylor has been cited as a master conservationist and for leadership in the Kentucky green pastures program, he is chairman of the Warren County Soil Conservation District, he has served as a director of the Kentucky Association of Soil Conservation Districts, and was chairman of that association's watershed committee when the spadework was done for passage of the Small Watershed Protection and Flood Control Act of 1956, he is president of the Green River Watershed Flood Control Association, he is president of the Barren River National Farm Loan Association, he has served as vice chairman of the four-State Federal land bank shareholders' committee, and is active in various associations which have for their purpose the improvement of farm conditions.

As I scan the crowding centuries, it seems to me that some of the greatest contributions to civilization have been made by persons of vision. Through his vision and knowledge of the great potential that lies in the soil of our land, Mr. Charles Taylor has realized that we should not forfeit this gift of our inheritance. He has exalted the farming profession to a high level of endeavor. Mr. Taylor has never used his talents or efforts toward the aggrandizement of any selfish interests. By nature he is forthright, honorable, and generous. He gives unstintingly of his time to the civic betterment of his community, his county, his State, and Nation. The city of Bowling Green, Ky., where I am privileged to reside, is fortunate in being able to number Mr. Taylor among its citizens.

As a people we are performing world-shaking and history-making things today. But A. J. Toynbee suggests that 300 years from now the 20th century will be remembered not for its splitting of the atom, but for "having been the first age since the dawn of civilization in which people dared to think it practicable to make the benefits of civilization available for the whole human race." Certainly Mr. Charles Taylor has endeavored to make his vast knowledge of agriculture available to humanity. It is to such Americans, who have lived responsibly and done their part to create a better world, that all of us owe a debt of gratitude.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

William A. Brockwell

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES C. AUCHINCLOSS
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 23, 1959

Mr. AUCHINCLOSS. Mr. Speaker, after some 18 years of faithful service as manager of the restaurant in the House of Representatives, William A. Brockwell is retiring, and his courteous manner and efficient management will be missed by everyone. His term of service has been noted by a rapid growth in the restaurant services in the House side of the Capitol, and this business expansion was met under Mr. Brockwell's leadership with conspicuous ability. His qualities of leadership are emphasized when it is remembered that the expansion was carried on under the devastating handicap of very limited space available for restaurant facilities.

When Mr. Brockwell started, in 1941, there was only 1 restaurant unit on the House side of the Capitol, which served about 500 meals daily, with gross yearly receipts of $110,000, while today about 5,000 meals are served each day, with gross yearly receipts of over $500,000—truly a remarkable growth, not only in operations but also in responsibilities of management. During this period of operation, Mr. Brockwell established in 1942 a new cafeteria, seating 125 people, in the New House Office Building, which was subsequently enlarged in 1944 to a seating capacity of 180. Later, in 1947, the coffee shop in the basement of the Capitol was put into operation, as well as the Members' private dining room in the Capitol. These two new developments provided an additional combined seating capacity of 108. Snackbars were installed in each of the two House Office Buildings in 1953; and when the cafeteria in the New House Office Building was closed in 1959, the new modern restaurant in the courtyard of the New House Office Building, with a seating capacity of 525, was put into operation.

To manage such an ever-expanding project and to contend with the many problems attendant thereto required great patience, farsighted planning, courage, and real ability of an unusual sort. Mr. Brockwell combined all these attributes, and he added to the job his quiet, sincere, and honest personality, which insured success.

The best wishes of his many friends go with him during the days to come; and if he retires to his farm to enjoy its bucolic serenity and to indulge in a bit of hunting and fishing, we feel sure he will find contentment in the knowledge that he did a good job and has earned a rest from the strenuous life he has led in satisfying the gastronomical demands of Congressmen.

Address by Hon. Stuart Symington, of Missouri, Before Democratic City Committee of Philadelphia, Pa.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH S. CLARK OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, April 23, 1959

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, on Tuesday of this week the distinguished junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. SYMINGTON] was the principal speaker at the annual Jefferson-Jackson Day dinner of the Democratic City Committee of Philadelphia, Pa.

Before an enthusiastic audience of 4,000 loyal Democrats, the Senator from Missouri delivered a splendid address dealing with many national problems, but in particular with the critical problems of urban affairs.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the address may appear in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS BY SENATOR STUART SYMINGTON AT DEMOCRATIC CITY COMMITTEE DINNER, PHILADELPHIA, PA., APRIL 21, 1959

Thank you for asking me to Philadelphia tonight. It is always a pleasure to be among Democrats; and I know there are no better Democrats in the world than those of Philadelphia and Pennsylvania.

It is good to see your able Representatives in the House from Philadelphia—BILL BARRETT; JIM BYRNE; BOB NIX; HERMAN TOLL; that very gracious lady KATHRYN GRANAHAN; and your very able city chairman, my old and good friend, BILL GREEN.

Over 14 years ago I used to appear before BILL'S committee in the Congress, and learned to respect his understanding and judgment.

It is a pleasure to be here with your outstanding mayor, and my old schoolmate, Dick Dilworth. I know Philadelphians will show good judgment this year by reelecting him. He has dedicated his energies to a better Philadelphia, and deserves to be reelected by a landslide.

It is a privilege to work in the Senate with another capable and courageous Pennsylvanian, JOE CLARK, who is making a fine record as a Senator. He and I are together on what is needed for the future of this country, and I am mighty proud to be his colleague.

And now, may I congratulate the people of Pennsylvania for their wisdom in electing as their Governor another old and good friend, Dave Lawrence.

Governor Lawrence has already begun building a record as Governor which bids to match his magnificent record as Mayor of Pittsburgh. He is uniformly acknowledged to be one of the outstanding Democrats of our time—and I am equally proud to be with him here tonight.

The people of Philadelphia and Pennsylvania are responsive to their Democratic government because that government has been responsive to the people.

That is not true of our national administration—and this, my friends, is the reason why, in 1960, the people will vote out the apostles of indifference, delay and retrenchment—and vote in a Democratic President.

We have been hearing over-much in the last few months about what the United States can and cannot afford. Judging by some of the pronouncements issuing from Washington, we are teetering on the edge of economic collapse.

As one who passed the better part of his lifetime in industry and business, I believe I know as well as the next man how to read a balance sheet and understand the dangers of living beyond one's means.

Let me, therefore, assert my firm belief that the issue, as it has been presented to the country by the Republican myth-makers, is as phony as can be.

The so-called split between "spenders" and "savers" is another Madison Avenue confection, served up to grab the headlines.

The issue is not solvency or waste, spending or saving. The issue is how our vast national energies will be divided and what priorities will be assigned to which tasks.

No one can look realistically at the state of the American economy and come away with any impression that we are bankrupt, or nearly so.

Never in the long history of mankind has one nation been so bountifully endowed with wealth and the means of producing further wealth. Never in history has a nation had so little cause to misdoubt its basic economic strength.

And yet within this picture of great good health, there are disturbing symptoms, not of overall weakness, but of selective sickness here and there in vital sectors of the economy.

Despite the great fuss and beating of drums in Washington 2 weeks ago, the fact is that more than four and a quarter million Americans are still out of work. And while I share the President's pleasure at the improvement in employment figures, I'm afraid it is a little early to recite a funeral oration over the dead body of the late recession.

We Democrats hope that the worst is over. But this recession has been a strange beast from first to last, and it seems to me that there are still some soft spots which need watching.

For one thing, this was not a uniform recession. Its effects were principally concentrated in a few key labor markets—Detroit, West Virginia, Pittsburgh, Scranton, Wilkes-Barre—to name some of them.

In several areas at one period unemployment topped 14 percent of the labor force. In these places, I regret to say, the recession is not yet over—whatever this Administration chooses to believe.

Furthermore, there are some worrisome clouds on the horizon. Our great steel industry is still below full capacity. But steel inventories are piling up as buyers seek to protect themselves against a possible strike.

Nobody in his right mind wants a steel strike this summer. Yet, if there is no strike, will demand hold up or will there be another production slowdown and more layoffs? These are questions which trouble leading economists—everywhere, apparently, but at the Department of Commerce and the White House.

Meanwhile, the stock market continues its steady climb, oblivious to warnings that a stock certificate ought not to be confused with a parimutuel ticket.

Meanwhile, in the midst of partial recession, great riches, and wild speculation—we are short 140,000 classrooms and our great cities are in danger of being strangled to death by slums, traffic, rising costs, and declining incomes.

Unfortunately, the tendency in Washington has been to look at the wrong symptoms and to draw the wrong conclusions about the nature of the disease.

In the past year and a half, we have had prescribed for us a sirupy mixture of tight money and tidy slogans, and the one was as useless as the other was damaging.

I am persuaded that we have been approaching this situation from almost entirely the wrong direction.

We have been trying to contract the economy. We ought to be expanding it.

During the past 6 years our national economy has been growing at an average annual rate of about one and three-tenths percent. The Soviet economy during the same period has been growing at a rate two or three times as great.

In any case, the key question isn't how much growth but what kind.

A 50 percent increase in the production of chrome doodads can't be equated with national progress.

If we are to meet the Sino-Soviet challenge, what we need, among other things, is increased investment in our human resources through improvements in our educational system. We need more schools and more teachers. We need better colleges and better technical schools. We need more attention to training and retraining workers to the latest and most usable skills.

These needs are only illustrative. I am not making a talk this evening on what the United States needs to keep pace with Russia. The topic, I'm afraid, can't be exhausted in a sentence or two.

I do want to point out, however, that investment of this sort—in schools and colleges and in other public facilities—is not, as the Republicans contend, money taken from the pockets of private enterprise.

Quite the reverse.

Who builds our schools? Private enterprise. Who supplies the raw materials? Private enterprise. Who does the work? American labor.

If you put up a half million dollar school building on the outskirts of Philadelphia, you don't take that much cash, put it in a weighted sack and throw it in the Delaware River. You pay it to builders who pay it to employees and suppliers who pay it to still more employees and suppliers and so forth.

Economists who study these things say money invested in public works turns over about four times. They call this the multiplier effect. Which means, simply, that a billion dollars invested in schools adds about $4 billion to the gross national product.

So I don't accept the Republican dogma that all public spending is evil. Employed with careful attention to sound fiscal and tax policy, public investment could do a great deal to end this leftover recession with its terrible after-effects.

With this foundation, may I turn now, in the few minutes remaining, to the subject of metropolitan area needs.

It has been the custom during this administration to treat our great cities as if they were beggars with their hands eternally outstretched.

In face of the fact that about 15 million Americans still live in substandard housing—most of it in large cities—the administration has up to now successfully obstructed all efforts to provide an adequate slum clearance and urban renewal program. The current housing bill is menaced by the threat of Presidential veto.

So is the airport construction bill. So is the depressed areas bill.

If these bills do pass finally, it will probably be because they have been scaled down in advance to meet White House objections.

The Republicans claim—and I have no doubt that most do so sincerely—that they do not oppose these programs as such.

They oppose them, first, they say, because the programs are too costly and, second, because the cities ought to do the job themselves.

These are seductive arguments and they convince a lot of people. But they are just not true.

The cost argument I have already refuted. We can afford these programs a lot better than we can afford run-down cities and wasted human lives. Any business which allowed its plant facilities to deteriorate would soon be outstripped by its competitors. And the same applies to a government.

City problems do not stop conveniently at city lines. Since the end of World War II, the motor car has created a new metropolitan America. City and suburb are one and their problems are one. But their governments are many.

We have 180 metropolitan areas in the United States. These areas contain 60 percent of all our people. More than a third of them comprise two or more counties. Twenty-four cross State lines. Twenty-nine others are flat up against the borders of States.

These 180 areas contain nearly 16,000 individual governments, including about 3,500 municipalities and 2,500 townships.

Where does local responsibility fit into this picture?

It's there all right. I'm not suggesting that the Federal Government should be the source from which all things flow. But let's be careful how we toss around this concept of local responsibility.

We can't reasonably expect our cities to be responsible for things over which they do not have sufficient control.

Yet our Federal Government seems scarcely to recognize the existence of a metropolitan problem. In fact, of all the thousands and thousands of Federal programs now on the books, there is only one which specifically concedes the existence of such a problem. That one is a relatively modest planning assistance program in the Housing and Home Finance Agency.

The administration's almost total indifference to metropolitan problems has led some to suggest creation of a cabinet level Department of Urban Affairs. This suggestion deserves careful consideration.

Certainly some action is required in this field, and soon. Already a 600-mile long super-metropolis is growing together between Boston and Washington. Others are beginning to form between Los Angeles and San Diego, Seattle and Tacoma, Pittsburgh and Cleveland, Chicago and Milwaukee.

These problems, in other words, are in their infancy. Traffic will get worse before it gets better. Congestion is increasing. Urban renewal will demand more energy and more money instead of less.

The Federal Government cannot shirk its responsibility in this field.

The proposal your outstanding senior Senator JOE CLARK has made for a Hoover Commission-type study of urban and metropolitan needs deserves the support of every thinking American. Such a study is long overdue.

This ought not to be a partisan question. But there is no mistaking the fact that it is.

The Republican National Committee itself noted on April 7 that its election disaster in 1958 was administered largely by urban voters, who are bone tired of evasions and mealy-mouthed moralism.

The time has come for action.

I have long felt that there is no such thing in history as standing still. Either a nation moves forward resolutely and unafraid, or it fails. You cannot fight a successful delaying action against the future. You either master decay or decay masters you.

I'm convinced that our cities can be rescued from blight—given the proper mixture of ingenuity and resolution. The entire country knows what has been done here in the city of Philadelphia, in Pittsburgh, and in my own cities of St. Louis and Kansas City.

Given the support of the Federal Government in those needs where Federal support is indispensable, we can and will solve the problems of our cities.

And if there is no immediate victory in gaining this support, do not despair. It is of such defeats that future victories are born.

National Coal Policy Conference

OF
HON. ELIZABETH KEE
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 23, 1959

Mrs. KEE. Mr. Speaker, on this coming Monday evening, April 27, the newly formed and extremely important National Coal Policy Conference will have a dinner at the Statler-Hilton Hotel and all Members of the House of Representatives have been invited to attend. The theme of the meeting will be "Coal Powers America's Future" and one of its aims will be the adoption by the Federal Government of a national fuels policy based on a realistic approach to the use of basic fuels in America.

The National Coal Policy Conference represents coal operators, coal miners, coal carrying railroads, coal burning electric utilities and manufacturers of coal mining equipment. Thus, it is clear that the conference is well qualified to speak for a united coal industry.

Mr. Speaker, the reason I have requested permission to insert this plea in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD has been to respectfully urge every Member of the House to make a special effort to attend this informative dinner. The speeches will be short and directly to the point. The Members who do not represent coal mining congressional districts and their constituents have a stake in the coal industry. It has been truly said, "The coal industry contributes—in an important way—to the daily living of every American ever day."

Coal is a basic American industry. It provides employment for hundreds of thousands of people. Coal is our basic fuel. Without coal, our Nation could not long remain free.

There exists a need for the Federal Government to take a look at the various basic fuels and establish a policy that will relate them to each other and to the national security. Our Nation has a gas policy, an oil policy and an atomic policy. Only coal of the basic fuels operates without a national policy as a guide.

It is my heartfelt hope that every Member of the House who can possibly do so will avail themselves of this opportunity to meet the men who head this great and vital industry. I can assure you with full confidence that you will enjoy an informative and rewarding experience.

John Foster Dulles

OF
HON. JAMES C. AUCHINCLOSS
OF NEW JERSEY
Thursday, April 23, 1959

Mr. AUCHINCLOSS. Mr. Speaker, there is not much more that can be said about the great loss our Nation has suffered and, indeed, the entire civilized world by the resignation of John Foster Dulles as Secretary of State, but I cannot resist the temptation to express my feelings concerning this great man, and his service to our country. I have known Foster Dulles for a number of years, and was not at all surprised that a man of his great attainments and consecration to duty should finally be recognized as the outstanding statesman that he is. He came to the service of the Government with an extraordinary mind, keen perception and knowledge of human nature, trained in the law and experienced in human relationships. He gave of these talents unstintingly and without reserve and with it all showed a determination and a spirit of courage which will always be an inspiration to everyone. The record shows clearly that he was highly respected by those who were in disagreement with him because of the incisiveness of his arguments, backed by a determination and conviction of the righteousness of his cause, he became unconquerable in the field of diplomacy. It would be hard to find any former Secretary of State with such a positive and strong personality and there is no man in the history of our country who ever even approached the same wholesome, determined and brave spirit which he has shown so conspicuously.

At the same time during this period of change, men and women everywhere who believe in the cause of freedom and justice may take heart in the knowledge that Christian Herter is a worthy successor to Foster Dulles. Practically all his life Christian Herter has been engaged in the operations of international diplomacy and political activity and because of this training he brings to the Office of Secretary of State a contribution which is unique and of great significance.

It is not often that a Secretary of State is endowed with the qualities that Mr. Herter has and his lifetime experience brings much confidence to the future handling of our international affairs. Cordell Hull was a great Secretary of State because he was a keen politician though he was not noted for his knowledge of diplomacy. Dean Acheson was blessed with an agile mind trained as a lawyer and was proficient in international law but as a politician he did not qualify at all. Even Foster Dulles, great Secretary of State that he was, never had the politician's training others have had and certainly he is not to be compared with Christian Herter in that category. The new Secretary of State was at one time a member of the State Legislature of Massachusetts and speaker of the house; a Member of the U.S. House of Representatives for 10 years; Governor for two terms of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts; an active member of former President Hoover's Food Administration in the distribution of relief after World War I. A constant student of international problems all over the world and endowed with a brilliant mind and a sterling character, he will protect the best interest of our country and will promote the cause of peace with honor throughout the world.

Schools Second to None

OF
HON. ROBERT C. BYRD
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, April 23, 1959

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, last Saturday evening our distinguished colleague, the Senator from Texas [Mr. YARBOROUGH] delivered an address on education which I feel contains an urgent message for all Americans.

The Senator was speaking before the Texas Classroom Teachers Association at Dallas, and he addressed his remarks primarily to Texas school problems and Texas school attitudes. But I believe that his words conveyed truths which apply, not only to Texas, but to our Nation as a whole.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. YARBOROUGH], who is himself a former teacher and a present member of the Senate Education Subcommittee, spoke of the educational challenge which is facing America today, and he indicated what he believes must be our approach if we are to meet that challenge.

Mr. President, in order that all of us in Congress, and all others, may be apprised of the insight and understanding of the Senator from Texas in this matter I ask unanimous consent that his address be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

SCHOOLS SECOND TO NONE

(Speech delivered by U.S. Senator RALPH YARBOROUGH at the Texas Classroom Teachers Association's annual convention banquet, Dallas, April 18, 1959)

Madam President, fellow teachers, fellow Texans, fellow Americans, you have paid me a great honor by inviting me to speak at the annual convention of your 23,000-member Texas Classroom Teachers Organization. On a broader plane, you really represent the highest ideals of all Texas classroom teachers, including those without your organization as well as those who are dues-paying members.

Vast as your influence over the next generation is, by your molding of the minds of that generation, you have not been content to leave your good works for fruition in the next generation alone. I came here in part to pay tribute to you for the privilege of working with you for the advancement of the aims and ideals of public education.

As a former classroom teacher in Henderson County public schools for 3 years and as a member of the Senate Education Subcommittee, I am deeply concerned about the progress and future of public education. I'm particularly concerned about it in Texas.

This does not mean that I am critical of you. On the contrary, the dedicated work you have done, despite inadequate pay and limited facilities, is magnificent. Thanks mainly to your devotion to duty, Texas has now, and over the past decade has generally had, better public schools than it paid for. It is a great credit to you and to our schools, that 96 percent of you—our active teachers—have earned a degree and 39 percent of you have your master's degree. Only two States, Arizona and Oklahoma, have a higher percentage of teachers who have earned degrees. Six percent of all Texans have 4 or more years of college—which ranks us 20th among the States in that category.

As a Texan I am proud that we have many outstanding schools and well qualified teachers in Texas—and that you graduate thousands of exceptionally well-educated students. But I believe we would fail in our public duty, if we did not take into account the rating of Texas public schools when compared with other States.

Our goal for Texas school children is "schools second to none." But we rank 33d, not first, in the percentage of our school-age children who are enrolled in school. Statistics show that approximately one out of every five of our school-age children is not attending school. We rank 39th, not first, in the average number of days attended per pupil enrolled in school per year. We Texans rank a poor 37th in the percent of selective service registrants disqualified by mental tests, and we rank 36th in the percent of population 25 years or older with at least 4 years of high school.

Texans—teachers, parents, and the majority of all our people—believe Texas schoolchildren should have schools "second to none."

What's more, I believe Texans can be counted on to support, financially and otherwise, efforts to strengthen our entire public school program. It is a matter of giving Texans the facts—of informing the man on the street of how, when, where, and why we need schools second to none. If we give the people the facts, Texans don't have to be sold such schools—they will demand them. But I don't believe the people of Texas will support a sales tax system to achieve these results.

A century and a quarter ago, our Texas forefathers revolted because of the failure of the General Government to establish a system of public education in Texas. Our proud State was ravaged by fire and by sword, her cities besieged, her towns burned, her heroes killed. But the right to a system of public education was won. Are we, the inheritors of those rights, to settle for anything less than the very best public education system for our children? Texans will not.

It is obvious that we have a long way to go to secure adequate funds for schools second to none. Your pay as teachers is completely inconsistent with the great responsibility that our democratic society places upon you. Within a few years schoolteachers' pay at elementary, high school and college levels should be doubled.

Proud, wealthy Texas is paying its classroom teachers an average of only $4,410 yearly, considerably below the national average. This is criminal neglect because the student is the casualty in the long run. As your representative in the Senate, I am working for substantial pay increases for you and for all teachers; raises in keeping with the dignity and responsibility of your task in and to society. Texas ranks 26th among the States in teacher pay. On the average, your pay is estimated to be $1,550 a year less than California teachers' salaries. We have a shortage in Texas alone of more than 2,000 teachers this year.

Many Texans, from widowed mothers to nationally known college professors, have written or phoned me of their shock and indignation at the action of the board of regents of our Texas State teachers colleges in refusing to permit students in five Texas State colleges to borrow funds from the Federal Government under the generous loan provisions of the National Defense Education Act of 1958.

The National Defense Education Act of 1958 was designed to start us on the road to higher educational achievement. The five colleges whose students were denied opportunities to seek that higher training were all established by the State of Texas to train teachers. The governing board of those colleges voted against the students, against the people of Texas, against the purpose for which it was created, and against its duty.

The regents of these five schools—Sam Houston State Teachers College, Southwest Texas State Teachers College, Stephen F. Austin, East Texas State, and Sul Ross College, have officially certified that they need $195,333 this year for student loans, these loans which bear no interest so long as the students are in college. The regents have turned their backs on the colleges they were appointed to serve. One of the great functions of higher education is to train teachers, who in turn, do so much to mold the character of the Nation.

The board has thrown up a roadblock against that training. Its order may jeopardize the opportunity of many Texas youths to continue college. Its order reminds me of a game warden caught shooting fawns, and out of season at that.

In denying these students their loans, on the specious grounds that it is Federal money, the board has shown a distrust of our Government unworthy of an official who has taken an oath to uphold that Government.

You cannot make democracy work by shooting holes in the American flag.

The board of regents of these colleges has made a decision which I would not want on my conscience. If a single student drops out of a single one of these schools for lack of funds, the regents should be held accountable. Ironically, one of the colleges which the regents prohibited from participating in the loan program, has this statement of purpose printed on its letterhead:

"Founded to promote the advancement of the profession of teaching. Dedicated to the cause of better schools. Devoted to the welfare of children and youth."

It is my sincere hope that the board of regents of Texas State teachers colleges, for the good of the students, will reconsider its position on this matter. A total of $21,758 has been reserved out of the first moneys for the five colleges involved and more will be appropriated. If the regents finally deny this aid to their students, I shall make every effort to see that these funds are apportioned to other Texas students in other Texas colleges so that they will not be diverted to other States.

The Hale-Aikin committee study shows that in addition to higher teachers salaries, we need in Texas 3,373 new classrooms now for our rapidly increasing school-age population, and we will need 17,284 more classrooms by 1963. And in the Nation as a whole, we need 140,000 new classrooms and need 135,000 more teachers now and the need is critical. Recent disasters have revealed that many classrooms are virtually firetraps that could easily turn into deathtraps for teachers and pupils.

To me the question is when, not where, we are going to get the money to meet these needs. The time is now. Educational opportunities missed by a child this year, may never return. Most Texans agree that we must and will maintain local control of our schools. We feel that wherever possible, schools should be supported by local funds. Where local funds are not available, the State should meet the need. Where the State either cannot or will not meet the responsibility of giving Texas children superior schools, we should avail ourselves of Federal funds. We should be for all aid to education because the need for more funds in the field of education is so critical that revenues from local districts, cities, States and the Federal Government, all are required.

From all tax and private sources combined we spend only 4 percent of our gross national product on the education of our youth—not enough in today's competitive world.

We should also consider that Federal assistance to education might prove to be a far more preferable and fairer solution to our school fund problems than raising revenues through a State general sales tax.

It is time too that we dispel the myth that Federal assistance to schools has meant in the past, or will mean in the future, Federal control of schools. Despite the often-voiced fears from some quarters, Federal control of schools has never resulted from acts passed by Congress. And the acts pending in Congress expressly prohibit any Federal control.

In colonial days, schools were generally supported by the townships in New England, privately in the South, while the Middle Atlantic States had a combination system of church-supported schools, town schools, and private schools. There were no State colleges as such, though Massachusetts had established Harvard with public money in the 1630's.

Federal aid is no new-fangled, New Deal, socialistic innovation. Such claims are based on ignorance of our history.

In 1790, the Father of the Country, George Washington, in his message to the First Congress of the United States said:

"Nor am I less persuaded that you will agree with me in the opinion that there is nothing which can better deserve your patronage than the promotion of science and literature. Knowledge is in every country the surest basis of public happiness. * * *

"Whether this desirable object will be best promoted by affording aids to seminaries of learning already established, by the institution of a national university, or by any other expedients will be well worthy of a place in the deliberations of the Legislature."

I have received some letters saying Federal aid to education would be unconstitutional. Well, George Washington was President of the Constitutional Convention which drafted the Constitution, and less than 1 year after it became effective he asked for Federal aid to education under it. I believe that George Washington knew as much about what the Constitution embraced as any modern opponent to a better educational system.

In 1862, the Congress passed the Morrill Land Grant College Act, setting aside Federal lands for the support of agricultural and engineering colleges—such as Texas A. & M. This is one example of Federal aid. And Texas A. & M. was the first public tax-supported institution of higher learning to open its doors in Texas.

Other examples of Federal aid without Federal control of education are schools built by the WPA in the thirties; educational benefits under the GI bill of rights, which I am working now to extend; grants-in-aid and research and fellowship programs such as those under the National Defense Education Act of 1958, which I cosponsored; public school milk and lunch programs which I am working to protect; funds for vocational education teachers, and others. Surely no reasonable person could say that these worthy programs have led to Federal domination of our schools.

The people should be informed of the history of American education. The principle of local financial support of schools grew out of the economic, political, and social ferment of the Jacksonian period during the struggle for universal public education. The truth is that local financial support of schools is not based upon any hallowed principle of democratic freedom, but is based to a great extent upon the reluctance of citizens of one community to pay taxes to help educate the children of another. This reluctance is understandable, but hardly worth considering in the light of our efforts to provide Texas youngsters with schools that are second to none.

I am old enough to remember when State aid to schools in Texas was begun on a large scale—many said it was socialistic and would destroy local control. Well, we are still electing trustees, and they are still hiring the teachers.

The demand of our democratic society for a higher degree of educational excellence grows with each passing day.

Some people seem to think that we can't afford to offer maximum educational opportunities in accordance with the inherent capabilities to all our youth. I say we can't afford to offer less. We cannot afford either having only half of our Texans educated, or having all Texans half-educated.

We hear a lot of talk these days about having to make a choice between quantity and quality in educational programs. It seems doubtful to me that any choice exists, for we must have both quantity and quality to survive. In this complex age of scientific advancement, we must have excellently trained specialists. But there certainly is no less demand for a generally informed people grounded in the humanities, who are prepared to make intelligent democratic decisions.

Like Ulysses in Tennyson's beautiful poem, our spirits must yearn—

"To follow knowledge like a sinking star
Beyond the utmost bound of human thought."

Basically, the cold war now raging between democracy and communism around the world is a struggle for the minds of men. Enlightenment has always been free men's bulwark against tyranny. Education is the foundation stone of democracy, and it is an ever-increasing factor in the standard of living each man and his family can enjoy. Aristotle, when asked how much educated men were superior to those uneducated, answered, "As much as the living are to the dead." We cannot, we must not, and we will not continue to deny all our students an education of the first class.

Mass education of all the people, once an American monopoly, is fast coming to the whole world. We can maintain our leadership only by moving faster and working harder for educational progress than other countries now turning their efforts to mass education.

The parent, the teacher, the politician must all make up their minds that easy courses, little discipline, and stinted funds for education will never add up to high educational standards. They are more likely to produce mediocrity at a time when we must strive for educational excellence.

Never before in the history of man have the talents and the specially developed abilities of educated men been in more urgent demand. Never have the opportunities for education, thinking, free men been so great. The next 10, 20, or 30 years will tell whether this Nation produces the large numbers of high-caliber citizens it so badly needs.

In the words of Abraham Lincoln, "We cannot escape history. * * * We will be remembered in spite of ourselves. No personal significance or insignificance can spare one or the other of us. The fiery trial through which we pass will light us down, in honor or dishonor, to the latest generation."

Here in Texas, where our State is making vast industrial and population growths, the need for more and better educated men and women is particularly great. We must meet this demand wherever we can by preparing our boys and girls for key roles in Texas destiny.

No other person has so important a role as you in meeting this challenge. The kind of greatness that Texas and this Nation produces in future years depends to a very large extent upon the learning and the values you will instill in our youth through our educational system. There is no more important job in the democratic way of life.

Education is the golden key that unlocks the barriers of poverty and prejudice, inequality and injustice. You are the keeper of the key which will give our boys and girls their greatest impetus in the pursuit of happiness.

You have done a remarkable job in the past, and I look forward to continue working with you toward our goal of Texas schools "second to none."

God bless you for your devotion to the cause to which you have dedicated your lives.

Passover

OF
HON. LEONARD G. WOLF
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 23, 1959

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, today is the first day of Passover. It is celebrated by the Jews for it marks their deliverance from Egypt by Moses. Through the generations the Passover has taken on even greater significance. It has become a solemn reminder of the struggle of a people for intellectual and religious freedom against oppressors whether their names be Pharaoh, Torquemada, Hitler, or Stalin. Passover should be a solemn reminder to all of us whether we are Christian or Jew to fight against oppression and bigotry while championing the cause of freedom, equality, and justice for all men regardless of race, creed, or color.

Of Men and Marble

OF
HON. FRANK THOMPSON, JR.
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 23, 1959

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, our colleague the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. UDALL] reports regularly to his constituents on the activities of Congress as well as on other matters, and these thought-provoking reports are widely quoted.

His most recent report cited the tasteful and impressive memorials to Presidents Thomas Jefferson and Abraham Lincoln, and the new bell tower memorial to Senator Robert A. Taft as examples of what can be achieved in the way of honoring our statesmen and leaders.

He made the excellent point that the fashion in memorials is changing. It is, indeed, and perhaps we can look forward to memorials having utility as well as beauty. Let them speak to the living about persons and events which are a living part of our Nation's heritage.

I include this challenging report for the information of my colleagues:

OF MEN AND MARBLE

(By Representative STEWART L. UDALL)

Spring is here, and for a change thoughts turn to other than legislative things.

As with most national capitals, Washington is a city of statues and memorials. They look down on the passerby from the parks and public places, and even Washington's famous L'Enfant traffic circles are dominated by generals astride horses, or half-forgotten statesmen.

According to the Library of Congress the last official inventory (in 1937) disclosed that 192 statues, monuments and memorials dot the Washington landscape. It is a safe guess then that there are now well over two hundred, as patriotic societies and zealous friends are constantly hatching new plans which keep the sculptors busy.

In fact, next week will mark the dedication of a memorial to the late Senator Robert A. Taft of Ohio who died in 1953. This newest tribute in marble is not a statue but a bell tower, and is located a stone's throw from the Senate.

If the Taft bell tower is testimony that statues have gone out of fashion, one can be thankful. There are few Washington statues I have seen which do credit to art. Daniel Chester French's noble figure which dominates the Lincoln Memorial is one of the exceptions, but most Washington statuary is poorly conceived both as a work of art and a personal tribute to its subject.

I suppose the practice of erecting monuments to distinguished citizens came to its full flower during the Roman Empire. Earlier of course, the Greeks executed great works of public art but for the most part these were devoted to abstract conceptions of beauty or truth and were uncorrupted by personal taints. But the desire of men for personal glory burst forth under the Romans when every Emperor and his lieutenants sought immortality in marble, and their practices continue to dominate us today.

Thus, America is following ancient tradition by cluttering its capital with statues of the great, near-great, and forgotten who have helped make its history. Nevertheless, I have wondered lately whether we shouldn't pause to reconsider the means we choose of perpetuating our esteem for distinguished citizens.

I may be wrong, but it seems to me that if we would adopt a simple rule of thumb the whole problem would solve itself. This week I introduced a resolution which provides that no statue or memorial shall be erected in the system of Capital Parks to commemorate an individual or event until at least 50 years have elapsed.

A man's contemporaries are notoriously bad judges of his place in history. Proportion comes only with the passage of time, and it is an act of foolish presumption for any generation to pass judgment on its leaders.

It is highly significant, I think, that the Lincoln Memorial was finally dedicated nearly 60 years after his death. We have all gained by the fact that his contemporaries did not have the impulse to rush out and erect a lesser tribute. Nor was it an accident that the other superb Washington memorial—Jefferson's, nestled beside the Tidal Basin amid an arc of Japanese cherry trees—assumed form nearly 125 years after his death.

My point is that those memorials which have the most meaning—and artistic integrity—were conceived and carried out by posterity, and not personal friends. I mean no dishonor to the generals and political figures whose busts dominate the landscape here, when I suggest that their memories would be better served if a later generation selected the means and place of honor.

After all, we cannot escape history and no marble edifice will add 1 cubit to the stature of the good and great of our country.

Perhaps the wisest words ever spoken on this subject were uttered by the Roman Senator Cato (apparently in protest against the fad of his day) when he said: "I had rather men should ask why my statue is not set up, than why it is."

High Taxes Cramp Business Growth

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALVIN M. BENTLEY OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 23, 1959

Mr. BENTLEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I wish to include the following article by our colleague, THOMAS B. CURTIS, of Missouri, which appeared in the April issue of Nation's Business. Mr. CURTIS is a distinguished Member of the House Ways and Means Committee and I believe his article will be most interesting and helpful to all Members of the House.

HIGH TAXES CRAMP BUSINESS GROWTH—LAWMAKER SAYS TAX SYSTEM, IF NOT SOON REFORMED, COULD CAUSE NEW RECESSION

(A Nation's Business interview with Representative THOMAS B. CURTIS)

High taxes are stunting America's economic growth.

That's the opinion of U.S. Representative THOMAS B. CURTIS, Republican of Missouri and an influential member of the tax-writing House Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. CURTIS, interviewed this month by Nation's Business, says that unless we move soon to reform our Federal tax system we face increasing unemployment and the prospect of a fourth postwar recession in the early 1960's. He is optimistic that such reform can be achieved despite strong opposition in Congress. His views are shared by a growing number of Members of the 86th Congress.

A Representative since 1950 from Missouri's Second Congressional District (St. Louis), Mr. CURTIS also serves on the Joint Economic Committee.

Following are the questions asked of Mr. CURTIS, and his answers:

"Congressman CURTIS, do you believe the present tax structure is damaging economic growth and progress?"

"I certainly do. I feel that the last recession to a large degree came as a result of our tax structure.

"To illustrate: The cutback in economic growth seemed to lie in two areas: business inventory and plans for business expansion.

"Much of the cutback seemed to be in small and growing businesses which rely heavily on retained earnings. Small businesses have faced—in fact, all American business has faced—a situation where our Federal tax structure, corporate income tax, plus inflation, has resulted in a capital levy.

"To illustrate, depreciation allowances in the corporate income tax permit a business to take only the original cost of a piece of machinery, not the replacement cost.

"Say a machine cost $100,000 in 1940. You are only allowed $100,000 depreciation, and yet, because of inflation, to replace that machine you need $200,000. So American industry has to have additional capital for replacement, let alone for growth.

"This is one area where I see the Federal tax structure impeding economic growth.

"The second area involves the impact of inflation.

"The point is that our local communities, school districts, sewer districts, and so on, depend essentially upon real estate taxes for their revenues. The real estate tax in turn is based upon real estate assessments. Most real estate assessments in any county were put on the books before the inflated dollar.

"The cost of wages and materials that the sewer districts, school districts, and municipalities have to pay for has gone up. Their revenue has not gone up the same way. They can't adjust it by increasing the rate of the real estate tax, because all of the new real estate that has gone on the books since 1950 is measured in the inflated dollar, and you would unfairly tax them.

"One way out—although politically difficult to do—is to reassess all real estate.

"The second way, unfortunately the easier of the two, is to ask the Federal Government to help finance community facilities. Communities have come to Washington because the tax structure impedes their growth."

"Do you believe that the Federal tax rate can be so high that increased rates mean less revenue?"

"Yes. I think this exists in many instances in our present tax structure. For instance, the $10.50 a gallon tax on liquor, in my judgment, is largely responsible for the increase in bootlegging. If we would reduce the rate, I suspect we would get more revenue, because we would be cutting into the bootlegging industry, which pays no taxes.

"Such examples are easy to understand. I feel that the rates in our personal income tax and our corporate tax also are beyond the point of diminishing return.

"Rates are so high that they destroy incentive. A great many business decisions are made, not on the basis of good economic judgment, but upon what the tax effect will be.

"To the extent that this is done we are interfering with normal growth and normal operation of the private sector of our economy.

"I might also say this: A 52-percent corporate tax means that the Government is the major partner and business the minor partner.

"If we just reduced the corporate rate to, say, 49 percent, where business would be the major partner, we would have more business decisions made on the basis of sound business judgment."

"Broadening the tax base has been suggested in connection with tax reform. What would this involve?"

"There are many ways of broadening the tax base. The basic way is to have private enterprise performing the services and manufacturing the goods for our people. That is an important point. We have seen Government going into business in a great fashion in recent years.

"When the Federal Government goes into business, it withdraws an operation from the tax base. In 1929, to illustrate, there was $9 in private investment for each dollar of Federal investment. That ratio has declined to a little less than 5½ to 1.

"But that private capital investment is essentially the tax base. If we could broaden the base back to 9, let's say, we could have a tax rate of 3 and a tax take of 27, but if you have a base of only 5½, you have to have a tax rate of more than 5 to produce the same take.

"That's one way of broadening the tax base.

"Another way is by plugging the tax loopholes. Whether a tax exemption is a loophole or a legitimate exemption is a question. The word loophole actually begs the question, but I think there are areas of tax favoritism. If we equalize the tax burden, and eliminate favoritism, we will broaden the base.

"Furthermore—and I am happy that the administration has made a recommendation—some methods of doing business seem to be escaping full tax burden. For instance, the cooperative method. I am not talking about the small farm cooperatives; I am talking about these big co-ops that have gone way beyond any concept of the little farm co-op. The co-op method of doing business certainly should not receive the tax preference it does over the corporate method of doing business.

"That would be another way of broadening the base."

"Would broadening the base raise revenue?"

"Yes, because we immediately apply the going rate to the base. I think we can compute tax revenue in a simple formula: It's tax base times tax rate times what I call a collectibility factor, and it's an important concept that has to be put into the formula.

"Our tax collection system is essentially a voluntary one. Our people cooperate in paying taxes. But when the tax rates become burdensome, we find this factor of collectibility becoming less and less.

"So we gain from increasing the base and reducing the rate, and collectibility is increased."

"Will more business incentive be created if the base is broadened?"

"Yes, because there is more equity. People are willing to put up with burdens if they think everyone else is carrying the same burdens. That bears on incentive."

"If rates are not reduced, do you believe economic growth will be stunted?"

"I think economic growth is being stunted.

"In Western Europe since 1952 the rate of economic growth has been almost twice that of the United States. I believe our tax structure is the primary villain.

"I would predict that we are going to have more of this slowing down unless we revise our tax structure."

"Do you see recession as possible in the near future?"

"Not in the near future. It is likely that 1959 and 1960 will be the most prosperous years we have had. But I see in all of this the seeds of future recessions because of the burden being placed upon incentive and capital formation.

"Furthermore, I see the seeds of more inflation. As we have more inflation, the impact I have previously described upon business investment—replacement of capital assets—and upon municipalities in areas important to economic growth will be felt.

"I might mention a third area that is causing stagnation. That is this so-called locked-in investment. It's a result of inflation. A holding of common stocks worth, say, $100,000 in 1940 is now worth $200,000 in the deflated dollar. If a person sells, he is subject to a 25-percent capital gain, although it's a fictitious gain. As a result, people do not sell. This investment should be turned over constantly as individuals decide what is a better investment.

"If we are going to have more inflation, locked-in investment will be further accentuated."

"Does the high tax rate contribute to the unemployment rate?"

"There is no question that it does.

"Jobs come from economic growth. When there is economic stagnation, you don't have new jobs. Furthermore, as we advance technologically, and can do more with fewer people, we must find new jobs for those who are displaced.

"To do that, we need capital investment. The only place we get new products, really, is from money invested in research and development. That means more jobs all along the line."

"Are taxes being used for purposes other than raising revenues?"

"Yes, and to me it's one of the most dangerous things in our tax structure. The higher the tax rate, the more economic effect it has.

"Through high tax rates you can actually control the economy. It's a great temptation for lawmakers to use the tax structure for producing supposedly desired social objectives.

"I see more of that every day in the Ways and Means Committee, where we should be thinking primarily in terms of revenue."

"Would you predict whether taxes will be used more and more as regulatory devices?"

"If I predicted that, I would be saying that my own work will not be successful, because I am fighting it. But let me put it this way: The forces I see in motion to bring about the use of the tax structure for regulatory reasons are strong. Unless more people take the view I do, it's going to be used more and more to regulate."

"Would many men in Government like to keep tax rates high to hold on to the tax power to regulate?"

"I feel that some would. I don't think they are a large group, but they are an astute group.

"By increasing the tax rate, you can stunt growth and the private sector of the economy is unable to administer to the people's social needs. That in turn creates pressure for the Government to perform these services. As Government does more for the people, more taxes are needed. This is a vicious circle."

"These people would like to see the tax base narrowed?"

"I think they demonstrate they would prefer to see it narrowed. Any time they can get the Federal Government to do something that private enterprise was doing before, they will do so.

"The tendency of this group is to go to the Government first to solve problems, instead of trying to see if we can solve them through the private sector.

"If we can do the job through the private sector, we keep it in the tax base. If we do it through Government we remove it from the tax base and at the same time have to raise revenue to meet the cost of those social needs."

"Can you expand this idea of using taxes to control the economy?"

"Let me give you a good example.

"During and after the Korean war certain defense industries were granted certificates of necessity to let them write off the cost of new facilities at a faster-than-usual rate. What would a certificate of necessity mean if the tax rates were low? With the tax rates high, to be able to amortize some new equipment rapidly is of tremendous value. So just by using certificates of necessity you can funnel tremendous sums into a given area or take them away.

"Maybe the certificates of necessity are examples of things where the immediate economic results are good. On the other hand, clearly they illustrate the use of the tax structure to obtain what the Government thinks is needed."

"If, in the judgment of these people, the GNP is expanding at a rate which they consider too fast, all they have to do is to raise the taxes and slow it down?"

"That's right.

"If it is going too slow, they can lower rates and speed it up. In fact, they are before our Joint Economic Committee all the time urging exactly that. Last year they urged that we give tax reductions across the board.

"I didn't think that tax reduction was a good idea at the time, because they were thinking of tax reduction in terms of the consumer dollar. I said the way you get jobs for people is tax reduction in the investment dollar area, putting money into economic growth.

"If we wanted to help the people who were hurt in the recession, we would have been thinking in terms of tax relief that would create jobs. I sponsored a small business tax bill that would have done exactly that. My bill said that the only basis upon which small business could get a tax credit was to put that money into economic expansion, which meant more jobs."

"Will increased taxes on insurance companies retard their growth?"

"That is the key issue, in my judgment, particularly as we have the Federal Government going into the same field of providing for the retirement and disability of our people, through social security.

"If we stunt the insurance industry through taxes heavier than the industry can bear, it cannot go ahead in providing for the retirement and disability of our people, the premiums charged the people will have to be too high. That will create pressures on Congress to provide protection through the Treasury."

"Will revenue raised in this manner be significant?

"Yes. We are talking about possibly increasing the tax on life insurance companies from about $300 million to more than $500 million.

"This would have a far-reaching impact on the insurance companies, but no particularly significant impact on total Federal revenue.

"But this $200 million could ultimately cost the Treasury more than we would take in.

"Pressures already are great on the Federal Government to expand and increase social security benefits. If the insurance companies don't continue to expand, the pressures will be such that the Federal Government will extend social security benefits.

"Another thing—and this is a collateral issue but nonetheless important—the States have been permitted to use this industry as a method of raising revenue. States have been getting almost $300 million out of insurance companies through premium payment taxes. I have urged the Treasury Department and the staff of the Ways and Means Committee to bear that in mind, because we have to figure the total tax burden that we place upon any industry, not just that at the Federal level."

"Do you consider social security in competition with the insurance companies?"

"Yes, and the more we raise the wage ceiling on which the social security tax is levied, the more it gets into the field that our private insurance companies are in."

"Do you expect this kind of competition to increase?"

"I hope that it will decrease, but the pressures are such that it will probably increase.

"Not enough people recognize these dangers.

"The challenge is certainly there. In my judgment it does no good to talk about belief in private enterprise unless a person is willing to get down to details, analyze what private enterprise is, and then fight for it."

"Do you expect social security benefits to be broadened further?"

"Yes. I think there is sufficient pressure in this Congress to do it. I hope if we increase benefits we can increase social security taxes. This is the only way we can keep the social security fund solvent. I regret to say the history of the Congress, though, isn't so good. You will find only two or three instances where Congressmen had the courage to increase the social security tax as they increased the benefits. As the tax gets higher and citizens begin to feel the bite of it, Congress is going to be even more reluctant to vote increases.

"I question whether we really can be complacent about the solvency of the social security fund.

"Inflation also robs the social security fund. Therefore, all people who are counting on social security in their old age need to resist inflationary pressures."

"For the years ahead, do you expect the user tax concept to be broadened?"

"Yes, it is being broadened. Increasing user taxes I see as a good method of handling some of the cost of Government. After all wherever it is feasible we should have the people who use a particular Government service pay for the use. If we can increase user charges we will then be able to reduce the general tax rates."

"How do you think Government corporations and institutions such as TVA ought to be financed?"

"I question whether many of them should be in existence. TVA started out as a flood-control project involving dam construction. Some hydroelectric power would be available from the dams, and it would be economic waste not to use it.

"Then it was found that hydroelectric power fluctuates seasonally. Because power users have to have a constant source of power, TVA requested permission to build steam plants to supplement hydroelectric power. Now we find that 70 percent of the power generated in the TVA is from steam.

"Here is a good example of the Federal Government being in a business that is not in the tax base.

"I am suspicious of any Government corporation and feel that the existence of each one should be openly and fully justified.

"But you asked me how they should be financed. I suspect that few of them should be financed other than in the private sector of the economy."

"Do you see any danger in the use of earmarked taxes?"

"I see a grave danger. We think highways are important, so we earmark taxes for them. We think retirement of our people is important, so we earmark social security taxes for them. We think unemployment compensation is an important social function, so we earmark taxes for that.

"You can go down the list of things that are important in our society, and start earmarking taxes, and you will end up without sufficient taxes for the one thing we know our Federal Government must provide—adequate defense. If we keep on with the earmarked tax formula, we can easily get to the point where we will have inadequate funds for defense.

"Although I said that I thought user taxes were good, let's not forget that it's easy to convert a user tax into an earmarked tax—I shouldn't say user tax; user charge is a better expression."

"What principal danger do you see in the growing Federal debt?"

"The principal danger is its inflationary effect. The Federal debt is additional credit imposed upon our economy. It simply means more money, and if you have excess money in a given economy, you are going to have inflation."

"Is inflation inevitable?"

"No. I think that proper fiscal policies can keep inflation from coming about. I think we can have stability, but I think the only way to achieve it is through proper Federal budget and debt management. We are going to have to pay off some of the Federal debt. It is too large now, and it is the primary inflationary force in our economy today."

"Can we pay off some of it in the foreseeable future?"

"The budget we are considering now is based upon the prospect that 1959 or 1960 will be the most prosperous years in history. Yet we are not reducing the debt.

"Surely if we can't do better than that in our most prosperous years, we will have deficit financing again when we get a less prosperous year. The only way to reduce the debt is to put a certain amount in the budget each year to be paid off."

"Would reduction of the corporate tax rate bring in more revenue?"

"I am convinced that if we reduced it, say, to 49 percent, it would increase the revenue. It would increase incentive. More business expenditures would be based on economics than tax consideration."

"Would anything be gained by granting tax exemptions for retained earnings plowed back into capital investment?"

"Very much, particularly in the area of our smaller and medium-sized businesses.

"We get our basic economic growth from small and medium businesses. Traditionally they finance growth through retained earnings.

"If we will permit our businesses to retain a certain portion—not all of it, just a tax credit for what they put back into economic growth—we are going to create more jobs. That is what economic growth is.

"I suggest a third area which is almost as important. Stop uneconomic mergers and acquisitions, where big companies buy up small companies—to a large degree because of the tax structure, and because these smaller concerns, through their inability to finance growth, are helpless.

"I am satisfied that this would do more to stimulate healthy economic growth and bring in more Federal revenue than eliminating the tax loopholes, important as that is, too."

"Do you expect Congress to grant tax deductions for the cost of higher education?"

"I hope so. The budget already includes an expense item for Federal aid to education for loans, scholarships, and so forth. We are already spending the money. I suggest: Instead of the Federal Government spending it and setting up a bureaucracy to figure out how to spend it, let's grant a tax deduction to families willing to send their children to college. It doesn't matter from the standpoint of a balanced budget whether we decrease income by $200 million, or whether we increase expenditures by $200 million.

"I suggest you get more education from allowing individuals to spend the $200 million than from letting the Government spend it."

"Will the depreciation laws be liberalized?"

"I am afraid they won't. They should be, in my judgment. We need liberalization for two reasons. First, the impact of inflation is still heavy. Actually we have a capital levy assessed against American business. Second, in today's rapid technological advancement, a machine is replaced not because it's worn out but because a better machine is developed."

"Will laws involving expenditures for research and development be liberalized?"

"No. I wish they would be. The Federal Government is spending increasing sums directly for research and development. I suggest a more efficient way of spending money is to grant tax deductions for research and development."

"Do you expect the principle of tax averaging to be extended to individuals?"

"No, but it should be. That would again help economic growth."

"Will the tax-exemption features of retirement programs be extended to self-employed individuals?"

"I'm afraid not. I regard this as a short-sighted attitude toward all of these proposals for letting the people rather than the Federal Government spend the money.

"There is tax exemption for corporations providing for the retirement of people, but this same privilege is not extended to individuals who work for themselves. If this unequal process is continued, we will badly damage the professions."

"What is the prospect for tax reform in the foreseeable future?"

"It won't be good until, in my judgment, more people realize that taxes have economic effects, and that we must evaluate our tax laws in terms of economics. We cannot keep the short-range view of looking at specific taxes and saying our revenue depends on the tax rate.

"The tax formula, I repeat, is revenue as the result of the tax rate, times the tax base, times the factor of collectibility. If more people will only agree that this is the formula for revenue, we might get somewhere toward a real fundamental tax revision.

"I am optimistic that as time goes on more people will understand the basic reasons for economic growth. Then we can move toward real progress."

Oil-Import Restrictions Should Be Removed

OF
HON. VICTOR L. ANFUSO
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 23, 1959

Mr. ANFUSO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am inserting the text of a letter which I am this day addressing to the President concerning the restrictions recently imposed on the importation of oil products, its possible effects on our business community, and a request that the restrictions be withdrawn.

In the same connection, I am also inserting the text of a resolution adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of Greenpoint, which is a part of my congressional district in Brooklyn. The letter and the resolution read as follows:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., April 23, 1959.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I am writing you in connection with the recent mandatory quota placed by the U.S. Government on the importation of oil and oil products into this country.

The district which I have the honor to represent in the U.S. Congress is located in Brooklyn, N.Y., and is largely an industrial and commercial area. Many of the industries in the district are dependent on reasonable prices of oil products, which makes it possible for them to compete in the commercial markets and to stay in business.

The action taken in setting a quota on imports of oil products from foreign countries, while it is aimed to aid our domestic oil suppliers, actually means higher prices for oil and oil products for our refineries, for our industrial and commercial firms, and ultimately for the great masses of American consumers.

That is not all, however. It further means that many of the smaller firms, such as those located in my district, will no longer be able to compete in the open markets and will be forced to shut down operations. Needless to say that such a situation would be most calamitous, since it would throw out of work thousands of people and seriously impair our economy, at a time when we can least afford it.

Business people in my district are very much disturbed over the matter. Their employees are uneasy regarding their future economic security. This type of fear and uneasiness may result in irreparable damage to our economy if steps are not taken in time to improve it or to remove the causes of it.

In the light of the situation and the ensuing difficulties, Mr. President, I urge you to reconsider the acton taken by the Government and to withdraw the mandatory restrictions on oil imports in the interests of the Nation's economy and security.

Respectfully yours,

VICTOR L. ANFUSO,
Member of Congress.

RESOLUTION BY THE GREENPOINT CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

Whereas the Government of the United States has placed a mandatory quota on the importation of crude and various oil products into the United States, we would submit the following for consideration:

Greenpoint is part of a large industrial and commercial area and contains many industries dependent on favorable fuel costs, one of the largest being a refinery operated by the Mobil Oil Co. which employs more than 500 individuals, and which is dependent on imported crude if it is to compete with other refineries which enjoy the advantage of lower processing fuel costs.

Many of these industrial enterprises are engaged in trade with many friendly nations of the world.

The difficulty and the cost of discovering and developing the oil resources of this country have been steadily increasing.

Trade with friendly nations and the industrial development which it stimulates abroad stands as our main bulwark against the Soviet trade offenses and must be regarded as one of the main pillars of this country's long term national security.

Many retail petroleum products consumers in eastern States will be subjected to a spiral of increasing costs as eastern U.S. refineries are forced to seek crude supplies from domestic areas.

It is ridiculous to consider that oil from Canada is less essential to the national security than oil from U.S. fields across the border.

Federal regulation of a free enterprise industry destroys the main strength of the United States by adopting measures of compulsion paralleling those used by the very countries which are threatening our national security.

The provision in the mandatory imports control requiring surveillance of prices by Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization will lead to substitution of compulsion for the free market choice at competitive prices by consumers.

Be it resolved, That the Greenpoint Chamber of Commerce is opposed to the principle of mandatory quotas reducing to low levels the importation of oil and oil products, and requests immediate reconsideration and withdrawal of the mandatory provisions so that refiners may conform to the ideals of optimum economics and of the true national security in their use of domestic and foreign crudes.

Statement of Postmaster General Arthur E. Summerfield Before the House Post Office and Civil Service Subcommittee Investigating the Mailing of Obscene and Pornographic Material, April 23, 1959

OF
HON. KATHARINE ST. GEORGE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 23, 1959

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement by Postmaster General Arthur E. Summerfield:

I deeply appreciate the opportunity and the courtesy of this committee for its invitation to appear at this opening session of the first public hearings and inquiry into the very serious matter of the use of the U.S. mails in the wholesale promotion and conduct of mail order business in obscene and pornographic materials.

Certainly this is not only a matter of joint concern and responsibility, but it is one of vital importance to all decent Americans—particularly the parents of teenage children.

The Post Office Department is gratified that Chairman MURRAY of the House Post Office and Civil Service Committee has appointed this subcommittee composed of such able members and headed by a Congressman possessing the sensitivity and good judgment of Representative KATHRYN E. GRANAHAN, to inquire into this important subject.

It is my deep conviction—frequently expressed to individual members of this committee, religious and educational leaders, newspaper editors, and citizen groups that one of the most serious moral and social problems in the United States today is the multi-million-dollar mail order traffic in obscenity.

The records show quite clearly that the Post Office Department, over the years, has diligently tried to keep the mails clear of indecent matter, even though it has been subjected frequently to attack and ridiculed by those who hope to profit personally from unrestricted mailings, or by those who, confusing liberty with license, unwitingly give them assistance.

Ruthless mail order merchants in filth are violating the homes of the Nation in defiance of the National Government. They are callously dumping into the hands of our children, through our mail boxes at home, unordered lewd material, as well as samples soliciting the sale of even more objectionable pictures, slides, films and related filth. Unquestionably, these large, defiant barons of obscenity are contributing to the alarming increase in juvenile delinquency, as many noted authorities have publicly observed on repeated occasions.

Complaints which are flooding the Post Office Department at the rate of at least 50,000 annually come from leading clergymen, parent-teachers' associations, high school principals, college presidents, newspaper editors, and alarmed parents by the thousands. All are appalled by the social blight which every American citizen wants stamped out, and which the Post Office Department is determined will be stamped out.

As I am sure this committee knows, Congress first saw fit to enact legislation March 3, 1865, making it a Federal offense to mail matter of obscene nature. An expanded version of this basic law was embodied in the great Postal Reorganization and Codification Act of June 8, 1872. These were criminal laws. In each of these legislative actions the Post Office Department has lent its fullest support.

Since World War II, commercialized pornography has reached an alarming intensity within the confines of certain geographical areas of this country. It is estimated that $500 million is realized annually in mail order pornography and obscenity.

There appear to be two basic reasons for the increasing volume of filth in the mails. First, the tremendous profits realized from a relatively small capital investment; and second, the very broad definition of obscenity handed down by certain courts, including those in certain metropolitan areas—notably Los Angeles and New York, where most of the mail-order business in obscenity and pornography originates.

These liberal rulings have established, over a period of time, virtual sanctuaries in which dealers in obscenity have operated with impunity and in defiance of the Post Office Department's best efforts to bar their use of the mails or bring them to justice.

As this committee well knows, prior to last year, controlling decisions of the courts held that prosecutions under the pertinent statutes could be effected only in the district where the office of mailing is located. As this committee further knows, and as the legislative record will show, the Post Office Department strongly urged for the past several years the enactment of legislation which would grant prosecutive venue at intermediate offices and offices of address, where the actual damage undoubtedly occurs. Such legislation in the form of an amendment to section 1461, title 18, U.S.C., was passed by the 85th Congress and signed into law by President Eisenhower.

We are convinced that this new legislation provides an effective weapon for dealing with those dealers in filth who have heretofore operated with little interruption and with comparative security from certain large cities.

The Post Office Department is pressing the use of this new legislation to the fullest possible extent. The first case presented following passage of the amended legislation was at Boise, Idaho, and related to mailings made in California and Oregon, addressed for delivery at Grace, Idaho. The offenders, a man and his wife, each received a 10-year prison sentence and fine. Other cases of similar nature are now pending before U.S. attorneys from whom positive responses have been received.

In order that this committee and the public as well may be fully informed of the fact that the Department has been alert to its responsibilities, and has been bending every effort to meet the challenge of those who use the mails to corrupt, I should like to call your attention to the fact that during fiscal year 1958, postal inspectors conducted 4,000 separate investigations relating to the mailing of obscene and pornographic matter and caused the arrest of 293 persons. This is an increase of 45 percent over the previous year and is the highest of record. Investigations and prosecutions during the current year to date are substantially higher than those of last year. During the same period of time, fiscal year 1958, the General Counsel issued 92 unlawful orders under section 259(a), title 39, United States Code, barring use of the mails.

Within the past 10 days, three simultaneous raids made by U.S. marshals and postal inspectors upon the New York headquarters of three of the reputed largest eastern dealers in obscenity and pornography resulted in the seizure of approximately 15 tons of films, slides, photographs, and trashy literature, and the arrest of the operators. One mailing list alone contained 100,000 names. These dealers have been identified in numerous previous cases. Unlawful orders have been issued against two of them in particular on various occasions. They have been involved in local arrests resulting in negligible fines or other sentences, and they have promptly and defiantly renewed their activities under changed names.

On Friday of last week, the premises of a Santa Monica, Calif., dealer in especially objectionable films and photos were raided. A large number of films and considerable volume of other material were seized, and the operator was arrested. He had been identified only a few days previously through mailings reaching the east coast.

In our determined efforts to clean up the mails, we are receiving increasingly valuable assistance from the public: However, it is clear that there must be a greater, expanded public awareness of the seriousness and the demoralizing results of the wholesale distribution of filth to the children of this country, if we are to deal with this matter in a completely effective manner. It is my opinion that the greatest single need today is widespread and concerted public support of this program, which relates to such a remarkable degree to the welfare of each home in the country, and I feel, too, that an awareness on the part of the courts of the real dimensions of this situation is absolutely essential.

The principal problem facing the Post Office Department today in its efforts to clean up the mails is ruling upon the acceptance of material which is widely regarded as objectionable without violating leading court decisions, which obviously are more liberal in their definition of obscenity than are the views of many thousands of patrons of the postal service.

For example, certain nudist and other magazines are today granted second-class mailing privileges by the Post Office Department, consistent with Supreme Court rulings. Some of these second-class mailing permits are granted only after extensive litigation. in one such instance, the Department's refusal to grant a publisher of a magazine a second-class mailing permit resulted in a court decision holding that the law does not authorize the refusal of mailing privileges upon future, unpublished issues of a magazine, despite the fact that past issues contained allegedly obscene matter. Along with these decisions comes the inevitable, cleverly designed propoganda by dealers in filth, who will cite one or more of the less aggravated cases to argue that the Post Office Department is attempting to set up a censorship, to restrict freedom of expression, or to suppress the distribution of art.

While these allegations are so ridiculous as to require no denial, they point to the problem involved in attempting to meet our responsibilities as we see them, to an American public who, through their urgent and sometimes pitiful protests by the thousands, indicate quite clearly that they have no difficulty in distinguishing between filth and art.

Section 1461 of Title 18, USC, the obscenity statute, provides penalties for the mailing of "every obscene, lewd, lascivious, indecent, filthy, or vile article." Courts in interpreting the intent of Congress have stated in effect that (1) nudity in itself is not obscenity; (2) that a publication is not obscene unless the general content is devoted to what may be termed obscenity; and (3) that obscenity must be evaluated in relation to contemporary community standards. Thus, it appears clear that among such other legislative steps as may appear necessary, the intent of Congress as to what constitutes obscenity is essential, along with a public assertion as to the standards of morality for which it stands.

In spite of the frustrations and the legal complications, and even the court decisions, I feel a responsibility to the public to attempt to prevent the use of the mails for indecent material, and to seek indictments and prosecutions for such offenses, even though it may be argued that it falls in the category of material concerning which there have been previous rulings favorable to the promoters. It seems to me that only by this method can the dimensions of this problem become clearly established before the courts and the Congress and the American public.

The type of material to which I refer can be exhibited to this committee in great volume, and I invite the committee to visit the department for this purpose.

It is our intent to continue to pursue this program to the fullest extent of our investigative and other resources, and the genuine interest of the Congress and the House Post Office and Civil Service Committee, and this subcommittee in particular, has been, and I am sure will continue to be of tremendous assistance.

Challenge to America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. BYRNES

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 23, 1959

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, Postmaster General Arthur E. Summerfield made a significant address before an overflow audience at the Rotary Club luncheon in Seattle on April 15. I believe his comments deserve careful reading by every thoughtful American.

He discussed four great problems and called for firm public opinion and action on them in the best interests of all Americans. They are the need to resist the Communist threat to our national safety; the need to intensify our battle against inflation and extravagant Government spending; the necessity of curbing the destructive monopoly power now lodged in the hands of a few union leaders, and finally, the desirability of progressive tax reform to encourage incentive and provide capital expansion to assure more jobs for more people.

Mr. Summerfield urged businessmen and community leaders to devote more of their time and effort to unselfish politics, directed to the greatest common good, to assure government for the people and not government by pressure groups.

Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I ask that this courageous speech be printed in the RECORD as part of my remarks:

It is a great pleasure to come to Seattle, and to have the opportunity to meet with this distinguished group of business and civil leaders.

I am always fascinated by the scenic beauty of the State of Washington. And more, I am deeply impressed by the development and growth that have taken place.

All my life, I have thrilled to the story of the pioneers who opened this great Pacific Northwest. Nothing could stop them from gaining the better life they saw for themselves and their children. They left a magnificent heritage for you—for all Americans—to ponder and to uphold.

Today, you are a dynamic region. You have assumed great responsibility in this Nation's economic and political leadership. You face opportunities that are virtually unlimited in scope.

But this you also know—that the very essence of real opportunity is challenge. And meeting today's challenge is so fundamental to the progress you would make, so basic to the ends we must achieve as a nation, I am deeply anxious to talk with you about it. I want to bring to you, today, a clear picture of the urgent nature of the challenge we face, and how we can meet it.

Earlier this morning, I spoke as your Postmaster General. I had the privilege of announcing major improvements, providing next-day first-class letter service for almost 2 million people throughout the Seattle metropolitan area, embracing the cities of Seattle and Tacoma, and 14 nearby counties. This improved mail service is now being given in 25 major metropolitan areas throughout the country. It serves nearly half of the people in the United States. Ultimately, every major metropolitan area will have this service, and we shall mark a long step forward in our goal of next-day delivery of a letter anywhere in the United States.

This noon, however, I want to speak to you, not just as your Postmaster General, but as a member of President Eisenhower's Cabinet and a member of the President's Cabinet Committee on Price Stability for Economic Growth.

I come with firsthand knowledge of the problems facing our Nation, and the steps your Government is taking to solve them. But I come with more than a report. My purpose, above all, is to talk with you about action. For, my friends, we are at an extremely crucial stage in the progress of America. We have a choice of paths to follow. We have momentous decisions to make.

The ultimate responsibility for these decisions is with the American people. And I am confident that, if the people apply their real genius, and determination, and devotion, the final decisions will be the right ones.

There are four specific problems I should like to discuss today, and then, if I may, I should like to suggest the vital part you can play in meeting each of them. They are:

1. The Communist threat to our national safety.

2. Our battle against inflation.

3. The destructive monopoly power of a group of union leaders.

4. The urgent necessity for tax reform.

All of these, of course, are interrelated.

Our national defense depends upon a strong economy, and our economy is acutely responsive to what we do about inflation, about production costs and prices, and about taxation.

The Communist challenge is many-sided. It is military, political, spiritual and economic. We and our allies have steadily rebuffed the military and political threats. Wherever the Communists have probed, they have found us standing firm—at Lebanon, in the China Sea, in the unity of our NATO alliance, and now in the Berlin issue, we have met the challenge with unmistakable evidence of the strength of our purpose.

We shall continue to keep our military power equal to any test. Our overall might in planes, missiles, ships, and other equipment must always be capable of deterring—and if ever necessary, defeating completely—any attack upon us.

We shall continue to meet the Soviet political challenge. We shall lead the way in exploring every avenue of reasonable hope for justly solving the issues that divide the world.

In the battle of spiritual values, we cannot lose so long as we preserve the freedom and moral strength on which our way of life is built. The Soviets know all this very well. Why, then, are they as confident of ultimate victory as ever? Because they are concentrating on all-out economic war, and they believe they can defeat us in such a war without risking their own total destruction. They intend to become the world's one first-class economic power, forcing us into second-class status. And for us, such an outcome would be just as tragic as nuclear devastation.

We are well in front now. But they believe we have not the system or the will to maintain and expand our economic strength. They expect our economy to explode, while theirs continues to grow.

And, my friends, let me say that we dare not look lightly on their great expectations. For here we do indeed stand at the crossroads of decision. The soundness of our economy is threatened by deadly forces that have wrecked other nations in the past. They are the forces of inflation and onerous taxation, and we have not united as a people to overcome them. I suggest to you that there is urgent reason for us to do so.

Let us look at some basic facts about inflation. I am sure we all agree on what inflation is and what it does. Certainly we have had ample opportunity, over 20 years, to see it in action.

To most Americans, inflation means higher costs of living. It means more and more struggle to try to make ends meet. We have inflation when the cost of what we buy keeps rising while the value of the dollars we have to buy it with keeps dropping.

Since 1939, our cost of living has more than doubled. The value of our dollar has dropped until the 100-cent dollar of 1939 is now worth just 48 cents. How much lower would you say we dare to let it go?

Inflation feeds on the income and the savings of every individual, every enterprise in America. It eats away the savings we cherish for family's security. It robs us of the real value of the dollars we earn. It destroys the will to work and the desire to save.

I suspect almost everyone in this room knows of someone whose savings, or insurance, or social security—carefully nurtured through half a lifetime—now is tragically inadequate to meet his needs. As businessmen, you are only too well aware of what inflation brings in rising costs and stifling taxes.

And finally, I would point out that the problem affects, in equal measure, the cost of maintaining the operations of the Government.

In short, inflation puts every part of our society in deepening jeopardy—the individual, our business enterprise, and our Government.

Now, what are we doing to meet this deadly force? We are waging a battle, led by the President of the United States, which in the past year has succeeded in bringing the rise in the cost of living under control.

We are fighting to accomplish the stability of the dollar we must have to go forward soundly. We are striving to continue our economic growth at the rate of which we are capable, with its expanding opportunity for every citizen.

But we are also facing tremendous pressures for a resumption of the inflationary process. There are vast pressures for extravagant government spending, and for a sharp new uptrend in the spiral of wages and prices. Amazingly, these spending drives are actually being led by some Members of the Congress—and by some leaders of State administrations.

They are practicing government by pressure group rather than for the people. And they will only be dissuaded by public opinion strong enough to impress its will upon them. For this reason, it is vitally important for our people to understand some plain, straight facts.

Government, in our system, is constituted to serve the people. It must meet all the legitimate needs of all its citizens. It must do all it can for the good of the people, within the means the people are willing and able to provide.

But there are those in and out of government who stoutly observe that we are a big Nation of great wealth, and therefore, we should put no limit to what we do in public projects, whether or not the people are able to pay the bills.

Nothing could be more crassly misleading—for the fact is, the people have no choice. Who else will pay?

The Government has no wealth of its own. It is the agency of the people. And when it spends more than it collects in taxes, every citizen has to pay the excess, in one way or another. If it is not in higher taxes, then it is in suffering the inflation that deficit financing by any government inevitably brings.

More than 7,000 bills have been introduced in this session of the 86th Congress by the people's representatives, including your own. Only a small handful of these are major measures of broad national interest. The vast majority would provide benefits of one kind or another to individuals or groups. And in no instance are new taxes proposed to offset these new costs.

Their backers are encouraged by the fact that the spending majority of the present Congress is committed to Federal spending—and to deficit financing—as an economic policy.

Chairman BYRD of the Senate Finance Committee, has noted, with alarm, that the effects of that policy already are plain. The Senate, he reports, has voted to increase President Eisenhower's budget proposals by 24 percent, and the House has voted increases averaging 12 percent. These increases represent billions of dollars.

The third problem we face—the effect of the huge economic power exercised by union monopoly leaders—must also be solved if we are to have sound economic progress. This is a power that ranks among the highest accumulations of vested interest to be found in history. It is a monopoly that draws upon huge financial resources, that permits a few perennial labor leaders to spend millions of dollars of dues money for political purposes, exactly as the leaders see fit, with no choice given the men and women who pay the dues. It is a power capable of imposing at will an ever-rising cost of living upon our people.

There is no question but what the legitimate function of every labor leader is to ask for, to negotiate for, higher wages. This is a rightful purpose of union leadership.

But union members—with all other Americans—have every reason to insist that their leaders, as well as the leaders in management, exercise a high order of responsibilities and statesmanship. It is up to union leaders to recognize that if they use their monopoly power to force wage increases and employee benefits too high, they bring about fewer jobs and greater unemployment, and thereby miserably fail in their duty to their members.

Why do excessive wage costs have such powerful impact upon inflationary forces? Because, after exclusion of all taxes, up to 83 percent of all income generated in the national economy goes to the payment of labor.

For a $3,000 automobile, for example, the required steel costs about $290. Even this price at the steel mill, in turn, includes labor cost as its main component.

What this means is that an unearned rise in employment costs has four times as much inflationary effect as a corresponding rise in all the remaining costs of production put together.

With this in mind, let us note that 154 major wage contracts come up for negotiation this year, including the steel industry, with its nearly 1 million workers. The cumulative effect of excessive wage-cost increases on this scale I leave to your imagination. There would be no way to describe it other than to call it a national calamity. Everyone would suffer. The blow, as we have noted, would fall hardest on the millions whose incomes have not gone up, the people on salaries, fixed incomes, and pensions.

But let none assume that he would escape—least of all the wage earner himself. He would soon find that the newly won increase had evaporated in higher living costs. Worse, he could find that even his job is gone because the product he makes has been priced out of the market, no longer able to compete effectively at home or abroad.

We should—and do—look to the increasing of job opportunities here at home through the expansion of our production capacity. We should take every step to encourage, not sap, the growth power of industry and business.

But we can hardly say we are giving full encouragement if we permit wage-push inflation that deprives our industry of adequate earnings to plow back into new products, equipment, and plants.

Every thinking American, I believe, will agree that the decline has gone far enough when the ratio of profits to sales, for all industry, drops from 7 percent in 1948 to 4.8 percent in 1958.

Especially is this true when we recognize the burden our taxation is placing on the accumulation of capital for investment, and on the personal incentive and earning power of every citizen.

The tax foundation tells us the average earner of $4,500 a year works 22 days each month. Seven days of this total—nearly one-third of his working time—is taken from his income in taxes. And as he may succeed in building his income, he can look forward to the tax chunk becoming larger. We need to relieve this stifling tax load being carried by the individual citizen and by our business system.

Our population is growing rapidly. Business can create new jobs to meet this growth only as billions of dollars are invested in new tools and capacity. Now, where is this money to come from?

Today, Federal taxes alone can take more than half of many companies' net income. Then follow State and local taxes. There are over 100,000 taxing authorities in our country. Their weight can literally crush the ability of business to meet its job-creating capital needs.

Our present tax structure is seriously outdated. It is a set of laws reflecting largely the conditions of the past, especially World War II, when the goal was the confiscation of war profits, not the building of a sound peacetime economy. A sensible, equitable, dynamic tax program is needed in its place. Such a program will keep revenues up, not by taxing away incentive and means of growth, but by steadily increasing the tax base.

These problems I have discussed this noon can be clearly stated. But how clearly do we see the answers that can be given to them? This is our task.

And I believe we cannot emphasize too heavily the answers that are being provided by our national leadership, and by leaders in many States. These answers add up to a program of full employment with stable prices and tax reform, a program offering greater opportunity for every American.

It is because we have pursued such a program that our economy has bounded back from the recession to a dynamic new level. The signposts are clearly visible and our program is well under way.

First of all, we have established a sound and sensible philosophy of government. The set of principles we are following deserve enumeration. They are:

First. Agree on sound and productive fiscal policies. Set realistic budgets and stick with them.

Second. Meet the full needs of our defense program.

Third. Meet all the legitimate needs of our people.

Fourth. Refuse to give away taxpayer money to nonessential projects, lavish spending schemes, and welfare state activities intended to curry favor with special groups rather than to meet the needs of all the people.

Fifth. Operate government on a pay-as-you-go basis. Avoiding the fatalistic deficit philosophy so easy to get in but so desperately hard to shed.

Sixth. Encourage a higher order of statesmanship in union-management wage negotiations—create public opinion so that union leaders work for the real welfare of their members and the Nation, rather than trying to outdo each other in wringing inflationary wage packages from industry.

Seventh. Establish adequate laws to control abuses of union leader monopoly power. Such laws were established for business, correctly and firmly, when some businessmen abused the public trust in years past. Give union members their rights to pass on the action of their leaders and the use of their dues.

And, finally, move forward as rapidly as possible to achieve progressive tax reform.

I believe that heartening progress is being made in all these eight areas.

The sound fiscal program of the President, with his insistence upon balancing the budget, is rapidly gaining wide support.

In the wage-price area, we can only hope that the statesmanship we so urgently desire will be forthcoming. It is not immediately apparent in the announced intentions of demands we have seen. It is clear that union members themselves want responsible union leadership—responsible to their welfare and to the national welfare. With the great majority of the public at large, they want laws that will help to assure responsible leadership.

In regard to taxation, we are working to carry forward a program of tax reform and reduction. The President's stress on a balanced budget is related directly to this goal. Steps in the right direction already have been taken with the Revenue Act of 1954.

The time is approaching for another bold and imaginative breakthrough on tax policy that will benefit and encourage all taxpayers, large and small. Obviously, this program cannot call for immediate and sharp reduction in all income tax rates. It calls for gradual reform. And it calls for equitable reduction for all taxpayers.

The public, more and more, is rallying behind the President in his fight to maintain a balanced budget, to achieve tax reform, and to bring the extravagances and excesses that feed inflation under control.

But let me not overstate this premise. The battle is far from won. The special interests bent on spending, taxing, and deficit financing still are riding high—still have the ears of the majority of our Federal legislators and State administrations. Washington is swarming with representatives of the special interest groups, each concerned with favoring legislation for his pet project.

The fight for fiscal sanity is being waged by the President, members of his administration, and some Members of the Congress. It is this group—almost alone—that is bearing the brunt of the battle.

My appeal to you today, and to the American people, is to join this battle, to meet this challenge.

Remember that, in the struggle with Russia, we are strong militarily, we are strong politically, we are strong spiritually. We must continue to strengthen ourselves economically. We can no more appease inflation than we can appease Soviet aggression. I believe we shall continue to build the strongest, freest way of life the world will know.

But I also believe that, to do so, America must maintain a sound economic philosophy, and sound policies firmly based on that philosophy. We must never accept the premise that our fiscal problems cannot be solved.

Inflation, deficits, high costs of living, and oppressive taxation all are man made. There is nothing sacred about them or the destructive monopoly power of a group of union leaders.

By attacking these problems with intelligence, determination, and perseverance, we shall overcome them. May there be a reassertion, by all of us, of the courage and strength and faith of the Americans who opened the great Northwest.

I am confident that the business leadership of the State of Washington, which is so well represented here today, will play a vital part in keeping our free-enterprise system strong.

As civic leaders in a key city and State, your views and actions are vitally important to your own progress, to your State, to the Nation, and to the world.

I would dare to suggest that you assess what you are doing individually. If you believe that we must attack the causes of inflation and onerous taxation and union monopoly firmly and intelligently, ask yourself if you are doing all you can to support that belief. Your belief in America can be effective only as you let it be known.

I urge you to take your place among those who will speak, work, and fight for sound policies and a stronger America in the years before us.

There is nothing more important to you, your family, your future, and your Nation than that you take your stand now. Speak up; let your representatives in Congress know what you think. Let them know you understand that a Government big enough to do everything for its citizens from cradle to grave is also big enough to take everything from them in taxes during the same time.

Every businessman must understand that the political party of his choice is what he makes it, either by his participation or lack of participation in its affairs and in its choice of candidates.

Unless responsible businessmen and citizens devote more of their time and effort and organizing ability—as well as their money—to unselfish politics, directed to the greatest common good, government by pressure groups will continue to grow.

Only by universal participation can we be sure that the Government will serve all the people—not some special interest—and assure the greatest opportunities for all our citizens.

My friends, this is the banner of true liberalism. Advancing under it, we shall meet the Communist economic challenge as surely as we shall meet the military and political challenge.

We shall assure that the golden era of unlimited opportunity lies ahead.

We shall preserve the great free and growing economy which is the foundation of all our freedoms, our security, our prosperity, and our future, in a strong, free, and better world.

Firm Bipartisan Berlin Policy Already Paying Off

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SAMUEL S. STRATTON
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 23, 1959

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, the other day, together with other members of the House Armed Services Committee, I returned from an inspection trip of our military defenses in Western Europe, Western Germany, and specifically Berlin, with a view toward surveying our readiness to meet any developments that may occur as a result of the May 27 ultimatum which the Soviet Union has directed against us.

Because the Berlin situation is such an important matter in our overall foreign policy, it may be that some members of this House would be interested in the observations of one member of this group. For that reason, I request unanimous consent to insert an article which I published recently on this Berlin trip and on my views as to the effectiveness of American policy toward Berlin in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

FIRM BERLIN POLICY PAYING OFF, RETURNING REPRESENTATIVE SAYS

(NOTE.—Representative STRATTON, former mayor of Schenectady, has just returned from a flying trip to Berlin. With nine other members of the Armed Services Committee, he went to get a first-hand look at the crisis area. The Congressman is unusually qualified to write this exclusive report for NANA. He is a military intelligence expert. A combat intelligence officer on the staff of Gen. Douglas MacArthur during World War II, he was recalled to teach at the naval intelligence school during the Korean emergency.)

(By Hon. SAMUEL S. STRATTON, Representative from New York)

Berlin is a fantastic city. Four days there and I came away convinced that the status quo can be beautiful. I returned not only impressed by the high degree of training of our troops in Germany, but also by the obvious fact that the American policy of standing firm is the soundest possible policy and is in fact already paying dividends.

There's far less agitation about the Berlin crisis in Berlin than in Washington. But this calmness is no accident. It is based first on a conviction that America means what it says about standing firm. Already Berliners are convinced the May 27 deadline set by Soviet Premier Nikita Khrushchev will pass without any thing unusual happening.

That doesn't mean that the Berlin crisis will be over. But it does mean that the firm U.S. position has already forced an adjustment in Soviet policy and has at the very least postponed any actual showdown. As far as Berliners are concerned every extra week of living successfully under Soviet pressure without cracking is another step in the right direction.

Also behind this unexpected calmness in Berlin, as we found, are some of the finest fighting troops that America has stationed anywhere in the world.

ESSENTIAL SHIELD

We saw these troops, talked with them, and watched them carry out their combat maneuvers, not only the two battle groups located inside West Berlin, but also the five American divisions poised along the Iron Curtain line in West Germany and ready to go, if, as they say in Europe, "the balloon goes up."

These ground troops are performing a highly essential function in West Germany as important elements of our so-called NATO shield. Their job is to keep the Soviets from overrunning Germany in the event of war until we can bring our superior nuclear power to bear against an aggressor.

I came back from Berlin just a bit concerned about what the current efforts to economize in the field of national defense might do to those NATO shield forces. Certainly we can't possibly permit any reduction in American forces in Western Germany now, whatever happens to overall Army strengths. Many of us were frankly disturbed to learn that budget cutting at home already has forced some reduction in the regular training alerts and maneuvers of these forces, which is, in my judgment, considering the circumstances, a very dangerous brand of economy. Even our normal rotation policy has created some problems; for example, when a large number of trained soldiers wind up their 2-year hitch together and move back home to civilian life. New men are moved in quickly to take their places, of course, but there is still an uncomfortable delay before the unit as a whole can be brought back up to the same combat-ready pitch.

For myself, I'd feel a lot better, and I think some of our field commanders would too, if we had at least one and maybe two more American divisions in West Germany as strategic reserve. If our ground forces are going to play any role in our defense picture, Europe is the place they are most likely to play it. Five American divisions, even highly trained, still have their hands full facing 20 or 25 Soviet divisions. We need at least another reserve division to back up the forces already committed along the border.

OUR DEPENDENTS OVERSEAS

One question that bothered some of us when we left Washington for Berlin was the status of American dependents in that exposed outpost. Shouldn't we perhaps evacuate them all well before the May 27 deadline? After talking with Army officers, men, and with many of the dependents themselves, I came away convinced it would be a mistake for us to undertake any evacuation of American dependents, except as a last-minute and extreme measure. In fact, I was amazed to find that there's almost no desire on the part of any of these people to return home.

These folks are firmly convinced that the future of our country is closely bound up with holding onto this great free city. They wouldn't want to be the first to betray any nervousness at carrying out American overseas commitments. If we were to begin to move back our dependents, this would be an immediate signal that Americans had decided the future of Berlin was hopeless, and that is one thing we certainly don't intend to do.

Atcually, Berlin is more a war of nerves rather than a war of guns. That's why I am so convinced we can win just by standing firm on the status quo. And yet what about the future? Can we live with this kind of situation indefinitely? Even assuming that the West weathers the May 27 deadline, isn't there always the chance of another crisis any time the Russians feel like crying "wolf"?

You can get one clear-cut answer to that question from the youthful, able, and highly impressive mayor of Berlin, Willy Brandt. We had an hour's talk with him. Mayor Brandt says Berlin's position is anomalous, tied in economically, emotionally, and (eventually, he hopes) politically, with West Germany 110 miles to the west. Yet he points out that there have been anomalous political situations like this before which have continued indefinitely. He points to Pakistan, divided into two sections on the continent of India. If Pakistan can survive, he says, why not Berlin? Indeed, one thing that keeps Berlin alive today is the hope that some day she will again be the capital of Germany.

PATIENCE IS NEEDED

But perhaps the best answer of all to this question of the future of West Berlin came from an American officer stationed there. He put it to me this way: "Let's not get impatient and feel that we've got to find overnight some neat and simple and easy solution to this Berlin problem. These apparently neat solutions, arrived at around the conference table with the Soviets, can often spell disaster. Maybe we've spent too much time reading those fairy stories where people get into trouble, then somehow resolve the troubles, and everybody lives happily ever afterward.

"That isn't the way life goes these days," my officer friend went on. "We can't expect to live happily ever after in today's world. We're going to be facing Communist tensions and pressures for a long time to come. Our job is not to try to find some easy, fairyland solution that will let us 'live happily ever after,' but rather to prepare to live with the tensions and pressures of this real world of ours without letting them get us down."

I think my officer friend was right as we talked that last night in Berlin. The Russians are betting we can't stand the heat. But when you've seen Berlin, as we saw it, you know in your heart that we can't possibly abandon this fantastically attractive outpost of freedom 110 miles inside the Iron Curtain and continue to hold up our heads. If Berlin ever goes, then Western Europe goes with it. I'm convinced of that.

The San Jacinto Anniversary

OF
HON. BRUCE ALGER
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 23, 1959

Mr. ALGER. Mr. Speaker, 123 years ago—on April 21, 1836—a handful of Texans, under the leadership of Sam Houston, fought and won the Battle of San Jacinto.

As a direct result of this victory, the Republic of Texas was brought into being.

These men had courage. They fought a larger number of better trained, better equipped foes.

These men had vision. They literally "bet their lives" on the chance that their loved ones might have a future under freedom.

These men had strength of character. The hardships, the discouragement, they conquered were more forbidding than their human enemies.

Yet, they made their decision and went on to win.

Mr. Speaker, I have one question in my mind. This is the question: "How much Federal help did Sam Houston and his Texans have in winning and preserving their independence?"

Abolishing Postal Savings: Fiscal Insanity

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES O. PORTER
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 23, 1959

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, the administration professes to be much concerned about balancing the budget but here it comes again pushing for the liquidation of the postal savings system.

This is fiscal insanity.

It means doing away with a profitable Government activity, used by 2 million citizens, at the cost of at least $4 million.

Fiscal insanity, nothing else!

The Post Office representatives testified before the Post Office and Civil Service Committee, of which I am a member, on Tuesday. They told us that about 2 million depositors had $1.2 billion in postal savings. This money is invested in Government securities which yield on the average 2.6 percent.

The Postal Savings System, according to the testimony, makes a profit for the Government. It reduces the deficit and will continue to do so for at least 6 years.

Now here comes the administration to abolish the system, increase the postal deficit, and deprive 2 million depositors of this service. This move would cost at least $4 million.

At present the depositors are paid 2 percent interest. The profit is made on the 0.6 percent difference between the interest and the Government securities in which the Government invests. However, if you pay off the depositors, that means refinancing the $1.2 billion in low interest—no more money is available for the Government at 2.6 percent—Government securities. The new bonds which the Government will have to purchase will be at 3.25 percent interest.

Do you know the difference in interest charged on $1.2 billion for 1 year at 2.6 percent and at 3.25 percent? I will tell you: $3.8 million. Add to that the financing charges of floating the new issue and you are well over $4 million, even if you subtract the half million dollar operating costs of the Postal Savings System. Of course this would extend over for 1 year.

Economy, in my opinion, is carried too far and too insanely when profitable, useful Government programs like postal savings are sought to be abolished at the cost of more than $4 million to the taxpayers. Or perhaps I should say this is too brazen an attempt to make the bankers happy.

Results of Opinion Poll—21st District of of California

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDGAR W. HIESTAND
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 23, 1959

Mr. HIESTAND. Mr. Speaker, early this year I sent out my seventh annual questionnaire to the voters of the district I represent. Response this year was greater than ever before, indicating a healthy interest in national affairs. Along with the replies, I received several thousand letters from thoughtful citizens, expressing opinion or asking questions regarding legislation.

My colleagues will recognize the specific questions relating to specific bills or issues facing us at this session of Congress. Perhaps they will be interested in knowing how a representative cross-section of the 800,000 citizens of the 21st District of California feel about these issues:

	Percent yes	Percent no	Percent not sure
1. Shall we spend Federal money for municipal projects such as slum clearance, water supply, sewage disposal, etc.?	23	69	8
2. Should Congress spend Federal tax money to assist specific areas of the country suffering chronic unemployment?	36	50	14
3. Generally, do you favor Federal aid to education?	40	55	5
4. Should Congress continue farm price supports?	10	83	7
5. Shall we continue foreign economic aid?	47	38	15
6. Should foreign military aid be continued?	58	26	16
7. Is balancing the Federal budget important to you?	81	12	7
8. Should cooperatives be taxed the same as other businesses?	82	8	10
9. Should small business have more tax relief?	71	17	12
10. Should Red China be admitted to the U.N.?	14	76	10
11. Should we make an all-out effort to surpass the U.S.S.R. in the exploration of outer space, regardless of cost?	33	50	10
12. Do you favor stiff legislation requiring the secret ballot and control by the membership, in the internal affairs of unions?	95	3	2
13. Should labor unions have to comply with our antimonopoly laws?	90	6	4
14. Do you want Congress to revise the Taft-Hartley law so as to outlaw State right-to-work laws?	20	70	10

The Hidden Dangers of Increased Trade With Soviet Russia

OF
HON. H. ALLEN SMITH
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 23, 1959

Mr. SMITH of California. Mr. Speaker, it has now been several months since Soviet Deputy Premier Mikoyan visited the United States. I think there are some facets of his visit which have been overlooked. For this reason, I want to direct the attention of my colleagues to what I consider a most important danger arising from his grandiose plea for increased trade between the United States and Russia.

We remember Mikoyan. There he was—a smiling, dashing, mustached man from Moscow, speaking sweet words and displaying broad smiles. Everywhere he went he exuded friendship, telling of the glories of Soviet communism and urging Americans to accept him as an apostle of peace and good will.

His words were so enticing—to those who did not know the truth. The Soviet Union, he said, is gradually being "democratized." "Now there are no arrests for political reasons." The Iron Curtain is a "fable." We stand for "peace," "freedom" and "brotherhood."

Mikoyan did achieve a considerable propaganda success in this country. He was accepted by important business leaders and select social circles. He gained audiences with high political leaders. One reporter, commenting on his visit to the west coast, stated:

> The 63-year-old Russian official has been winning friends and influencing people all over the place.

Hundreds of students, for example, at a university warmly greeted him. One coed ran up to shake his hand. Other students followed. His interest in education was praised by the university president. After lunch at a fashionable restaurant, Mikoyan went to a movie studio, there to inspect the plant and meet some of the actors and actresses. Later, as featured speaker at a dinner arranged by business officials, this faithful disciple of Stalin waxed eloquently on how America was botching up international relations.

From all the publicity and showering applause, you would think that a conquering hero from a friendly country had come to our shores—a hero whose ideals of government and personal living were similar to ours, a hero whom we could admire and incorporate into our national consciousness.

Rather this individual is one of the world's highest-ranking Communists, the No. 2 man in the notorious and iniquitous tyranny of Soviet Russia. He is the sworn opponent of everything we cherish and hold dear. His so-called hand of friendship is a hand stained with the innocent blood of literally millions of men and women. The smile—which captivated so many in the United States—is actually a satanic smirk which smugly watched entire families liquidated by the Communist secret police. The Soviet democracy he so blithely hails is the democracy which has made all Russia a prison house—where freedom of speech, thought, and the press are muzzled. Let us make no mistake: Mikoyan, despite his genial smiles and gracious outward demeanor, is a deadly enemy of America and our democratic way of life. Not to recognize him as such is to jeopardize our security.

I should like to call to the attention of my colleagues an important but generally overlooked aspect of Mikoyan's visit—namely, the dangers to the internal security of the Nation inherent in the Soviet Deputy Premier's call, among other things, for closer trade relations between the United States and Communist countries. Increased trade may have some beneficial aspects for America, but we would be foolish not to recognize that it will also pose severe problems for agencies of our Government, such as the FBI, charged with protecting the internal security of the Nation.

One of these problems, most frankly, would be the increased danger of Soviet espionage. Over the years the Soviets have systematically used trade contacts, business relationships and other commercial transactions as covers for illegal espionage activities. This remains true today. Any Soviet trade organization established in the United States automatically becomes a workshop for espionage. We must recognize that to allow more Russian technicians, business experts and trade consultants into our country will greatly multiply the FBI's problems.

Let us look at a few facts and see how the Soviets—ever since the Bolshevik Revolution—have manipulated trade contacts for spy purposes.

In March 1919, for example, an individual by the name of Ludwig C. A. K. Martens arrived in New York City. As told in Don Whitehead's most excellent book, "The FBI Story," Martens was ballyhooed as the official trade representative of the Soviet Union. He set up an office in New York City, even though the United States did not diplomatically recognize Moscow. Under this trade "cover," the very first Soviet espionage was conducted—very crude and inept, of course, as compared with later Soviet efficiency, but already the first prick of the knife blade of treason into our national life. Very interestingly, an individual by the name of Arthur Alexandrovich Adams was a member of Martens' staff. This same Arthur Adams was later to be identified as an espionage agent in atomic matters during World War II.

In 1921, Martens and his staff were deported from the United States. The Soviets, however, already were working to perfect the technique of using commercial activity as a cover to steal valuable information from this country. In 1924, a Soviet Government trade agency by the name of Amtorg was set up in the United States. Ostensibly this organization existed for commercial purposes, such as purchasing American products for delivery to the Soviet Union. Under this cover, Russians were able to travel, make contacts with Americans, gain access to industrial facilities and gather intelligence data from business firms, trade journals, and so forth.

Most important, however, Soviet espionage for the first time had a legal base in the United States—legal in that the Soviets now had a legal cover—Amtorg was officially recognized by the American Government—for their nefarious activities. Amtorg, which still exists, served for many years as the backbone, so to speak, for Soviet espionage in the United States. After diplomatic recognition of Russia in 1933, Soviet spies started operating from diplomatic establishments, supplementing the work of Amtorg undercover agents.

The importance of Amtorg is reflected by a comment made in 1926 by G. Bessedovsky, defected Russian official in Paris, to the effect that Gen. I. Berzin, a key leader in Moscow's espionage apparatus, had stated that the Russians were operating two illegal organizations in the United States and that Amtorg's offices served as a means of contact with them.

The activities of Gaik Badalovich Ovakimian, one of Moscow's master spies, reflect the extent of Amtorg's involvement in Soviet espionage. Ovakimian was associated with Amtorg. His chief activity, however, until his arrest by the FBI in 1941, was the operation of an extensive group of espionage agents. These spies gathered industrial information of all types, as well as military, economic, and political data.

Amtorg also helped recruit Soviet espionage agents. Take the case of Simon A. Rosenberg. Born in Poland, Rosenberg came to the United States in 1925. He accepted employment with Amtorg in 1930 and the next year went to Soviet Russia as an engineer. These were the days when Russia was trying desperately to increase industrial production. While in the Soviet Union, Rosenberg was contacted by the secret police who threatened to kill his sister, who was living in Russia, unless he agreed to become a Russian agent on his return to America. Rosenberg agreed and for the next 6 years he served as a spy collecting information for the Soviets. The master spy of his operation was none other than Ovakimian.

The story of Amtorg and Ovakimian has tragic overtones for America—leading, for example, to some of the Russians' most active espionage rings. Ovakimian was in contact with Jacob Golos, another Russian master spy. Golos operated World Tourists, Inc., like Amtorg, a commercial front for the Russians. World Tourists, like the U.S. Service and Shipping, Inc., another firm headed by Golos, was ostensibly a legitimate business—namely, a travel agency. Actually it served as a legal cover for Russian espionage. Among its notorious activities, for example, was the recruitment in late 1930's of Americans for military service in Spain for the Abraham Lincoln Brigade. Associated with Golos was Elizabeth Bentley, self-admitted courier for an entire ring of Communist agents in Washington, D.C., such as Nathan Gregory Silvermaster.

The influence of Amtorg can be directly traced in the theft of our atomic bomb secrets, culminating in the Harry Gold-Klaus Fuchs-Julius Rosenberg cases. Ovakimian, while employed at Amtorg, recruited Thomas Lessing Black who in turn brought Harry Gold into contact with the Russians. During World War II Gold was to serve as the intermediary between Fuchs, German-born atomic scientist, and the Russians. Most revealing is the fact that Semen M. Semenov, one of Gold's Russian superiors, had himself been an employee of Amtorg. This trade organization indeed sowed seeds of treason which brought bitter fruits against the United States.

Examples of how the Russians have exploited trade relations for espionage are many. I want to mention, however, just one more—the name of Andrei V. Schevchenko, a Russian aviation expert who arrived in the United States in 1942 assigned to the Soviet Government Purchasing Commission. This commission, established during World War II, ostensibly was a Soviet agency designed to promote Russian purchases for the war effort. However, like Amtorg, it was a cover for Russian espionage.

Schevchenko was assigned as a contact between the Soviet Purchasing Commission and Bell Aircraft Corp., Buffalo, N.Y. At this time Bell Aircraft was carrying out top-secret experiments in jet propulsion for air travel.

In pursuing his legitimate duties, Schevchenko was also alert for any possibilities of gathering information to which he was not entitled. He frequently used the company library and gradually made the acquaintance of the librarian. Step by step he indoctrinated her in the glories of Russia—and, then came the request for classified information. The librarian and her husband, fortunately, contacted the FBI—and that efficient investigative agency carefully supervised contacts between Schevchenko and the librarian. The Russian was even paying for information he could have secured free of charge.

The point, however, is that the Russians—though they were guests of this country and receiving vital lend-lease help—did not hesitate to steal information from our factories. In this instance, as so often happened, their cover was a Soviet trade mission.

In Mikoyan's plea for increased trade lurks the hidden danger of Soviet espionage. This danger is not something theoretical, but a concrete fact, substantiated by 40 years of Soviet exploitation of trade relations for illegal espionage purposes. So-called Soviet trade experts arrive in the United States. Among them, you can be sure, will be trained espionage agents, instructed to carry out prearranged contacts. They will endeavor to develop new subagents, new sources of information, new techniques of communication. Experience, moreover, has taught that trade fronts, such as Amtorg, provide the Russians with mail drops, a channel for financing and opportunities of infiltrating legitimate American firms.

Victor A. Kravchenko, former employee of the Soviet Purchasing Commission in Washington, D.C., who later defected from communism, in testimony before the House Committee on Un-American Activities in 1947, identified Mikoyan, then Russian Foreign Trade Minister, as engaging in economic espionage against the United States. He told how Mikoyan sent a secret order, by Soviet diplomats, to Russian officials in this country on this subject. Kravchenko adds:

This document was delivered to special secret agents in Washington and, it goes without saying, was delivered thanks to diplomatic immunity.

Kravchenko continues:

In the same way, secret party orders were delivered to Washington from the central committee of the party.

Hence, when calls are heard from Americans for expanding our trade with Russia and other Communist countries, we must face up frankly to the security problems which automatically will arise. Not to do so is to live in a fairyland of dreams and fable.

Pesach, 5719

OF
HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER
OF NEW YORK

Thursday, April 23, 1959

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, why is this night different from all other nights? Why is this time of Pesach, or Passover, different from all other seasons of the year?

We of the Jewish religion, inheritors of the rich and glorious tradition of Judaism, know well the story of the exodus from the land of Egypt, and our children learn of the sufferings, the courage, and the deliverance, of their ancestors of thousands of years ago. It is as important today as it ever was, and it will be important as long as the world lasts, that we pass on to our children, unimpaired, the virtues inculcated by that story—the fortitude, the stubborn determination to resist oppression, the resolve to live by the spirtual truths and moral laws that are our precious inheritance, the humility to submit to the divine will in any misfortune, and the hope and energy to rise bravely to new life and new circumstances.

As we commemorate in our Seder, not only the sufferings and the deliverance of our Hebrew ancestors, but the sufferings endured by the Egyptian people before the Pharaoh would release the Hebrews from bondage, let our thoughts turn to the oppressed and enslaved peoples, the world over, in this day of peril and tyranny. A darkness of the spirit, black as the Egyptian night, lies over the Communist-dominated lands today. In other lands, differences of race or of religion give rise to mob violence or repression under the forms of law.

Let us keep ever before the eyes of the spirit, for our own guidance and the guidance of the world, as a pillar of fire by night and a pillar of cloud by day, the ideals of freedom, of justice, of equality, of goodwill toward all men.

Thus we may be able, in the fullness of time, to fulfill our high destiny, and lead all mankind, freed from violence and from wrong, and united in an eternal confidence of brotherhood, to celebrate the universal Passover in the name of our God of freedom.

Address by Representative Emanuel Celler

OF
HON. VICTOR L. ANFUSO
OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 23, 1959

Mr. ANFUSO. Mr. Speaker, our distinguished colleague from New York, the Honorable EMANUEL CELLER, surely needs no introduction to the Members of this House nor to the people of America. He enjoys a national reputation because of his wise leadership, his ability as a parliamentarian, and most of all because of his sagacious views and opinions on matters of national interest.

To us, his colleagues from New York, he is the beloved dean of our delegation in Congress to whom we all look for guidance and counsel. His service in Congress—and that means service in the best interests of the American people—extends over a period of 37 years. This is exceeded only by our distinguished Speaker, the Honorable SAM RAYBURN, and the distinguished chairman of the Armed Services Committee the Honorable CARL VINSON.

MANNIE CELLER, as he is affectionately known to myriads of people, is a warmhearted person and a great humanitarian. Even as chairman of the House Judiciary Committee he is not the stern individual that many would expect of a person in that position, but friendly and cooperative in every way.

Recently, Congressman CELLER was the recipient of a Gold Medal Award presented to him at a dinner in his honor by the Jewish War Veterans. This took place last Saturday evening, April 18, at the Statler-Hilton Hotel in New York. On that occasion he delivered an address which, I am sure, all of our colleagues would enjoy reading because of the views expressed and the philosophy of life of this present-day sage. I deem it a privilege to have his address inserted into the RECORD so that the American people may have the opportunity to read it and enjoy it for its wisdom and ripe thoughts.

Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to insert into the RECORD the text of Congressman CELLER'S address:

STATEMENT BY REPRESENTATIVE EMANUEL CELLER BEFORE THE JEWISH WAR VETERANS, APRIL 18, 1959, STATLER-HILTON HOTEL

How can I thank you? Yet, in a measure, this award, which I both proudly and humbly acknowledge, belongs to all the gallant and fighting men of the Jewish War Veterans. For that which the Jewish War Veterans have accomplished in the years of its existence and which I, in response to the inspiration of the Jewish War Veterans, have in my own small way done, derive from the same source, and that source is the Bible. The Jewish War Veterans have fought for the preservation of civil liberties; for the preservation of liberty itself; for equality of opportunities for all peoples; for civil rights; for liberal immigration policies. The Jewish War Veterans have done this, not only by way of pamphlets and resolutions, but in the very frontlines of war—in the trenches, in the air, and on the seas. And in so doing, they echoed and re-echoed the living words of the Testament.

I am not a student of the Bible; only a reader. And yet as I read I find with considerable excitement—always—that those questions that agitate us in this age—in this very day—have been explored in the Book. All around me, particularly in the work I do as a Member of Congress, I find the influence of Jewish law—not recognized as such, but unquestionably so—bears with great impact upon the way of the free world.

Lest I become too abstract, let me illustrate. Take the question of civil liberties and civil rights, with which we are wrestling today. It is a commonplace to trace the beginnings of the battle for individual rights—that is, protection against the tyranny of the state—to the Bill of Rights, then through many centuries to Anglo-Saxon law, woven into the first 10 amendments to our Constitution. Yet this concept appears again and again in the Bible. It is not amazing that the concept of the dignity of the individual should be grounded in Western civilization, but it is truly amazing that in the culture of Biblical days, such concept should have been formulated and carried forward throughout the centuries. For example, listen:

Leviticus, chapter 25, verse 10: "And ye shall hallow the fiftieth year, and proclaim liberty throughout all the land unto all the inhabitants thereof: it shall be a jubilee unto you; and ye shall return every man unto his possession, and ye shall return every man unto his family."

Hearken also to Leviticus, chapter 19, verse 18: "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself."

Interesting is the fact that this voice of Leviticus is engraved on our Liberty Bell in Independence Hall, Philadelphia.

How well the members of the Jewish War Veterans must understand this holy injunction. Thus, began a line reaching into the present, a line which marks today the struggle between democracy and totalitarianism.

I want to quote one more passage which goes to the very heart of freedom, equality of opportunity, the American traditions of asylum and charity. These traditions have roots and the roots reach far down. We find them in Deuteronomy, chapter 24, verses 17 through 22:

"Thou shalt not pervert the judgment of the stranger, nor of the fatherless; nor take a widow's raiment to pledge. But thou shalt remember that thou wast a bondman in Egypt, and the Lord thy God redeemed thee thence; therefore I command thee to do this thing. When thou cuttest down thine harvest in thy field, and hast forgot a sheaf in the field, thou shalt not go again to fetch it; it shall be for the stranger, for the fatherless, and for the widow; that the Lord thy God may bless thee in all the work of thine hands. When thou beatest thine olive tree, thou shalt not go over the boughs again; it shall be for the stranger, for the fatherless, and for the widow. When thou gatherest the grapes of thy vineyard, thou shalt not glean it afterward; it shall be for the stranger, for the fatherless, and for the widow. And thou shalt remember that thou wast a bondman in the land of Egypt; therefore I command thee to do this thing."

The Jewish War Veterans forget neither the dead nor the living. When my bill to incorporate the Jewish War Veterans National Memorial became Public Law 903 of the 85th Congress, it was for me a proud moment. It was not an earth-shaking piece of legislation; it could not, of course, have the national impact as did the passage of the Celler Civil Rights Act of 1957, but it was a little bill, big in meaning, but a little bill, nonetheless, which I had nursed through to enactment. There was no widespread interest, but you and I know it honored the dead and how it inspired the living to dedicate themselves anew to the freedoms for which these brave souls had died.

You will forgive, I know, the reminiscing of a man of threescore and ten who, during his 37 years in Congress, bears the scars of many a lost battle and the healing memory of the few that were won. When I first came to Congress, prohibition was the burning national issue. How young, how naive, how uncomplicated that era seems now, despite our having fought only 6 years ago a World War. And the 6 years that followed were years of abandon, too many running riot to catch up with the easy money, the real estate booms in the swamps. Six years they were of flagpole sitters, marathon dances, the flapper, and the Charleston. But the tests of our maturity, unforeseen by most, were marching forward—the crushing depression, the rise of Hitler, World War II, the Korean war, and now the cold war with its day to day crises. We have known few moments of ease since 1929. But what we lost in ease we gained in conscience. And this is the central point. And through organizations like the Jewish War Veterans, we gave voice to that conscience both collectively and individually. The spur of conscience is not easy to live with, but having once come alive, we cannot put it to rest. For all is not well in this best of all possible worlds, and the severest tests are yet to come, tests of patience, understanding, and even sacrifice. I talk this openly to you because I know from our years of association together, the Jewish War Veterans will meet these tests with the same courage they have met them before. The roots of this courage, as I said a few moments ago, lie deeply embedded in racial memory and whether consciously or subconsciously—I do not know which—the poetry, the strength, and the depth of the Great Book are with you.

I have had a life full of content. It has been an existence of much happiness, not however, unmixed with some sorrow and suffering. But when trouble came I drew upon the Great Book once more and repeated the words of Job, "Thou shalt forget thy misery and remember it as waters that pass away."

Long ago, an Eastern monarch plagued with misfortune and harassments called his wise men together. He asked them to invent a motto containing a few magic words that could help him in his time of trial. He wanted a motto small enough to be engraved on a ring. He wanted it to be endlessly enduring. The wise men thought and thought, and finally came to him with the magic words, "This too shall pass." The motto has survived century after century. I have sought refuge on occasion in these words of rare wisdom, "This too shall pass," and they have proven precious to me and to countless others.

I do not wish to become maudlin or cheaply sentimental but with the years have come considerable wisdom and sound sense. I have learned the value of persistence. Consider the postage stamp. It secures success through its ability to stick to one thing till it gets there. I have shunned the ways of the cynic—the one who knows the cost of everything, but the value of nothing.

I remember what Disraeli once said to a Jewish lad, "You and I belong to a race that can do anything but fail."

I have learned from sad experience that anger rarely pays since it warps the judgment and that one must ever be armed with the breastplate of a good temper and that life is short but there must ever be time for courtesy.

I grow a bit weary too, of those stiff-necked ones who prate of their superior or nobler blood. I say to them, "Take your superior blood to the marketplace and see what it will buy you." Years ago, I read Mark Twain, that truly indigenous author. He says in "Puddinhead Wilson": "Training is everything; the peach was once a bitter almond; cauliflower is nothing but cabbage with a college education." How true is the importance of training. There is little of importance without it.

I recall the words of the Talmud on gratitude—"Into the well which supplies thee with water cast no stones."

Life, too, is not merely having and getting, it is rather being and becoming. And good character is what you are when no one is looking.

And life would be barren and dreary without good, genuine friends. I do not mean synthetic friends, so-called friends that are like sundials, useless after the sun sets. I have been blessed with many real friends. They are all about me tonight.

Forgive my moralizing. I do not want to appear like David and Solomon, who were in their youth rather wild and unbridled but who, in old age, were given to much philosophizing. I remember the doggerel:

"King Solomon and King David led very merry lives
With their very merry concubines and very many wives;
Till old age came upon them with its very many qualms,
Then Solomon wrote the proverbs and David wrote the psalms."

Finally, my greatest joy has been my wife and family—my wife, Stella, daughters Jane and Judith, my son-in-law, Sydney, and my grandchildren, Sue and Jill. All have brought me a harvest of happiness.

Stella has been over the years my earnest love and inspiration—inseparable from me as the tree from its roots or tongue from mouth or ship from rudder. She has brought balm to wounds, smoothed off the rough edges of adversity, darned up the raveled sleeve of care, and brought into our home loving kindness. She has been my shield, my sword. "Her price is far above rubies—strength and honor are her clothing."

There is no need for me to say more here and now; it is rather for all of us—you and me—to continue to do battle against the forces of evil; against oppression in man's inhumanity to man in whatever way each of us best can do.

Thank you. God bless you. God keep you.

A Salute to the New Federation in the Sun

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 23, 1959

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, the brazen sun beat down through the sweltering humidity of Port-of-Spain. It was an historic day, April 22, 1958. The multiracial people of Trinidad—Africans, East Indians, whites, Chinese, and every possible combination—were packed tight around the Red House, seat of the Government. Finally the moment all had been waiting for arrived. Princess Margaret, cool and dainty, unruffled by the heat, entered the hall, greeted the officials, then read in her small, girlish voice, "I now declare the Federal Legislature of the West Indies to be inaugurated." With these eventful words, an important step was taken in the development of democratic institutions in the Western Hemisphere—the Federation of the West Indies was created.

This new nation is a crescent-shaped constellation of islands stretching over the Caribbean Sea from Jamaica in the northwest to Trinidad in the southeast. Though divided by Caribbean waters, these antilles share a common beauty—a kaleidoscopic purple and green and blue brilliance of sea around them, mountains climbing steeply from the water, and lush green valleys lying between stony peaks.

The total land area of these islands is only some 8,000 square miles, about the size of New Jersey, but they are scattered over 550,000 miles of water. The people of the West Indies are mostly descendants of slaves brought over from Africa hundreds of years ago to work on sugar plantations. After the abolition of slavery, contract workers were imported from the East Indies, and today the East Indians compose a substantial portion of the population, together with a number of Chinese merchants, some British plantation-owning families, and some descendents of early French planters.

The West Indies are as poor as they are beautiful, with too many people, too few jobs, and a very high birth rate. The islanders, outside of Trinidad and Jamaica, subsist chiefly from farming, particularly sugar and fruit. Some employment is provided in the oilfields and at the asphalt lake in Trinidad and in the bauxite mines in Jamaica. But poverty grinds the ever-increasing population, manifesting itself in wretched living conditions, malnutrition, and tuberculosis.

It was these conditions that engendered the movement for federation. The individual islands by themselves were too small and weak to maintain viable economies. The old form of government, with each island or small group of islands forming a separate colony ruled directly from Great Britain, was a barrier to economic progress.

Farsighted thinkers proposed to unite all of these colonies into one federation, with the unified group of islands to enjoy greater powers of self-government. After 10 years of patient study, negotiation, conference, debate, and action, a federal constitution was adopted.

Under it, the federation is headed by a governor-general appointed by the British Crown, who is vested with exclusive powers over defense and foreign affairs. The governor-general can veto the acts of the Federal Parliament, although he is normally expected to act on the advice of the Prime Minister and his Cabinet. Each colony is represented by two members of the Senate, which has the power to delay the passage of laws for as much as a year but not to defeat legislation. The power to legislate for the federation resides in the house of representatives, which is popularly elected. Its jurisdiction on most matters of policy is shared with the legislatures of the individual states.

Since the governor-general has the power to veto acts of the federal parliament, as well as to conduct foreign affairs, the new constitution does not grant full self-government to the West Indies. Rather, it establishes a more moderate form of colonial government under which the islands can progress toward autonomy. If political developments are satisfactory, in 5 years the West Indies will become completely self-governing and gain dominion status within the British Commonwealth.

From its very beginning, the United States has maintained trade relations with the West Indies. In recent times, many Americans have visited these islands, both as tourists and as traders. Since the early stages of World War II, there have been a number of important defense arrangements with the United States which reflect the interdependent nature of security among the countries of the Western Hemisphere.

The United States, which also emerged from a federation of separate British colonies, congratulates the Federation of the West Indies on the first anniversary of its federal union and its initial step toward self-government and dominion status within the British Commonwealth of Nations. The economic and political problems confronting the new federation are strongly challenging.

The United States looks forward to being a good neighbor to the Federation of the West Indies.

Boleslaw F. Karpinski Honored

OF
HON. FRANK KOWALSKI
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 23, 1959

Mr. KOWALSKI. Mr. Speaker, a few nights ago in the city of New Britain, Conn., several hundred friends and admirers from all parts of my State gathered at a testimonial dinner honoring Boleslaw F. Karpinski—a man whose story is one of real Americanism.

"Professor" Karpinski, as he is saluted with affectionate respect in Connecticut, was born in Poland in 1881. He came to America as a youth and has lived in New Britain for the past 60 years.

Imbued with a deep love for his adopted country, "Professor" Karpinski spent most of his free time, after long days as a factory worker, in studying the history of the United States. It was a proud moment for him when, in 1911, he was granted American citizenship.

Once he became a citizen himself, this great American began devoting himself to the cause of helping other immigrants secure their citizenship. For the past 48 years, he has been conducting Americanization classes in New Britain and in that time he has helped prepare more than 5,000 men and women for the duties and responsibilities of American citizenship. Since 1930, his citizenship classes have been conducted under the auspices of the Pulaski Democratic Club.

Of the thousands of men and women trained for citizenship by "Professor" Karpinski, many have gone on to distinguish themselves in the business world, in the arts and sciences and in the profession. All who studied citizenship under his guidance are the better for having known him.

It was only appropriate at this testimonial dinner that "Professor" Karpinski should receive a gift from his former students and a gold medal from the Polish National Alliance, an organization which he has served devotedly for many years.

Mr. Speaker, when any of us hears doubts expressed about the future of this great country, let him remember that we have men like "Professor" Karpinski—a man whose whole life has been dedicated to our country.

It gives me great personal pleasure to add my salute to "Professor" Karpinski for his accomplishments. He truly represents the stuff of which the best of America is made.

We, in Connecticut, are proud to have "Professor" Karpinski as one of us. His life has been an example of what love of country can really mean.

REA in Puerto Rico

OF
HON. ALFRED E. SANTANGELO
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 23, 1959

Mr. SANTANGELO. Mr. Speaker, I have just returned from a 1-week trip to Puerto Rico with my colleague, H. CARL ANDERSEN, of Minnesota, in connection with the operation of the rural electrification program. As members of the House Appropriations Subcommittee of Agriculture, we are deeply concerned about the operation of the rural electrification program and the efficacy of its administration. We are pleased to report that the rural electrification program in Puerto Rico is making tremendous strides, is being completely administered, and is opening up a new world to the hill people and farm residents. While the electrification work has reached 50,000 rural homes in Puerto Rico, the Puerto Rico Water Resources Authority expects to accomplish the electrification of approximately 100,000 farms and mountain homes within the next 4 years.

Having visited the island 5 years ago, I can compare the present-day conditions and construction with those of 5 years ago. My colleague and I visited the hills of Narranhito and mountains of Barranquitos, the farms of Corozal and agricultural stations of Lojas. We have examined generating plants of Guayanilla and many transmission lines throughout the islands. We have observed the startling effects of electrification, not only on the physical aspects of the countryside, but also on the attitudes of the people and the appearances of the children.

Puerto Rico is undergoing a peaceful revolution, an economic and social revolution. Just as Christopher Columbus opened up a new world when he discovered Puerto Rico in 1493 so has the Puerto Rico water resources authority, assisted and aided by our loans from our Rural Electrification Administration, opened up a new world for the people and children in the hills and on the farms. No longer does nightfall bring darkness and boredom to the inhabitants of the farms and denizens of the hills. Rural electrification has brought light, activity, and opportunity for study. With electricity has come the use of various electrical appliances and expanding interests and activities. Television antennas sprout from mountain shacks and farm homes, and radios and musical boxes interrupt the stillness of the night. Freezers and refrigerators abound in homes and stores, thereby, preserving meats and food supplies which formerly spoiled and perished because of lack of refrigeration facilities. Clean-faced and sunburned schoolchildren, immaculately dressed despite sultry weather, display an alertness not formerly seen.

Several residents of New York, who formerly lived in my district, have returned to the mountains and resorts because electrification has brought a less burdensome way of life. Comforts and services which we take for granted on the mainland are slowly but surely coming to the Puerto Ricans in the hills and on the farms. The light which illuminates the home is also electrifying the spirits of the people, who do their chores willingly. When day is done, the farmer, the worker, and the schoolchild, with electricity in their homes, have an evening to look forward to. We observed purveyors of electric light bulbs and equipment demonstrating in the evenings the workings of simple electrical gadgets to an open-mouthed and interested gathering of weather-beaten men and inquisitive-looking youths. Even jukeboxes, with their raucous songs, put springs into the legs of a tired people after they have worked hard all day. Cares have disappeared with the banishment of darkness. These essential services are new to these people on the farms and in the hills. In the cities, and we drove through many, sprout many appliance stores, which sell these instruments and gadgets.

We also observed an expansion and improvement in the cattle industry, especially in the southwestern part of Puerto Rico. Herds of cattle, mostly Holsteins, lazily and leisurely scatter about the farmlands. The sugar production is still the most important industry in Puerto Rico, and we inspected various sugar plantations where young men and old in the blazing sun cut down with their machetes the sugar stalks to extract the juicy and succulent sugar.

In addition to the foregoing, my colleague, Congressman ANDERSEN, and I participated in a seminar on rural electrification. Representatives from Costa Rica, Panama, Brazil, Puerto Rico, and the United States delivered talks on various phases of rural electrification. This seminar provided not only a valuable interchange of ideas and information, but provided an opportunity for promotion of better pan-American feeling. Each country was ably represented and made a fine contribution. This seminar took place at La Parguera on the southern coast of Puerto Rico, which is an enchanting island, 40 by 100 miles.

Among those present and delivering prepared talks were Mr. David A. Hamil, Administrator of the Rural Electrification Administration, who demonstrated that he is an informed and able administrator, dedicated to his work; Sol L. Descartes, executive director of the Puerto Rico Water Resources Authority, who showed vision, grasp, and administrative ability; Clyde T. Ellis, general manager, National Rural Electric Cooperative Association; Brig. Gen. Herbert Davis Vogel, Chairman of the Board of Directors, Tennessee Valley Authority; Rafael R. Ramirez, head of the power division of the Puerto Rico Water Resources Authority; Victor M. Cataldo, head of the power utilization division of the Puerto Rico Water Resources Authority; Jorge Manuel Dengo, general manager of the Institute of Electricity of Costa Rica; Ricardo Arosemena, from Panama, chief engineer of the Inter-American Cooperative Service of Economic Development; Luiz Claudio de Almaida Magalhães of Brazil; Milton A. Chase, Assistant Chief of the Electric Engineering Division of the Rural Electrification Administration; Herman D. Plavnick, Assistant to Assistant General Counsel, Agricultural Credit and Conservation, U.S. Department of Agriculture; Dr. Jose Mariano Rios, sociologist and William H. Eastman, Director, Southeast Area, Rural Electrification Administration.

On April 16, Congressman ANDERSEN and I traveled to Ponce and Guayanilla to participate in the inauguration of the second unit in the South Coast Steam Electric Station. We represented the Congress and spoke to the large gathering attending the opening of this unit, which has a capacity of 50,000 kilowatts. Already in the outlying areas can be seen the spires of industrial plants ready to use this power.

Because of prior commitments, Governor Muñoz-Marín could not attend and was represented ably by Robert Sanchez Velilla, secretary of public works; Mr. Sol. L. Descartes, executive director of the Puerto Rico Water Resources Authority; and Mr. David Hamil, Administrator of the Rural Electrification Administration. The chairman for this function was Harold Toro, head of the Water Service Division, a man with a capacity of attending to many details.

Shortly after, we returned by plane to San Juan and visited the school lunch warehouses. Inasmuch as the school lunch appropriation program is within the jurisdiction of our subcommittee, we examined into the types of food which are being served to the 240,000 schoolchildren of Puerto Rico. Our contribution of $3 million for school lunch is matched by the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico. Dried eggs are a great source of satisfaction to the schoolchildren and to those in charge. Wheat, flour, cornmeal, powdered skim milk, dried milk and egg solids are served in abundance. The fact that these dried eggs were being produced in Minnesota, the State of my colleague, H. CARL ANDERSEN, and were preferred to products from other States, was of great satisfaction to Congressman ANDERSEN. It was with regret that we observed that corned beef was being obtained from Paraguay and not from the United States.

In both the electrification program and school lunch program, we asked for and were shown evidence that the United States contribution was recognized and publicized.

Despite a busy schedule, Governor Luis Muñoz-Marín found time to spend 3½ hours with us at his summer cottage. We discussed the past, present, and future of Puerto Rico and its relations to the United States. Inasmuch as Puerto Rico is excited today about its present and future status, we shall not set forth the Governor's thoughts and predilections. We did observe that many Puerto Ricans, proud of their United States citizenship, are encouraged by the admission of Alaska and Hawaii to the United States Union. They feel that the economy of Puerto Rico is adequate for them to take their place with us as a sister State. There are some who believe that the status of Commonwealth is at present the only realistic attitude. Others, and these seem to be a small minority, clamor for independence. Public officials feel that a plebiscite should be held to determine the desires of the people. Others feel that a plebiscite raises false hopes and is unrealistic.

I, for one, feel that we do not seek colonies, but wish our Territories and possessions to have common interests with us. However, what the people want should be our standard and their desires should be indicated through a plebiscite and then through their representative bodies.

This trip proved informative, interesting and helpful. We trust that lights shall continue to eliminate the darkness and that the light of understanding shall brighten the lives of Americans all, on the mainland and on the isle of Puerto Rico.

Dr. Adams, of Moses Lake—It's Surprising the Amount of Setbacks a Good American Can Endure and Still Love His Country

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BEN F. JENSEN

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 23, 1959

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, I here recite an interesting life story of a great American, Dr. Lytle S. Adams, of Moses Lake, Wash., as he told it to me, documented. I have had the rare privilege and great pleasure of knowing Dr. Adams for many, many years, and can vouch for his patriotism, honesty, and integrity.

His life is an outstanding example of the kind of mettle in man which has made America great. To date, his contributions to American progress have brought him small recognition and little compensation, except the personal satisfaction in knowing he has fought a good fight. Regardless of his many setbacks at the hands of individuals, as well as by his Uncle Sam, he still carries on at the age of 77 years young.

Mr. Speaker, I sincerely hope and pray the day will soon come when Dr. Lytle S. Adams will receive just recognition and compensation for all his good works. Surely he is rightfully and justly entitled to no less, even at this late date, for there has scarcely been a time in Dr. Lytle S. Adams' 77 years when he was not thinking of ways to serve others. Though an ambitious young man, he was thinking of the service he could render when he left his home in Kentucky to work his way through dental school at the St. Louis University.

Trained for service and filled with idealistic ambition he took his first bride to Parsons, Kans., and opened his first dental practice in 1906. On a visit to Los Angeles in 1911 he envisioned a thriving metropolis as it is today, instead of the orange groves and wheat fields before him. He stayed on to enter real estate. He saw on the rolling Palo Verde Hills, beautiful home sites as they now exist, when as an agent he sold that great estate.

It was the commission of that sale that enabled him to purchased the beautiful Pauma Valley Ranch of 13,500 acres in San Diego County; and he set about immediately to clear, subdivide, and develop it. During a dry season on the ranch he observed how small cactus plants sprang up in areas where they were not native from seeds contained in rabbit droppings. A germ of an idea thus conceived was to keep coming back to his inventive mind for nourishment and growth for years to come. Good fortune smiled but briefly. A flash flood in 1915 swept all evidence of his efforts away to sea, and his investment as well.

Dr. Adams was undaunted. He had designed a plow for bringing the rich subsoil to the surface for plant use. It was a good plow and adaptable to many uses. Dr. Adams went back to St. Louis, organized a company on limited capital to manufacture plows but was never able to produce and market them in sufficient quantities to make a go of it.

About 1922 Dr. Long, of the Long Bell Lumber Co., said to Dr. Adams in St. Louis, "I'm going out West to the State of Washington and start a new town. How about coming along to help?"

The call of the wild was too much for Dr. Adams. He moved his family bag and baggage to the new lumber town site of Longview, Wash., on the Columbia River. There was no means of transportation except by boat from the neighboring coast town of Long Beach. Dr. Adams thought they should have a road. He went to his friend, Mr. Long, who supplied dynamite, tractors, and other equipment, and with all volunteer labor, they built 65 miles of road through the wilderness from Longview to the sea, along the north bank of the Columbia River. This road though greatly improved is known today as the Ocean Beach Highway.

Watching the hook and grapple mechanism of a tractor during logging operations in the building of this road, another idea was born. Dr. Adams brushed it aside for a time as he sought to replenish a completely dwindled bank account. He took the examination before the State dental board to practice oral surgery and dentistry in the State of Washington and opened an office in Seattle.

That ball and grapple continued to haunt him. He was sure it could be used to pick up and deliver packages from an airplane without landing the plane. For several years he spent all his spare time and spare cash perfecting this device. Air Transport magazine records the first successful pickup tests in 1928:

PICKUP DEVICE PASSES SEATTLE TESTS SUCCESSFULLY—WILL ELIMINATE NECESSITY OF LANDING TO TAKE ON AND DISCHARGE MAIL

SEATTLE, WASH.—Successful tests of an airmail and general cargo pickup device for planes have been completed at Gorst Field here by Dr. Lytle S. Adams, the inventor, under the observation of William P. McCracken, of the U.S. Department of Commerce Division of Aeronautics, and C. M. Perkins, Seattle postmaster.

Trailing a steel cable catchline into the pickup chute, a Travelair OX5 biplane piloted by Clayton Scott, of Seattle Flying Service, snagged a 35-pound pouch of airmail without lowering the speed of the plane or causing it to settle. Tests with heavier loads will be conducted later.

With a little more than a handful of letters of introductions, Dr. Adams took the crude-looking device to New York and Washington, D.C. He had many setbacks, but if God ever gave the man anything more than a good supply of ideas, it was ample determination to carry out those ideas.

The Newark Star-Eagle in its Friday edition, December 14, 1928, carried a picture of three pilots, Don Brown, Capt. John O. Donaldson, and L. V. Rawlings, with the plane called the Postmaster, which they proposed to fly in an endurance test at Roosevelt Field, N.Y., refueling in the air and using the Adams pickup device which had been installed there to refuel their Travelair cabin monoplane while it was in flight. These trials are believed to be the very first refueling to be done while in flight.

Mrs. Harry S. New, wife of the Postmaster General, christened the Travelair cabin monoplane the Postmaster. At the christening ceremony Postmaster General New paid tribute in these words:

This is the last word in the land of invention for the benefit of the airmail. The realm of prophecy is always a dangerous one upon which to enter. No man can foretell the exact result of an experiment, and yet all progress is the result of invention and experiments. This plane, which has been adapted through the genius of Dr. L. S. Adams, of Seattle, to pick up fuel and useful loads from the ground while the plane is in motion, is an entirely new note. If successful, as we all hope it may be, and as it bids fair to be, Dr. Adams will have made a most substantial contribution to the transportation of useful loads through the air. We wish him all success.

Interested observers of these tests took Dr. Adams to the United States Lines. The pickup device was installed on the deck of the U.S.S. Leviathan and on June 7, 1929, the New York Journal issued a special aviation edition inaugurating the first ship-to-shore and shore-to-ship service by air. This special edition quoted men of prominence as saying on the occasion:

Ship-to-shore and shore-to-ship services by air offer many possibilities for expediting commerce and travel. The inauguration of this service in conjunction with the arrival of the Leviathan is an event worth commemorating. (Wm. P. MacCracken, Jr., Assistant Secretary of Commerce for Aeronautics.)

Inauguration of shore-to-ship mail service is but another example on the long step forward in fast mail service made possible by the utilization of the airplane as an agency of rapid transportation and American initiative in taking advantage of its possibilities. I wish this undertaking every possible success. (F. Trubee Davison, Assistant Secretary of War.)

The Wall Street financial crash of 1929 wiped out all the plans for the new Adams Air Express Co. that had just gotten under way and Dr. Adams had to start over again.

Many people believed in the pickup and helped Dr. Adams. Before an airmail contract could be obtained a company had to prove its ability to perform. Clifford Ball Airlines was interested and put in an installation on the Cleveland-Pittsburgh route No. 11 at Youngstown, Ohio, in 1929. Other installations were put into use at New Castle and Beaver Falls, Pa., along the same route in 1930.

At the World Fair in Chicago, Ill., 1932 to 1933, the airmail pickup made daily flights carrying souvenir mail cachets from the fair. This was done to raise funds to augment the necessary finances to carry on the demonstrations. Dr. Adams carried on his demonstration work for the postal service trying to obtain an airmail contract for more than 10 years. Dr. Adams' records show that on May 5, 1937, two companies were formed—Tri-State Aviation, an operating company, and All American Aviation, a patent holding company. Arthur P. Davis, Lytle S. Adams, and W. Edgar Leedy, Jr., were the incorporators. They also show that at the first meeting of the board of directors, May 1, 1937, "Dr. Adams was elected president and Mr. Davis, vice president and chairman of the board."

The service was taken to the remote areas in West Virginia, Pennsylvania, Kentucky, and Ohio, and an impressive experience record had been built up by 1938. During the 75th Congress a bill, H.R. 7448, was introduced; and in the hearings on this bill, March 1938, Dr. Adams' statement is of public record and show his untiring efforts to obtain an airmail contract.

Dr. Adams was forever in debt as was the operating company Tri-State Aviation. He was put in touch with Richard C. du Pont and after Mr. du Pont flew the route with Dr. Adams, he was most enthusiastic about the pickup and immediately put up the necessary money to keep Tri-State Aviation operating. Dr. Adams offered a 40 percent interest in both the companies. Although, Mr. du Pont had made a substantial loan—$45,000—to keep Tri-State operating, when it came to making a deal, Dr. Adams says Mr. du Pont was interested only in buying into the debt free patent holding company All American. This was a source of grave concern to Dr. Adams, for All American had no experience record with which to legally qualify as an airmail contractor.

At the time the contracts were finally awarded by the Post Office Department, the Du Pont company, according to Dr. Adams, used their influence to have the contract awarded to the patent holding company of All American Aviation. Over Dr. Adams' strenuous objections, the contract was awarded to the more financially stable company—but a company without the necessary performance record to qualify under the law.

Dr. Adams tried to keep alive the debt ridden Tri-State Aviation but it could not compete. All American had the airmail contract, which Dr. Adams felt had been earned by Tri-State and was financially secured by the Du Pont wealth.

Many differences arose from these two companies trying to operate over the same route—differences, legal and otherwise with which Dr. Adams' inventive mind had not been trained to cope. He claims he was finally forced to sell his complete interest in the All American Aviation, Inc. to Mr. du Pont, September 26, 1940. The terms of the contract were not simple, and by the time Dr. Adams gathered all the stock in the company to satisfy their requirements, considerable expense was involved and his receipts show that what he actually received from his interest was exaggerated by Mr. du Pont's following statement to the press:

The company in obtaining additional financing sold its treasury stock at $3 a share. Dr. Adams has obtained the same price for stock he has disposed of. On this basis he was paid $360,000 for his contribution to All American Aviation, Inc., which I believe is fair and adequate.

Dr. Adams says his net from the transaction amounted to only $37,000.

Dr. Adams again showed his ability to turn his back on disappointment by starting to work on a new service to mankind and another use for the airplane. That little germ of an idea of the little rabbit carrying cactus seeds around and distributing them on the land in pellet form could be made to serve mankind. He devised a machine for making the pellets of seed, soil, and fertilizer and a machine for distributing them from an airplane. He again approached the Government with the idea of revegetating the western rangeland.

World War II interrupted these plans, but Dr. Adams was sure he could help out in the war effort. He came up with the idea of using live bats as carriers for incendiary bombs. He communicated the the idea to President Roosevelt, who gave the "go ahead." Dr. Adams went right to work, ever confident that he was serving his country and that he would be paid for his services. All the money he could borrow from every source available he put into this project. He even mortgaged his home in Irwin, Pa. He recalls that he was assigned military men, equipment, and top priorities to carry out the project. He was certain his Government meant to pay him. He was sworn to secrecy and assured over and over that something was "being worked out for him financially." The war ended. He presented a claim for payment but the claim was turned down. Dr. Adams has not received payment of salary and expenses for work on this project.

The Internal Revenue Service had been busy while Dr. Adams was on his secret war project. He had not explained to the Bureau's satisfaction the money Mr. du Pont had told the press Dr. Adams had received from the sale of the All-American Aviation, Inc., stock. When he was available to answer their questions, they arrived at their own figure of $165,113.02 as an assessment. This figure seemed so fantastic, Dr. Adams was sure there would be no problem in explaining his situation. Explain? Yes. But proof was another thing. His wife was a good bookkeeper and kept all the records, but shortly thereafter she died. He hired a lawyer and an accountant and after going over the records they wrote Dr. Adams that they were "sure that you do not owe the Government anything." I will return to this later.

The pellet seeding was no longer an idea. The Interior Department was interested. Congress believed in it and appropriated $100,000 for an experimental contract in 1945. Seeds in such large quantities as required for the job were not available, a draught made seeding impractical, abrasives wore out the pellet wheels at a rapid pace, but a simple and flexible contract allowed for these setbacks and by 1947 over 50,000 acres had been seeded. The project received wide acclaim and publicity. Although, still in the experimental stage, the International Seed Pellet Co., formed to do the work, looked forward to a bright future.

The 1947 appropriation was for $200,000 to carry on this important work. Some 80,000 acres were seeded under this appropriation with a total expenditure of $112,844 of the $200,000 appropriated.

Congress further indicated their confidence in the aerial reseeding program by appropriating another $200,000 for 1948. Competition developed and two other companies with coated seed entered the field and private fliers wanted to bid. Dr. Adams says that restrictive specifications written to make possible these other companies to enter the field, ran up the International Seed Pellet Co.'s operating costs until it was impossible to carry out their contracts with any sign of profit. A letter from the bank financing Dr. Adams and the International Seed Pellet Co. protests this situation:

> Because of certain restrictions imposed by the Interior Department under these contracts as to time limit, delay in selection of areas, and final award of the contracts, the great distance of the seeding areas, the almost impossible weather conditions, and the necessity for unforeseen expenses in building roads, airstrips, etc., the contractor has operated at a loss.
> We are writing this letter in the hopes and because of your interest in the outcome of this enterprise, you will use your influence to have these contracts so drawn that it will enable the contractor to carry them through with a minimum of expense and with a sufficient time to do the work, taking into consideration all the factors as above stated.

Over 70,000 acres were seeded with earthen pellets and an expenditure of $98,225.25 was made. Due to the competitive bidding, contracts were let to coated seed companies and private flying organizations for aerial seeding. There was $65,000 left as a carryover of the appropriation. Near the completion of the final contract the equipment was snowed in and had to be left on the job until spring through the 1949 blizzard. The stranded men were dropped food supplies from the air. This contract was canceled and with it was dealt the crippling blow to the International Seed Pellet Co.

However, the Congress still had faith in this practical means to make the desert bloom and appropriated another $200,000 plus the balance of the 1948 carryover of $65,000 for the specific purpose of earthen pellets. The bids for this appropriation were never let. Dr. Adams carried on for nearly 2 years trying to salvage something from the operation. Finally, the bank foreclosed on the International Seed Pellet Co.'s equipment and all was lost. In addition, a deficiency judgment was obtained against Dr. Adams by the bank in the amount of $72,000.

Of the $700,000 appropriated for earthen pellets, only $297,366.25 was actually received by Dr. Adams, according to him hardly enough to pay for the equipment loss.

In August 1951 Dr. Adams again entered the practice of dentistry in the city of Seattle, after being away from it for nearly 25 years. He worked with other dentists, took refresher courses at night and opened his own office in Moses Lake, Wash., in the fall of 1953.

The tax account had not been resolved, liens were placed on the doctor's deceased wife's estate and it was sold at forced sale. Although the attorney and accountant were "sure the tax department does not have a case," they had to have payment to process the case.

Without funds to execute properly the tax case, he finally had to throw himself upon the mercy of the court. The case was sent to Seattle but the judge in Washington, D.C., refused to have his papers returned from the accountant. Dr. Adams did not have the $10,000 fee that the accountant was demanding. So without papers of proof the court in a stipulation reduced the claim from $165,113.02 to $17,240. In signing the stipulation, Dr. Adams states he was led to believe that in so doing the tax department would undoubtedly be persuaded to accept the money, held in the court in Pennsylvania from the sale of his deceased wife's estate, in the amount of $12,911.94 as a compromise settlement for the whole thing. Dr. Adams wrote the Internal Revenue Service to this effect. They have not answered his letter.

They did write Dr. Adams' creditor and dental supply houses indicating they had first priority on all of Dr. Adams' earnings. This though perfectly legal, falsely represents the facts, according to Dr. Adams. Dr. Adams had remarried in 1949 and the new community, under the laws of a community property State, is not subject to this old debt.

Ill health befell Dr. Adams in Moses Lake. He had two surgical operations within a 3-year period. Other taxes accumulated. Since his illness, however, he has paid off more than half of the new accumulation, leaving a balance of about $3,200. A heart attack in November last year has made it impossible for him to carry on his dental practice. It appeared that he would not be able to work again and a compromise offer was made to settle the old tax account which has now grown with interest from $17,240 to $42,000. He felt that if he could remove the stigma and worry of this old account that he would in some way find it easier to pay off the balance against this community. The following from a letter received from the Internal Revenue Department last week indicates the strain he is now laboring under as he tries to regain his health:

> Failure to reply promptly to this Office regarding the above-mentioned matters may result in our placing a lien and levy against your social security benefits. You are, therefore, respectfully advised to give this matter your immediate attention.

Dr. Adams has three small children, ages 5, 7, and 9, and he feels his social security is something he has earned for them. This could be a final blow from the Government, but, no, there is more.

Dr. Adams' one consolation has been that he has accomplished much and that these accomplishments would be recorded by history and live after him.

This hope was shaken last week by a visit Dr. Adams made to the Smithsonian Institution, to take a picture of a plane given in 1949 by his former pilot, Norman Rintoul. The plane was used in the airmail pickup system and was given as a memorial to Dr. Lytle S. Adams, inventor. The plane is still in storage, awaiting the construction of the new Aviation Building he was told, "but, a model of it is on display in the Aviation Building." The model, given by "All American Airways, in memory of Halsey R. Bazley, former president" has a plaque with data depicting the airmail pickup as dating 1939 to 1949.

The question was brought up in the office of the Smithsonian Institution, as to information they might have on the airmail pickup prior to its purchase by Mr. du Pont. He was told, "Oh, there wasn't any airmail pickup before All American, as far as we know."

Now Dr. Adams has no desire to detract anything from anyone who has contributed to the success of the air mail pickup service and there were many who gave unselfishly of their time and money to help develop the pickup system. He concedes that Godfrey Cabot, Richard C. duPont and Halsey R. Bazley have earned a place of honor for their many, many contributions to society.

Still it is a matter of public record that the patents on which the All American Pickup System was originally based were those of Dr. Lytle S. Adams and he spent more than 12 years perfecting and proving them—1927–40. These 12 years surely have their rightful place in the air mail history, not only as a necessary supplement but as a complement as well to the 10 years of All American.

As shown by his fully documented papers, Dr. Adams organized the first All American Aviation Co., and was the first acting president of it, long before Mr. duPont was approached for financing.

If we cannot count on history being more accurately recorded, what can our future generations hope for?

Though greatly incapacitated by physical illness, Dr. Adams' mind is still keen and he still has much to offer the world through the field of invention. He has again brought to Washington from the Northwest an ingenious plan to make the new State of Alaska accessible to year around surface transportation. The plan invisions: a double-deck all-weather highway, with a monorail freight and passenger service inclosed with the lower deck, and an automatic water hauling train for resupplying our rapidly falling water table. Transportation and conservation of our national resources are of vital interest to him and with little hope of remuneration, he has brought his new ideas to Congress in the hope that they may be used in the future development of our country.

Dr. Adams has retained his sweetness of soul, his loyalty to God and country through the seemingly impossible odds. In terms of service—he has given 77 years and is willing to continue to give—but for what?

Conference on India and the United States—1959

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHESTER E. MERROW
OF NEW HAMPSHIRE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 23, 1959

Mr. MERROW. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I call attention to the conference to be held on May 4 and 5 in Washington on India and the United States—1959. The conference is sponsored by the Committee for International Economic Growth.

No one can observe the march of recent events in Asia without realizing the pivotal importance of India to the future of freedom in that most populous region of the world.

Red China's massive economic push, achieved through the brutal regimentation of the Chinese people—and now Red China's ruthless subjugation of Tibet—have made it clear that Communist imperialism is on the move in Asia.

It seems to me vital for all of us to understand this, and to understand also the crucial role which the great parliamentary democracy of India can play in counteracting Communist influence throughout the whole subcontinent of southeast Asia.

In this connection I wish to call the attention of my colleagues to the letter of invitation recently received by all Members of the Congress from Mr. Eric Johnston, chairman of the Committee for International Economic Growth, inviting our attendance at a national conference on Indo-American cooperation in Washington on the 4th and 5th of May.

This Conference is sponsored not only by the private organization of which Mr. Johnston is chairman, but by such eminent institutions as the National Planning Association, the Stanford Research Institute, the Asia Foundation, and the Center for International Studies of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

The Conference will bring together some of the most eminent and distinguished authorities on India and Indo-American relations available in industry, the universities, labor, education, and other walks of life, both here and in India.

Their discussions will offer a unique opportunity to obtain authoritative information about the urgent problems of economic development confronting India today and may suggest new avenues of cooperation between that country and our own.

Certainly at this particular time, when events leave no doubt as to the importance of India in the community of free world nations, the calling of this conference is most fortunate. I can think of no more effective way of producing the facts on which sound judgment about Indo-American relations can be based.

Since we may all be called upon to make such a judgment in the months ahead, I hope as many Members of this body as possible will take advantage of the opportunity offered by the initiative of the distinguished citizens associated with Mr. Johnston in the Committee for International Economic Growth.

Washington Report

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BRUCE ALGER
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 23, 1959

Mr. ALGER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following newsletter of April 25, 1959:

WASHINGTON REPORT
(By Congressman BRUCE ALGER, Fifth District, Texas)

Legislative activity now is mostly in the committees' study of spending bills. Many big spending proposals are marking time as Members of both Houses of Congress weigh the temper of the citizens. The Johnson resolution proposed by the Senate majority leader is indicative of this new stop, look, and listen attitude. This resolution is intended to set up a joint legislative-executive commission composed of leaders of business and labor "charged with the responsibility of visiting * * * centers of abnormal unemployment" to "taste, smell, feel, and hear the despair of those parts of the country where men and women cannot find work * * * required to report back to Congress within 60 days." Tied to these findings are listed a depressed areas Federal aid bill, a housing bill, acceleration of public works, and other Federal expenditures. There are, as usual, the two fallacious underlying assumptions: (1) That Government is responsible for providing jobs for everyone, and (2) that throwing Federal money at a problem will solve it. Forgotten apparently are the two current studies, one by the joint House-Senate Economic Committee on maximum employment and a second by the Cabinet Committee on Price Stability for Economic Growth. These two studies are already underway. The Johnson resolution thus has the earmarks of political expediency.

My suggestions are: (1) Get the findings of the two committees already authorized; (2) study areas of full employment to learn techniques, new products, and "lessons of success" that can be transplanted to underemployment areas; (3) study unemployment figures to learn actually the correct extent of unemployment, recognizing that at least 2½ to 3 million unemployed is normal in a 68 million work force; take into account the fact that anyone over 14 not working and seeking a job is listed as unemployed, that many others are secondary or part-time workers, such as housewives, seasonal workers, and other workers by choice; (4) reduce, not increase, Federal spending, so that we live within our means, cut the debt and cut taxes, thus restoring State and local government strength and preserving the value of the dollar; (5) remember that Congress, not the President, controls spending, taxes, and the national debt. (Item.—Since 1900, the 32 Democrat years of Congress control have seen a debt increase of $284 billion and in 26 Republican years a debt decrease of $6 billion—significant or not?)

The need for a labor bill to control dictatorial labor leaders and monopolistic unions was never better demonstrated than as a result of Harry Bridges' (head of the ILWU) testimony before a House committee this week. He showed a ready willingness to take action directly contrary to U.S. Government policy, if he personally saw fit. Of course, it is not unusual for union leaders to act as though above the law, but it is not right. Such arrogant dictatorial flouting of the national interest must be curtailed, even as union lawbreaking and violence must not go unprosecuted here at home. It's up to the Congressmen now to write a law providing this protection.

In testimony against a civil rights bill before the House Judiciary Subcommittee, I pointed out that (1) the timing is wrong; ((a) we just passed a bill; (b) we haven't weighed the Civil Rights Commisison findings); (2) the pending bills give the Attorney General unlimited discretionary power to sue citizens ((a) defendant would be pitting his own resources against the U.S. Treasury; (b) there is no limit to staff and expense the Attorney General can use); (3) both political parties are trying to garner the Negro vote and political expediency in this field can jeopardize all the civil rights we enjoy; (4) what civil rights are we talking about, other than voting—freedom of speech, assembly, press, worship—what? (5) Federal laws, nonconforming to local custom and usage, like prohibition, are unenforceable: You can't safely or successfully legislate social customs.

(6) The 10-point code of ethics for Government employees should be taken to heart by all public servants. These include: Put loyalty to the highest moral principles and to country above loyalty to persons, party, or Government department; give a full day's labor for a full day's pay, giving to the performance of his duties his earnest effort and best thought; make no private promises of any kind binding upon the duties of office, since a government has no private word which can be binding on public duty; seek to find and employ more efficient and economical ways of getting tasks accomplished; and uphold these principles, ever conscious that public office is a public trust.

We should not lose our capacity to become angry over malfeasance in office, nor should we tolerate cynicism. In our country, actually everyone has a part in government.

Food for Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. STEVEN V. CARTER
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 23, 1959

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, today I introduced in the House a companion bill to the proposed Food for Peace Act which has been introduced in the Senate by the Honorable HUBERT H. HUMPHREY. I might say in the outset that Senator HUMPHREY has put a tremendous amount of effort and study into this bill and deserves the wholehearted appreciation and support of everyone interested not only in a solution to the problems of the world's starving people, but also the problems of American farm surpluses.

The purpose of the Food for Peace Act is to so amend and revise Public Law 480 as to make it a more effective instrument for using the U.S. surplus of food and fiber to help build essential world conditions of peace and freedom and thereby strengthen and promote foreign policies of the United States. It is intended to enable the United States to promote more effectively the economic and social development of friendly nations and to lead the way in cooperation with other nations toward the abolition of human hunger.

Under this proposed legislation, a Peace Food Administration would be established in the Executive Office of the President, headed by a Peace Food Administrator to aid the President in carrying out the purposes of the act and also the purposes of section 402 of the Mutual Security Act of 1954, as amended. There would also be created an interdepartmental Peace Food Policy Committee to advise and consult with the Peace Food Administrator and also a Peace Food Advisory Committee consisting of representatives of private U.S. groups and organizations.

Mr. Speaker, all of us fully realize the burdens that our terrific surpluses of food and fiber place upon us. We must consider the burden to the producer of agricultural commodities, the burden to the taxpayer who has to share the cost of storage and maintenance of surplus stock piles, our burden as a leader of nations in trying to promote the cause of freedom and democracy in areas where people are starving to death at the same time that we are sitting on top of $9 billion worth of edible or usable surpluses.

Before coming to Congress, I knew of the provisions of Public Law 480 and thought that they were adequate to properly distribute our surplus food to needy peoples all over the world. I thought that our failure to more adequately dispose of our surpluses was because of political considerations which made it inadvisable to distribute these things to needy people. Now I find that this is not true, that the failure to more effectively distribute our surplus agricultural commodities has apparently been due to the fact that there was no single authority charged with this responsibility. It is my opinion that the proposed Food for Peace Act will be a great stride in the direction of meeting our moral obligations as a leader of nations, as well as helping us to solve what has become a tremendous domestic economic problem. Surely, anyone from the most erudite academician to the most uninformed member of our populace must ask why it is that people are starving throughout the world while we, the United States, are blessed—or cursed, as the case may be—with our tremendous surpluses, and why these foods are not being made available for those starving people. It is a very simple, and yet, extremely valid question. This piece of legislation will go far in providing a solution to the problem.

The Medical Education Situation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARK W. THOMPSON
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 23, 1959

Mr. THOMPSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I am interested in the medical education situation in the United States, particularly because the University of Texas Medical School is in Galveston, my hometown. With no little concern I have noted in recent months that the medical profession has been under attack in several areas of the press. As a result, I conferred with Dr. John Truslow, director of the Texas University Medical School, and then prepared seven questions dealing with medical education throughout the country, with a view to ascertaining whether sufficient qualified doctors are being produced to meet the needs of our rapidly growing population. I submitted these questions to Dr. F. J. L. Blasingame, of Wharton, Tex., an old friend and constituent of mine who went to Chicago a year ago to assume the responsibilities as executive vice president of the American Medical Association. I have complete confidence in Dr. Blasingame and his answers to the questions I submitted are very gratifying to me.

I was pleased to learn that since World War II there has been an increase in approved medical schools; that there is a substantial increase in medical students; and that, contrary to certain reports, the American Medical Association exercises no control over the number of students admitted to medical schools. There is much other valuable information in Dr. Blasingame's reply and I believe it will do much to eliminate certain misconceptions about the medical profession. Under leave previously granted, I insert my letter to Dr. Blasingame and his reply:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., March 9, 1959.

F. J. L. BLASINGAME, M.D.,
Executive Vice President,
American Medical Association,
Chicago, Ill.

DEAR DR. BLASINGAME: My attention has been called to a number of bills introduced in the 86th Congress affecting directly, or indirectly, the medical profession.

As a result, I wish to obtain certain information on the present supply of doctors in the United States and to ascertain as far as possible the prospects for an adequate supply of physicians to meet the needs of our growing population.

So I am calling on you, not only as executive vice president of the American Medical Association, but as my old friend and my loyal constituent to supply me with the information. On a separate sheet, I am submitting questions that occur to me in this connection. I know you can provide the facts; facts that should be made known to Congress before action is taken to consider legislation affecting the medical profession.

I am writing this after a conference with our mutual friend, Dr. John Truslow, head of the University of Texas medical branch in Galveston, who called on me today.

I will appreciate your answering these questions and will further appreciate any other information you might give me that is relevant.

I want to say that I think you did a courageous thing in sacrificing your substantial private practice in Wharton to take over the direction of the AMA. I wish you great success.

Dr. Truslow joins me in sending you our best wishes,

Sincerely yours,

CLARK W. THOMPSON.

AMERICAN MEDICAL ASSOCIATION,
Chicago, Ill., April 16, 1959.

Hon. CLARK W. THOMPSON,
House Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN THOMPSON: Thank you for your recent letter and your interest in medical education.

It is indeed a pleasure to bring you an up-to-date report on the status of medical education in the United States. As you know, I am proud of the accomplishments of our medical schools and have great faith in their ability to train enough physicians to meet the needs of our growing population.

You asked seven important questions about the medical education picture. Let me answer them one by one.

First, has the number of physicians graduated from approved medical schools kept pace with the growth of the Nation's population? Over the long haul, the increase in medical graduates is much greater proportionately than is the increase in the population. From 1920 to 1958, the percentage of increase in medical graduates from approved schools was 125 percent, compared with a 64-percent increase in population. In the past 20 years, the percentage figures are fairly comparable: 32.1-percent increase for medical graduates; 33.4-percent increase for population.

The future, I believe, looks bright. Each year, for the past 11 years, the number of students enrolled in approved medical schools has increased. This boost in enrollment amounts to 29.6 percent (from 22,739 to 29,473).

Your second question was whether medical schools seek to restrict the number of medical students. Two factors make it necessary for a school to establish an arbitrary top enrollment figure: facilities and budgetary funds available to operate the school. Each school faculty determines the number of students who can have a sound education with the faculty personnel and the facilities available to the school.

Medical education is a graduate educational experience following the completion of the regular college course, and because of the subject matter covered requires individual and small group instruction. To turn out well-trained, highly-qualified physicians the school requires a large faculty of skilled educators, plus sufficient teaching and research laboratories, hospital beds and clinical patients. The number of students that can be taught must be necessarily restricted to fit the facilities so that the emphasis can be on quality of the graduate rather than on the quantity of students.

Third, you asked: What is the ratio between applicants to medical schools and those accepted? The answer is 1.97 (15,791 applicants for first year medical school to 8,030 places available). This ratio has remained about the same for the past 5 years.

Incidentally, a common confusion that arises in discussing applicants to student ratio is mistaking applications for people (applicants). Each person applies, on the average, to four medical schools. Thus, for the 1957–58 academic year, the 15,791 applicants filed a total of 60,946 applications.

Next, you asked if it is true that only students with an A college academic record are accepted into medical school. That has never been true. About one-sixth of the entering medical students for the whole country have A college records; about two-thirds have B records and about one-sixth have C records.

Your fifth question was: Is the number of medical schools increasing in the United States? In 1944, there were 77 approved medical schools, including eight 2-year schools from which students had to complete their final 2 years of medical education in any of the 69 4-year schools. In 1958, there were 85 approved medical schools. Eighty-one are 4-year schools; only four 2-year schools.

Two other schools are under development. As a step toward still further expansion of medical school facilities, the American Medical Association last year urged "institutions of higher education where medical education has not been undertaken in the past to give serious consideration to the development of opportunities in the field."

Sixth. Has the American Medical Association anything to do with the number of enrollments in medical schools? Enrollments are strictly determined by each individual medical school. Neither the universities nor their medical schools would permit an intrusion into their academic freedom by a national professional association.

Your final question asked whether I think it is necessary for Federal funds to be provided for medical schools. The medical profession welcomes one-time Federal grants for medical school construction and renovation as well as Federal grants for basic research. The profession has been opposed to continuing Federal aid for operating expenses because of the potentialities therein for Federal control.

I should like to point out that the National Fund for Medical Education, which raises funds from industrial sources, and the American Medical Education Foundation, which raises funds from the medical profession, have made grants in excess of $10 million to medical education over the past 8 years.

I hope this information will aid you in analyzing bills introduced in the 86th Congress which pertain to the training of physicians. As further background, I am sending along a copy of the most recent annual report prepared by our council on medical education and hospitals, which was published in the Journal of the American Medical Association, November 15, 1958. It provides additional data that you might find useful.

I am happy that you wrote me after conferring with our mutual friend, Dr. John Truslow. If I can provide any additional information, please make your wishes known.

Sincerely yours,

F. J. L. BLASINGAME, M.D.

Excerpts From Remarks of Hon. Charles A. Halleck, of Indiana, House Republican Leader, Before the Indiana Republican Editorial Association Dinner, Saturday Evening, April 18, 1959, at Indianapolis, Ind.

OF

HON. E. ROSS ADAIR

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 23, 1959

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks, I am submitting a statement of excerpts from an excellent and timely speech made by the Honorable CHARLES A. HALLECK, minority leader of the House of Representatives, before the Indiana Republican Editorial Association dinner meeting at Indianapolis, Saturday evening April 18.

In addition to Mr. HALLECK's speech, I also wish to include in the RECORD the formal resolutions adopted by the Indiana Republican Editorial Association at this meeting. I believe they will be of interest not only to my Republican colleagues but to those Members of the House on the other side of the aisle.

Mr. HALLECK delivered an important address to the editors of this association which is the oldest political editorial association in the United States. The occasion was the annual spring meeting of the association. In addition to the Hoosier editors present, the Governor of the State, the Honorable Harold Handley, and my Republican colleague in the House of Representatives, the Honorable WILLIAM BRAY, were among those outstanding dignitaries who attended the banquet.

The excerpts from our minority leader's address are as follows:

EXCERPTS FROM REMARKS OF HON. CHARLES A. HALLECK, OF INDIANA, HOUSE REPUBLICAN LEADER, BEFORE THE INDIANA REPUBLICAN EDITORIAL ASSOCIATION DINNER, SATURDAY EVENING, APRIL 18, 1959, AT INDIANAPOLIS, IND.

The Republican press of Indiana receives my heartfelt thanks for fighting the good flight, year after year, to build the progress of our State and Nation on a sound and sensible basis. You carry on our Hoosier tradition of effective personal journalism, bringing further honor to Indiana which is known nationwide as the State where good newsmen are born.

The Republican press has a vital role in the campaign for the Republican victory we will win in 1960, in presenting the facts on State and national affairs to the public, giving them the fullest possible coverage day after day, week after week in their news columns, and in properly interpreting these facts through pertinent editorial comment.

We Republicans deal in truth, while too many Democrats peddle distorted propaganda. We must redouble our efforts to combat fiction with fact.

As you battle for Republican principles in your home towns, Republican Congressmen and Senators are fighting the same battle, shoulder to shoulder, in the Nation's Capitol.

In spite of the unpleasantness last November, morale and party unity among Republicans in the Congress are at a high pitch and are constantly increasing. We are not hyphenated Republicans. We are Republicans, period.

We are fighting the efforts of the Democrat spenders to wreck the Nation by their extravagance.

We stand united behind President Eisenhower in his efforts to balance the budget, to provide a sound and well-balanced national defense, and to stand firm against the Communist menace.

Rollcall votes show how Republicans, representing different sections of the Nation, often with diverse interests, are standing together and voting together.

This display of unity should be an example to party leaders. A party which has just lost an election cannot afford faction and fratricide. All over the Nation, the hatchets should be buried deep underground, and party harmony must be the watchword. But in this process, every effort should be made to evaluate properly and correct any mistakes of the past, if any there have been. The views of all responsible people in our party should be solicited and considered as we prepare for the future.

As we Republicans move forward together, the Democrats and their party move farther and farther apart. The differences between the Democrat conservatives from the South, and the labor-boss-dominated radical wing of their party are now in the irreconcilable stage. They have nothing in common but their party label.

The Democrats are both the party of the repudiator and the budget buster.

Democrat leaders are repudiating each other right and left. Paul Butler has repudiated the southern Democrats, and they have washed their hands of him with a very strong detergent.

Senator LYNDON JOHNSON and Speaker SAM RAYBURN have just about repudiated the programs of the Democrat advisory council.

LYNDON JOHNSON has been repudiated by Senator PROXMIRE and other Democrat Senators. Mrs. Roosevelt has repudiated Senator KENNEDY, and so on indefinitely. Democrat Senators are playing politics as they jockey for position in the presidential race.

In contrast, Republicans are working together.

The Republican minority in Congress is building a record, a Republican record, to present to the voters in 1960—the year in which another Republican President will assume his duties at the White House, and after which Democrat ex-Congressmen will no longer be able to collect Government rent for their front porches.

The first part of the Republican record for 1960 is our valiant fight against reckless, wasteful spending—the Republican fight to keep the cost of living down for the low-income family, for the American farmer who has so long been the victim of Democrat inflation and Democrat farm policies.

Balancing the budget is a right thing in itself. Every Government unit, just like every family and every business, should live within its income.

You can get by with overspending for a short period, sometimes, but the time soon comes when it catches up with you. After more than two decades of Democrat extravagance, it has caught up with our Nation.

Democrats have controlled the Congress which controls the Nation's spending for the past 4 years plus, and for 22 years of the past 26. Only the Republican Congresses have cut Government spending and reduced taxes.

A balanced budget now offers the only hope for tax reduction in the future. Unbalanced budgets will lead inevitably to a furthur crushing burden of taxation.

I have received thousands of letters, from those the Democrats would call "little people," but whom I prefer to designate as thinking, articulate American citizens. I have been heartened by the overwhelming support of these people for President Eisenhower's program of a balanced budget, to hold down the high cost of living. People are appalled by Democrat extravagance. They place the blame where it should rest and call the Democrats the spenders.

We stand firm for a strong foreign policy, the Republican policy of John Foster Dulles. We clearly recognize that the world's best hope for continued peace is a policy of strength toward Russia and Red China. We realize that weakness and appeasement will lead inevitably to war.

The Republican Party believes in a strong national defense and trusts the judgment of President Eisenhower, the Nation's greatest military expert, in regard to the kind and amount of defense that is needed, over that of such armchair strategists as Paul Butler, Jake Arvey, and Adlai Stevenson.

We recognize the need for effective labor-management reform legislation to protect the rank-and-file union worker, the small businessman and the general public from the abuses which have been so vividly uncovered at the McClellan committee hearings. But we know that it is going to be an uphill fight to get such legislation this year when so many of the Democrat majority in Congress are so deeply indebted to COPE and other like organizations.

As Republicans, we are firm believers in the individual enterprise system.

We know that it is the system that has made our Nation great and has resulted in the highest standard of living ever known in the history of the world.

We have built a record of resistance to the wild-eyed schemes of leftwingers who would lead us further down the pink path toward socialism. We are sincere optimists with confidence in the future of America. We will never sell our Nation short. The United States is at peace. And it is a Republican peace with honor. We are enjoying good times, with a strong economy and a secure defense.

Democrat runaway inflation has been slowed to a turtle crawl.

The vast majority of American citizens is sharing the benefits of prosperity and security. Our Republican record is one to which we can point with pride. Let's brag about it.

With the cooperation of the Republican press we will put our message across to the people. The public will judge correctly, and the result will be a Republican victory in 1960 from the courthouse to the White House.

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED BY THE INDIANA REPUBLICAN EDITORIAL ASSOCIATION

The Indiana Republican Editorial Association, in convention assembled in the city of Indianapolis, on Saturday, April 18, 1959—

Resolves, That unity and harmony in the party are essential to the success that its principles deserve and for which all loyal Republicans stand, above self and selfish interests; and that therefore we urge our members to support a unified party, and insist that all elements lay aside differences if any in support of the traditional unity and party principles.

We take pride in the resolute course throughout the recent session of the General Assembly of Indiana by Gov. Harold Handley, Lt. Gov. Crawford Parker, the Republican majority and leadership in the State senate, and the house minority, which working together preserved a degree of economy, a record of accomplishment, and solvency for Indiana's State government. To Republican leadership and organization our State owes today the fact that ours is one of the few States where no new taxes were created, and that we will continue to have an enviable record of low taxes per capita.

Republican State administration and assembly are congratulated on their successful effort to continue making Indiana attractive to industrial expansion and more employment, and in continuing the freedoms and rights of organized workers traditional to America. We submit that the guaranties to workers of unfettered organization and to employers of favorable tax rates and a minimum of dictatorial government create a favorable climate for industry and industrial employment, and therefore a growing population in direct contrast to other States which are being abandoned by industry.

The Republican leadership of State and assembly has been able to support and improve the educational system without damaging the State solvency, and to provide for the constructive improvement of flood control on a permanent and workable basis for the first time.

We note the bankruptcy that threatens at least one neighboring State under principles and controls of a type repugnant to Americans, and propose that no effort shall be spared to resist encroachment of vast political slush funds and alien idealogies across State lines to prostitute and enslave Hoosier voters, and our government.

We applaud the wise and experienced counsel of President Eisenhower and Secretary of State John Foster Dulles, that has charted our successful course through troubled international waters by a foreign policy that has avoided with dignity threatening conflicts throughout the world.

We declare our confidence in the Republican delegation in Congress, and congratulate its dean and able leader, the Honorable CHARLES A. HALLECK, on his well-merited election as Republican leader, the responsibility that he has shared with distinction for many years.

We approve the efforts to assist the individual farmer on the family-sized farm in working out his economic ills, and we particularly urge that the farmer's freedom and independence be protected. We recognize that the farmer is an important segment of Indiana economy and that the general prosperity is greatly affected by the farmer's receiving fair prices for his large investment and hard work. Sound, workable solutions to the changing farm problems should be sought and would be found feasible by a Republican Congress, to protect and encourage an agriculture that has provided the most abundant supply of food and clothing in the world's history. We cite and approve the search for new markets and new uses for farm products as proposed by our own U.S. Senator HOMER E. CAPEHART.

We resolve that our national strength must be preserved by balanced budgets and tax economy achieved by wise and careful reduction of irresponsible cash gifts at home and abroad that have continued for years, except under a Republican Congress, to place unbearable burdens on the shoulders of our unborn descendants; thus to free private earnings for reinvestment, to provide jobs and build production.

We urge that all Americans testify to their pride in American leadership in the world, and in our way of living that means a better life for everyone, rather than dictatorship that excels in a few token but often meaningless feats and easy life for a chosen few, but deceit and hunger for the people.

We recall that 100 years ago when the infant Republican Party sustained severe losses at the polls, and Abraham Lincoln lost election to the U.S. Senate, there followed the opening of a new era of usefulness for the principles for which they both stood. This year of Lincoln's sesquicentennial illuminates this example, and the events of neither year are accidental. Victory rode, and will ride on the affirmation of principles. The country needs the firm foundation of the Republican Party, which saved the Nation with Lincoln and still stands ready to serve an ideal immeasurably higher than the gratification of personal wants and personal ambitions. Elections are lost because of failures to stand for something. What a Republican Party offers and must stand for are constitutional responsibility, fiscal stability, exaltation of freedom as a way of life, all of which have been guaranteed through the Republican Party in history, and by its record of administration today: So finally we Resolve, That this organization call upon Republicans of all shades of opinion to place party above self, to shun expediency, embrace principle and stand immovable against influences that would dislodge them from the unrepealable political truths that are the beacons of our party's service to the Nation. Likewise we would call upon all citizens of all shades of political beliefs to applaud with their support the party of the people's rights and of world peace, and American freedom from the tyranny of the petty as well as the strong, the party of achievement today, rather than of weak dependence on a better tomorrow.

The Universal Message of Mohammed Iqbal, Poet-Philosopher of Pakistan

OF

HON. WALTER H. JUDD

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 23, 1959

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address given at the Islamic Center in Washington on the 21st anniversary of the death of Mohammed Iqbal, who combined in an inspiring way the mysticism of the East and the realism of the West. His roots were in the Muslim faith and culture but his message was to all mankind:

THE UNIVERSAL MESSAGE OF MOHAMMED IQBAL POET-PHILOSOPHER OF PAKISTAN

(Address of WALTER H. JUDD, Member of Congress, at the Islamic Center, Washington, D.C., April 21, 1959)

Your Excellencies, ladies and gentlemen, we are living today in a world of unprecedented ferment and change. A large part of mankind has just begun to breathe the intoxicating air of human freedom. At the same moment another large section of human beings is being forced to don prison garb, regimented and driven like beasts of burden. Important segments of the world's population are being forced by events to decide whether they can best attain their hoped-for political and economic development by democratic or by authoritarian means.

In such times as these, it is a good thing for us to pause to contrast the eternal truths preached by the great spiritual leaders of mankind with the crass ideologies of those who would crush the human spirit and make man an instrument for the creation of a soulless state.

After all, what is man? That is the question asked by man himself, universally.

Some years ago I heard the eminent Lebanese philosopher, Dr. Charles Malik, now President of the United Nations General Assembly, say that when the Conference on Human Rights convened in Paris after World War II, the delegates spent several months trying, in vain, to agree on an answer to that ultimate question. For how could they declare what the rights are to which a human being is entitled until they decided what a human being is?

One of the great spirits of modern times to whom free men can go for renewal of their faith in God and in man, was the Muslim poet whose memory we revere tonight. Mohammed Iqbal, the man who dreamed a dream for the Muslims of the south Asian subcontinent and whose dream became reality in the creation of the nation of Pakistan, held no brief for those who would attain even the precious goals of political and economic independence by destroying the identity of the human being. Rather did he sing of the sanctity of human life, of the grandeur of the human self, and of the inviolability of the human personality.

Like all who profess the Jewish, the Christian, or the Muslim faith, Mohammed Iqbal conceived of man as being created in the image of God. In the core of his philosophy he held that the human personality, being created in the image of God, should be developed in a way to prove itself worthy of being in that image. Those things which fortified the human personality, said Iqbal, were good; those which weakened it were bad. Is there a better test?

His concept of the nature of man reminds those who have American heritage of the words of those who founded our Nation. "We hold these truths to be self-evident," they said, "that all men are created * * *." They based their whole venture on that great act of faith: that there is a Creator, that man is His child and therefore partakes of His nature. Man has from his Creator the capacity to make moral judgments and decisions. Man can become more and more like his Creator, if he will. To do so is the deepest joy and the richest fulfillment of life. And the more man becomes one with God, the more he becomes one with all mankind.

The faith regarding the nature of man, and of God, and of the universe that filled Iqbal in Asia and inspired the founders of the United States in the Western Hemisphere, is being everywhere coldly and cruelly challenged today. The conflict tearing the world apart is not an old-fashioned struggle for control of land; it is for control of man—the mind of man, the soul of man, the whole of man.

Another great son of Pakistan, Gen. Ayub Khan, now its president, said to a group of us in Lahore one night in 1953, "The time has come in this world struggle when all those who believe in one God, the God of justice and of righteousness—whether Muslims, Christians, or Jews—must stand together against those who believe in no God."

We need to sit at the feet of men like Iqbal whose profound insights and inspiring words help us see afresh not the minor things that separate us—whether race, nationality, language, or culture—but the deep things that unite us—our common faith in God and our common humanity.

Mohammed Iqbal was an extraordinary man in the breadth of his interests and the scope of his accomplishments. He was at once a great poet, a great philosopher, a great lawyer, and a great political thinker. But most of all, he was a great human being, a man who saw as the most significant of human rights the opportunity to serve humanity.

Born in Sialkot, West Pakistan, in 1873, Iqbal received his intermediate education in a Scottish mission school. Here he came under the influence of the prominent Muslim scholar, Mir Hasan—an inspiring personality who perceived the genius of the poet and molded it.

Finishing his distinguished career at school he joined the Government College, Lahore, where he came in contact with another magnetic personality, Professor Sir Thomas Arnold, who was said to be an embodiment of all that was "the noblest and the best" in Western civilization.

Iqbal's love and appreciation of Eastern values and of Western disciplines, his desire to break down the barriers between East and West, his desire to see his country play its full part in the establishment of world peace, may be related largely to these early influences of his two great teachers.

Equipped with the idea of one humanity and one God as the basis of Muslim culture, which he learned at the feet of Mir Hasan, and the scientific approach of the West to the problems of life, which he gained from Professor Arnold, Iqbal went to Cambridge in 1905. For his further researches he went to Munich where he submitted his thesis, "The Development of Metaphysics in Persia," and obtained his doctorate in philosophy. That same year he was called to the bar, and the mind that had shown its grasp of philosophical ideas and its sensitivity to the things that are not seen, now revealed its ability to master practical legal issues.

Dr. Iqbal returned to India and started his practice at Lahore. He also was professor of oriental learning at the University of the Punjab. He entered political life in 1927 when he was elected to the Punjab Legislative Council, and remained a member for three years. He was elected president of the annual session of the Muslim League held at Allahabad in the year 1930. In his presidential address, he demanded "the formation of a consolidated Muslim State in the best interest of India."

Unfortunately, Iqbal did not live long enough to see the results of his efforts. From 1934 onwards his health deteriorated; he could not accept an invitation to Oxford as Rhodes lecturer in 1935. On the morning of April 21, 1938, his body breathed its last. But his words, like his spirit, will be immortal.

Iqbal's philosophy of life accepted the principles of freedom, equality, and love as the basis of world brotherhood. His concept for the new country of Pakistan, whose formation he did so much to inspire, was the establishment of a society deeply interested in the service of humanity, in the promotion of peace and in providing equal opportunities for all, irrespective of color, caste or creed. There was no conflict in him, as there need be none in you or me, between love of country and love of mankind. To work for the proper interests of one was to promote the well-being of the other.

Iqbal devoted the greater part of his life to giving people a faith in such an ideology of love and peace. His poems continue to speak that message to all men of all continents and cultures today.

Iqbal's faith in humanity was not misplaced. Along with the great cleavages that exist in the world today and occupy most of our attention, there is, nevertheless, a vast movement among the free peoples of the world to understand each other, to respect each other, and to inspire in each other mutual confidence and trust. It goes beyond mere tolerance of other cultures than one's own; there is increasing appreciation of other cultures—and the values in them. Understanding, appreciation, confidence, and trust are the spiritual foundations for any world order that is to withstand the ideological onslaughts of those who worship the material state and are determined to impose it on all mankind.

We Americans, as we take part in this tribute to the great poet-philosopher of Pakistan, are grateful that our own national leadership is alive to the need for the peoples of the world to know each other better. The President of the United States has advocated that people of all nations seek each other out and learn more of each other not by just one method, but by thousands of methods. This people-to-people diplomacy, which is certainly in the spirit of Iqbal's concept of the universality of mankind, can become a powerful force in determining the course of world events. Even tyrannies eventually have to pay some attention to changing attitudes and wishes among the peoples under them.

Our gathering tonight exemplifies the sort of relationship between persons of all sorts of backgrounds, races, and cultures which creates a genuine feeling of brotherhood. Americans and Europeans as well as Middle Easterners and South Asians; Muslims, Jews, and Christians we are gathered here to pay homage to a great Muslin spirit in a Muslin House of God. The memorial service in which we are taking part is sponsored by an American organization, the Council on Islamic Affairs, which is composed of Christians, Jews, and Muslims. We are gathered together because our desire to pay tribute to a great man is a bond which transcends differences of cultures, creeds and nationalities.

More and more people-to-people partnerships are being created as the human race gropes its way toward the spiritual perfection which Iqbal called "being worthy of having been created in the image of God."

Who can measure the constructive influence of an institution like the American University at Beirut, not only on the peoples of the Middle East from whom most of its students have come, but on the whole world, including the impact its many graduates have had at the United Nations and other international gatherings to which, because of their superior training and broadened outlook, they have been sent as delegates?

It was a desire to help relieve the suffering of people in need that sent me to China long ago, there to work for 10 years as a physician to men, women, and children of all walks of life as they came into my clinic. But I received more than I gave, and I learned more than I taught. That is what generally happens when men join hands to try to meet human needs.

Wherever some human beings have escaped the control of tyrants to become refugees on the face of the earth—from China, from Hungary, now from Tibet—other human beings from many countries have promptly volunteered to bring them relief, food, medical care, and, if possible, a new home somewhere and a new life of dignity and usefulness. Mohammed Iqbal would have been in the heart of all such efforts.

For he knew that some men are cruel and evil; but he believed that most men want to be kindly and good. In the universally understood language and symbolism of beautiful poetry, he called on all to stand together in common service to humanity—in realism opposing the evil of today in order that men may have opportunity freely to pursue, in idealism, their aspirations for tomorrow.

We gratefully honor here tonight the memory of this gifted man and noble spirit. He spoke to his own people, and he speaks also to us. May we refresh our spirits and renew our dedication by joining in his prayer.

"That my life, O God, should be like that of a candle
So that through my efforts
I may try to dispel the darkness of evil
And illumine the whole world."

Less-Than-Honorable Discharges

OF

HON. CLYDE DOYLE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 23, 1959

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, by reason of unanimous consent heretofore granted me so to do, I am pleased to present to the attention of your own busy self and all the other Members of this great legislative body, the text of three letters of approval and endorsement which I have recently received from three of the nationally known veterans groups in the United States of America. I am sure that you and all of us interested in this ever-present and vital subject of less-than-honorable discharges to thousands of our military personnel each year will be pleased to see these three letters.

They are as follows:

VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS OF THE UNITED STATES,
OFFICE OF DIRECTOR, NATIONAL LEGISLATIVE SERVICE,
Washington, D.C., March 17, 1959.

Hon. CLYDE DOYLE,
Member of Congress, U.S. House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. DOYLE: This is in response to your letter of February 16, 1959, with attached copy of H.R. 88 which proposes to amend present law to provide that the Board for the Correction of Military or Naval Records and the Boards of Review, Discharges, and Dismissals which give consideration to satisfactory evidence relating to good character and exemplary conduct in civilian life after discharge and dismissal in determining whether or not to correct certain discharges and dismissals and to authorize the award of an exemplary rehabilitation certificate. The Veterans of Foreign Wars is on record as having endorsed in principle H.R. 8772 of the 85th Congress and we gave this bill our full support. We shared your keen disappointment when the bill failed to move forward in the Senate and died with the adjournment of the 85th Congress. It is noted that H.R. 88 is almost identical to H.R. 8772, with one major exception: For those meeting the requirements of this legislation an exemplary conduct certificate will be issued rather than a general discharge limited as was proposed in H.R. 8772.

The VFW wholeheartedly agrees with the principle of issuing an exemplary certificate based solely on the record of rehabilitation after service with no change in discharge—solely because of such rehabilitation. We endorse the proposal that an exemplary certificate is much more preferable and appropriate than general discharge limited. As has been pointed out this bill is not designed to grant or change discharge certificates but rather is intended to remove the stigma that attaches, sometimes for life, to a veteran with a less than honorable discharge certificate.

We certainly will lend our full support to the principles and objectives of H.R. 88. If further hearings should be scheduled with respect to this legislation, the Veterans of Foreign Wars will be deeply appreciative of being advised so that a representative from this office may be present and testify in behalf of our organization.

Thanking you for inviting the views of the VFW concerning this most meritorious legislation, I am,

Respectfully yours,
OMAR B. KETCHUM,
Director.

DISABLED AMERICAN VETERANS,
NATIONAL SERVICE HEADQUARTERS,
Washington, D.C., April 1, 1959.

Subject: H.R. 88 and about 30 companion bills on the same subject.

Hon. CLYDE DOYLE,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. DOYLE: Your interesting letter of March 24, 1959, on the above subject, with enclosures, has been received and very carefully considered.

The then DAV national director of legislation, Maj. Omer W. Clark, in his letter of June 26, 1957, addressed to you as chairman of the Special Subcommittee on Military Discharges, House Committee on Armed Services, commented upon the provisions of H.R. 1108, 85th Congress, and the numerous identical bills before that Congress. Major Clark stated in effect that the Disabled American Veterans did not have an official mandate either to support or oppose such proposed legislation but he indicated that the DAV viewed with considerable misgivings the possible effect of the bill in question should it be enacted into law and placed into operation. As the above mentioned statement is a part of the printed record of the hearings conducted by your subcommittee it is not believed necessary at this time to reiterate the reasons given for our doubts and apprehensions.

In my opinion, H.R. 88 of this Congress, in eliminating the reference to "General Discharge (Limited)," is more acceptable than was H.R. 1108 and its companion bills. However, there is considerable doubt in my mind as to just how much good the possession of on exemplary rehabilitation certificate will do the holder of a less than honorable discharge from the Armed Forces, when he goes to seek civilian employment. It seems to me that if such veteran shows such certificate to a prospective employer the latter will immediately note the word "rehabilitation" on it with the distinct possibility, if he if he is interested enough to follow it up at all, that he will delve into the adverse facts and circumstances resulting in separation from the service with an other than honorable discharge. In the VFW letter of March 17, 1959, a copy of which you enclosed, the term "exemplary conduct certificate" is used in one place and I believe this is an improvement due to omission of "rehabilitation." It might even be advisable to add the word in parentheses "(civilian)" after "exemplary conduct certificate" to emphasize that the good conduct was post-service and had no reference to the actions in service, as previously determined by the Armed Forces.

In providing a certificate such as that contemplated by H.R. 88, designed for a special purpose (employment), the question arises as to whether or not such a certificate would militate against some veterans obtaining favorable reconsideration of their service discharges by the Department of Defense. Human nature being what it is we cannot help but feel that it would react unfavorably in an appreciable number of cases. The existence of the certificate and the procedure incident to its issuance would offer an easy way out for interested officials of the Defense Department by enabling them to take some action in the interest of the veteran-applicant without going to the extent of changing the character of his service discharge. There are still other considerations that come to mind bearing upon the advisability of adopting such legislation, and these relate to morale in the Armed Forces, the very considerable burden that would be placed upon the Department of Defense during these highly critical and dangerous times—both as to investigating and adjudicating these cases, and the possible threat that such a system might impose on our nationl defense through permitting dangerous elements who had been separated from the service because of communistic affiliations or actions to infiltrate our great industrial network and to wreak havoc when the time came for them to carry out the orders of their foreign masters.

Some might say that there would only be a comparatively few such instances in the last mentioned category. That could be true but it would only take one agent who gave no thought to his own safety, and one nuclear bomb, to completely wreck a vast industrial complex, and the entire area for many miles around.

In conclusion, permit me to thank you for communicating with me about this proposal of yours. I know how sincere and earnest you are in pressing for the enactment of the legislation. I am also certain that you appreciate the position of the Disabled American Veterans, in the absence of a mandate binding upon this legislative department. In this letter I have tried to touch upon some of the points that require much soul searching upon the part of the Congress before taking the long step embodied in H.R. 88 and its companion measures.

Sincerely yours,
ELMER M. FREUDENBERGER,
Acting National Director of Legislation.

AMVETS NATIONAL HEADQUARTERS,
Washington, D.C., April 9, 1959.

The Honorable CLYDE DOYLE,
U.S. House of Representatives,
House Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. DOYLE: This will acknowledge your letter dated March 25, 1959, with enclosures, relative to H.R. 88, a bill introduced by you which would make certain changes in the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944 regarding the type of evidence that should be considered by the Boards for the Correction of Military and Naval Records and Boards of Review, Discharges and Dismissals. Additionally, your bill would authorize an award of an exemplary rehabilitation certificate to certain veterans who have demonstrated exemplary conduct subsequent to service. AMVETS has long been interested in this general subject of discharge reviews and has always made our views known not only in supporting bills that you have introduced but also in discussions on this subject with various Defense Department officials. We are of the firm opinion that this entire area is in need of further study including not only the laws, regulations, and procedures under which the Correction Boards and Boards of Review, Discharge and Dismissals operate, but also procedures under which various branches of the services discharge personnel administratively and otherwise.

AMVETS is in full agreement and strongly endorse the first section of your bill which would mandate the Correction Boards and Discharge Review Boards to take into consideration, when reviewing an other-than-honorable discharge, conditions and circumstances prevailing at discharge of the individual, his age, what the punishment in civil life would be for the same offense, and the moral turpitude involved. Making the consideration of these features mandatory may tend to make the members of these Boards more liberal and equitable by permitting them to consider a wider range of factors in their determination as to whether or not a discharge should be changed. It will also enable the veteran or his counsel to build a stronger case. In our judgment, therefore, your proposal, if enacted, would greatly benefit the veteran in his application for a change or correction of discharge.

We also support the concept underlying the other major feature of your bill calling for an award of an exemplary rehabilitation certificate. This would be issued, according to your bill, to a veteran with an other-than-honorable discharge who can establish by affidavits and other evidence that for 3 years following service he demonstrated exemplary conduct in every respect in civilian life. While this award would have no bearing on the veteran's discharge, it would certainly tend to mollify to some degree the stigma attached to his undesirable discharge or other discharge not under honorable conditions. While we can envision difficulties in the administration of this law, as it relates to this award, this fact would not alter our support of such legislation. As we have indicated earlier in this letter, this entire area, including inservice discharge procedures and procedures governing postservice reviews are in need of continuing study and review in order to develop the most equitable and fair method of handling these matters. We commend you for your interest in these problems and your efforts to institute changes for improvement in the entire system. AMVETS appreciate very much this opportunity to express our views on H.R. 88.

Very sincerely yours,

JAMES W. HAFEY,
Assistant National Service Director.

In addition to H.R. 88, 30 Members of this House have also filed companion bills and I am pleased to state that just a couple of days ago, after waiting about 3 months for report from the Pentagon Building, Hon. CARL VINSON received an adverse report to H.R. 88 and all of the companion bills. In due time, Mr. Speaker, I hope and expect that this whole subject matter of less-than-honorable discharges in the initial form of H.R. 88 and companion bills will again come to the attention of the House of Representatives. In fact, I hope it will be before long. As you will no doubt remember, during the 85th Congress, owing to your gracious and understanding courtesy and cooperation, the Doyle bill, H.R. 8772, which was the predecessor to H R. 88, passed the House by an overwhelming vote of 226 to 8, but largely because of delays in transit in getting the report out from the Pentagon Building at an earlier date, said bill did not get to the Senate committee's attention as early as it should and, therefore, the Senate did not consider the bill last session. But I am pleased to state that Senator STENNIS from Mississippi is ready to file the text of H.R. 88 and companion bills in the Senate.

These bills, Mr. Speaker, are very moderate bills; they do not ask nor intend to ask the Military Establishment to change any military record nor to grant any boy who uses the provisions of any of these bills any upgrading of any discharge. The proposed Certificate of Exemplary Rehabilitation does not compete with any honorable discharge or discharge under honorable conditions. In fact, is it not a discharge. It is a proposed certificate by the Military Establishment that if a boy, after living an exemplary life in civilian pursuits for not less than 3 years, and if he can prove that to the satisfaction of the Military Establishment; in their sole discretion, then they can at their sole discretion issue to such boy an exemplary rehabilitation certificate. It is hoped that this certificate will at least help a deserving lad who has made minor offenses or errors while in the military to remove at least a little of the stigma and help him at least a little bit to get employment. It grants him no Government benefits. It will not interfere with military discipline.

Mr. Speaker, it seems significant, does it not, that these three great nationally known veterans groups so cordially and emphatcally support H.R. 88 and companion bills? I have received word from the American Legion that they cannot act upon the proposed legislation until their national convention later on this summer.

Whither the Constitution?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. THOMAS N. DOWNING

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 23, 1959

Mr. DOWNING. Mr. Speaker, on April 15, 1959, our colleague, the Honorable JIM WRIGHT, of Texas, was the main speaker at the annual meeting of the Virginia State Chamber of Commerce at the Hotel Chamberlin, Fort Monroe, Va.

The impact of this great speech on this distinguished audience was so readily apparent that I ask that his address be made a part of this RECORD and strongly recommend that it be read by my colleagues.

The address follows:

WHITHER THE CONSTITUTION?

(Speech by Congressman JIM WRIGHT, annual meeting, Virginia State Chamber of Commerce, Old Point Comfort, Va., April 15, 1959)

Last month, we celebrated the 170th anniversary of the Constitution of the United States.

Throughout the long, hot summer of 1788, while in the sweltering heat of Philadelphia's Independence Hall our Founding Fathers struggled to draft a Constitution, rumors spread throughout the Colonies like autumn leaves whisked about by the wind.

Speculation was rife. The 12-year-old Articles of Confederation, too loosely drawn in the beginning, had blundered and broken apart upon the rocky shoals of reality. A firmer and more adhesive foundation was clearly needed upon which to erect an enduring nation. The topic of the day in the taverns and general stores and stage coach inns concerned itself with what form the Government would take. Sophisticated couriers in the capitols of Europe speculated as to who would emerge as King.

Finally the work was ended. The document, hammered out upon the anvils of mutual compromise, was ready for public presentation. The delegates filed slowly out onto the broad portico to read it to a motley crowd which for days had been gathering outside the building. A curious little charwoman, unwilling to await its formal reading, plucked at the sleeve of Ben Franklin and insisted upon knowing what type of government they were to have.

Franklin replied: "A Republic * * * if you can keep it."

We have kept it for 170 years. I was startled some months ago when the Prime Minister of Ireland, addressing our Congress, brought greetings from an old nation and a new Republic to a young nation and the oldest Republic on earth. In point of continuous institution, ours is the world's oldest Republic.

That we continue to keep it seems to me one of the most important resolutions on earth. As valid today as when it was penned is Emerson's rhetorical question:

"For what avail the plough or sail,
Or land or life, if freedom fail?

With most of the world looking hopefully to us, not only for bread but for inspiration, the essential character of our Government is, more than ever before, "the last, best hope of earth."

Let me make clear at the outset that I am not seeking to alarm you. I do not think we shall lose it. With all my heart, I believe the fundamental faith of our Nation to be as strong today as ever it has been in our history. Yet there are certain developments which have taken us rather far afield from the points of our origin and which, unless corrected, could alter the direction of our destiny. Specifically, I should like for us to think very seriously above five particular trends * * * to consider how they have come about * * * and to resolve what must be done to correct them.

1. EROSION OF STATES RIGHTS

The first and in some ways the most obvious of these trends is a gradual and steady erosion of the rights of our States. Everyone talks about this tendency and most people lament it. Yet, as with the weather, hardly anybody ever seems to do anything about it.

In some respects, the tendency is a natural one. As the Nation has grown more compact and distance has been eradicated, attention has shifted from the States to the National Government. People more and more have looked to the Federal authority for a solution to their problems, particularly when frustrated in seeking solutions at the State level.

And the attitude of the States themselves has often hastened the trend. The impotence and corruption of State legislatures, their unwillingness to assume responsibility, have on more than one occasion driven the public to look to the Federal Congress for its remedies.

A House Committee on Intergovernmental Operations last year highlighted this truth with case history illustrations. Since 1925, the committee noted, Federal grants for nondefense programs have risen from $124 million to $5 billion for the current fiscal year. Tracing the birth and growth of activities ranging all the way from aid to State soldiers' homes to stream pollution control, the committee established that, in almost every instance, the Federal entry into the field had been preceded by negligence and unwillingness to solve their own problems on the part of the States.

To wail against growing Federal influence in State and local affairs without being willing to support more dynamic and responsible State governments is to engage in a hollow and hypocritical gesture. If Federal Government is ever to limit its authority, then this will be tied up in one package with stronger Government close to home.

Yet, I realize fully that the converse also is true. It is like the question of the chicken and the egg. The Federal Government will not release responsibility until the States prove a willingness to assume it. But the States cannot develop their own initiative if stifled under a blanket of growing Federal encroachment. This is the reason why many of us in the Congress believe in the importance of legislative reform such as embodied in the bill, H.R. 3. This bill, intended to restate the historic doctrine of concurrent jurisdiction, passed the House in the last session after many hard months of struggle. It is unfortunate that it became enmeshed in a parliamentary situation which prevented it from also receiving the approval of the Senate.

Let us be clear about what we mean. H.R. 3 did not presume in any way, shape, or fashion to confer upon any State a right to enact legislation which would be violative of or inconsistent with the Federal law. That question was settled when we abandoned the Articles of Confederation and adopted the Constitution of the United States. It was ratified forever in the indelible blood of the Civil War. We are not a confederation in which any State may set itself aside as an island wherein Federal law may be ignored. Ours is a Federal Union, "one Nation, under God indivisible." There is no attempt here to maintain that a State possesses any right to countermand or nullify Federal law.

What is involved in H.R. 3 is simply a protection of the historic rights of the States to exercise concurrent jurisdiction with the Federal Government and to enact statutes of their own so long as those statutes do not violate the Federal law.

This is an original and historic right. At the beginning of our history as a nation, it never occurred to anyone to question it.

Of recent years, however, the courts have held with increasing consistency that where Congress has enacted legislation on a subject, the States are deprived of all power to enact or enforce similar laws on the same subject, even though they present no direct conflict with the Federal act.

The judicial ruling in the case of Commonwealth v. Nelson which has a bearing on antisedition statutes now on the books in some 47 States is a notable case in point. It comes instantly to mind because of the publicity accorded this decision and because, ironically, it was the distinguished Congressman from Virginia, Mr. SMITH, the author of H.R. 3, who had written the Federal act cited by the Court to nullify enforcement of the State laws in Pennsylvania.

That case, however, is no more than a symptom of what has been happening to the rights of States in the initiation of legislation and the handling of local problems. Similar decisions, involving somewhat less spectacular issues, are legion.

A fairly typical example is the recent case of Cloverleaf Co. v. Patterson. The State of Alabama, in an effort to protect the health of its citizens, had sought to inspect the product of a company, which was engaged in the renovation of butter. Some of the butter was shipped in interstate commerce, and thus subject to Federal pure food laws.

The Supreme Court ruled that Congress had therefore assumed entire jurisdiction over the subject, leaving the States powerless to enforce their own health laws. Dissenting, Justice Frankfurter argued that, if Congress had intended to preempt State enforcement entirely, it would have said so in its act.

This is the philosophy of H.R. 3, that in the absence of a clear congressional declaration depriving States of initiative in a given field of law, and in the absence of any conflict between State and Federal provisions, the States will be presumed to retain the right to enact and enforce similar laws.

The States have traditionally been valuable proving grounds for legislative policy. Many of our most far-reaching national reforms were first tested and proven in the laboratories of State government. Women's suffrage in Wyoming, antitrust in Texas, conservation laws in Pennsylvania, and lobby reform in Wisconsin, to name but a few.

Although the cry of States rights has often been abused, often used as a cloak to cover States wrongs, it is most assuredly not a reactionary doctrine to hold out for the rights of States to solve local problems when the solution presents no conflict with Federal policy.

Unless H.R. 3 or something substantially similar is enacted, it will be only a matter of time before the State governments will be deprived of practically all legislative initiative through this doctrine of preemption.

Congress is now required to legislate on an ever-widening variety of subjects. If, each time it does so, the States are to have another avenue of legislation completely closed to them, they will be inevitably deprived of the power to attack the problems of their people on any but a meager handful of subjects. These will be those not regarded as sufficiently important to warrant congressional action.

This legislative reform is needed unless we want consciously to abet the further erosion of the rights and prerogatives of the States. And I, for one, do not wish to do so.

2. EXECUTIVE USURPATION OF LEGISLATIVE POWERS

The second of these trends is a growing usurpation of legislative powers by the executive branch of Government. The great British statesman, Gladstone, spoke of our Constitution as "the most perfect instrument ever set down by the hand of man at a given time." He was speaking of its delicately contrived balance of powers between the separate branches of Government. It was born out of personal experience with a sovereign who had arrogated to himself authority which in its unrestrained exercise he had abused. If the Articles of Confederation had proven themselves too weak, there certainly was no wish among the authors of the Constitution to supplant them with a Government whose essential strength would be embodied in an all-powerful executive.

The greatest danger in all political systems is that of executive power. Benjamin Franklin was haunted by a dread that the executive branch would increase at the expense of the other branches until it would end in a form of authoritarianism. Commenting upon this fear, Jefferson said, "It is better to keep the wolf out of the fold than to trust to drawing his teeth and claws after he shall have entered."

Of the three branches, Congress should be the most responsive to the public wish because, by its very nature, it is closest to the public. While the population of the average constituency has grown enormously since the Constitution was drafted, it still is true that in our scheme of things, the average Member of Congress comes in closer and more continuous contact with the people whom the Government serves and represents than does any other Federal official.

During the congressional adjournment last fall, as an example, I publicly discussed our congressional activities in 114 different group meetings in my particular district. During the 4 months, I estimated that I had talked personally with some 11,000 people. This in greater or lesser degree is what most Members of Congress were doing. I believe that because of this we are better able to gage their thinking, better able to be what the term implies * * * their representatives.

Yet due to the growing variety and the burgeoning volume of legislation, Congress has come to rely more and more upon administrative interpretation to make assumptions of legislative intent. Executive agencies superimpose the details of administration upon what sometimes amount to skeleton statements of policy. In the last session of Congress, for instance, there were 6,591 bills introduced in addition to more than 11,000 which had carried over from the previous session. Of this number, 1,348 were enacted into law. With a workload of this magnitude, Congress simply cannot in each instance spell out in minute detail the manner in which each of these separate laws is to be carried out. To this extent, the growth of an executive bureaucracy has been a natural and unavoidable development.

But it is neither natural nor unavoidable for the administrative arm to replace what Congress intended with what its appointees think Congress should have intended. It is not natural, nor do I believe it has been unavoidable, for the device known as the Executive Order to have come into such widespread usage. Like the States, Congress must continually reassert its rights if it does not want them to diminish. Like the muscles of the body, rights if not exercised will wither and atrophy.

One of the vehicles by which the fundamental lawmaking prerogative has been sloughed away has been the Executive Reorganization Act which permits appointive agencies and commissions to revamp the administrative structure of Government.

Much good work has been performed under this act. Some savings have accrued to the taxpayer as a result of streamlining and elimination of overlapping functions.

One feature of the Reorganization Act, however, has come under sharp—and in my opinion, justified—criticism. This is the automatic nature of reorganization plans by which they summarily become law unless the Congress passes a resolution of disapproval within 60 days * * * and by a constitutional majority (a majority of all Members, not simply a majority of those voting).

Simple reflection will demonstrate how the lawmaking function can thus pass from the legislative to the executive branch. A Presidential commission can radically alter a vital function of the Government, leaving the Congress almost powerless to demur. Here's why: It takes 218 votes in the House under this provision to defeat any reorganization plan. During a recent Congress there were 181 rollcall votes. The greatest number of Members ever present for one of these votes was 426, the smallest number 233. On only 20 of those rollcalls were as many as 400 Members on the floor.

Supposing such a plan were up for consideration with only 233 Members present. Sixteen Members could defeat the will of 217 Members. If that's farfetched, assume the average rollcall attendance of 357, when 140 could thwart the will of 217.

Not only must 218 be against it, they must take the initiative, they must all be on the floor at once, and they must do it within 60 days * * * or the Executive sponsored reorganization plan will automatically become the law of the land.

Under this machinery, a number of the basic activities of the Government have been rather radically altered. It is my own conviction that we have here a departure from the traditional concept of separation of powers. For here the Executive legislates and the Congress has only a negative right of veto which seems more theoretical than actual. I believe that a portion of the integrity of the lawmaking branch could be restored by amending this sweeping Reorganization Act so as to permit legislative review by a simple majority of those present and voting, rather than by the required constitutional majority.

The one essentially indispensable power of Congress, of course, has been most clearly maintained in its control of the purse strings. Even this congressional prerogative has been the victim of an insidious encroachment. Led by a coalition of younger Members, the lawmaking body rebelled last year against this particular tendency when it enacted the bill known as H.R. 8002 to put the Government's budgeting practices on an accrued annual expenditure basis.

The fundamental issue before us in this legislation was the extent to which the people's elected representatives in the Congress can maintain actual control over the Federal purse strings.

There can be no doubt that the Constitution of the United States vested in Congress the clear responsibility to manage and control Federal expenditures. It obviously was believed by the Founding Fathers that administrative government should be directly responsible in its expenditure of public funds to the Congress, since in this way it would be responsible to the taxpaying public which elects the Congress and is responsive to its wishes.

In recent years, the practice of large sums, carried over unspent from previous appropriations, has impaired the ideal of congressional control of the purse.

We came into fiscal 1956, for example, with almost $54 billion in unexpended balances from previous appropriations. At the beginning of fiscal 1957, the figure has grown to some $70 billion.

Large balances of unexpended appropriations have thus been available annually to the agencies without any further action of the Congress. For all practical purposes, Congress had lost control of these sizable amounts of money. It was to restore congressional control that this bill was passed.

It may not result in the saving of billions, as some of its most enthusiastic advocates have estimated, but I think the requirement that agencies return to the Congress and prove up the value of programs underway will very definitely result in some saving and in greater efficiency, and any such result that accrues will certainly be to the good. Most important of all, it restores to the Congress its historic role as the keeper of the pocketbook.

But Congress, having done this much, cannot rest upon its laurels. The price of legislative rights which are the very enshrinement of representative government is eternal and unremitting vigilance.

3. WANING RESPECT FOR THE SUPREME COURT

The third alarming development, unlike the other two, has come about rather recently. It is the rapid decay of respect for the U.S. Supreme Court, brought about by the general feeling that the Court has tended to abandon legal precedent as its guiding principle.

A very great deal, of course, has been said about this. Every newspaper pundit has commented upon it. It is easy to criticize, and perhaps the mark of statesmanship in this instance is that of restrained expression. No appraisal of the current scene, however, would be an altogether honest one without frankly acknowledging this development and examining it. When so august a body as the Conference of Chief Justices of all the States votes by a three-fourths majority to adopt a report calling on the Supreme Court for more judicial restraint, then something unique in our history has happened.

During the last Congress, there were no less than 50 bills introduced either to alter rulings of the Nation's highest tribunal or to curb the Court in one way or another. Seven of these bills passed at least one House of Congress.

But the Conference of Chief Justices in its pronouncement last August called attention also the fact that ultimate judicial power in our country must rest with the U.S. Supreme Court. "Any other allocation of such power would seem to lead to complete chaos," the report stated, adding that it is our common obligation to seek to uphold respect for law.

The Supreme Court is necessary in our system of government. If we are to have a government of law rather than a government of men, it is indispensable. If law is to have any ultimate meaning, if there is to be an anchor to keep our ship of state from being tossed about by every wave of popular fancy and taking a new direction with every expedient wind that blows, then we must have a Supreme Court, and that Court as the final arbiter of law must have respect.

Thomas Jefferson was among the first of our forefathers to see that judicial review was the only effective means of preserving the fundamental law. While our earliest advocate of popular government, he feared what he called the unrestrained "tyranny of legislatures." He knew that the legislative branch, simply because it was closest to the people, could be carried away by a tide of expediency in its desire to please the people, and he knew that it needed a checkrein.

Jefferson's law teacher, George Wythe, had expressed this philosophy as forcefully as it has ever been stated. Sitting as a judge in the case of Caton v. Commonwealth of Virginia, in 1782, he had stated his position in these words:

"If the whole legislature, an event to be deprecated, should attempt to overleap the bounds prescribed to them by the people, I, in administering the public justice of this country, will meet the united powers at my seat in this tribunal; and, pointing to the Constitution, will say to them, 'here is the limit of your authority; and hither shall you go, but no further.' "

Obviously, something needs to be done to restore the Court to the pinnacle of prestige which it must grace if the essential character of our Government is to retain its stability. I do not believe the answer lies in radically altering the jurisdiction or the responsibilities of the Court as has been impatiently suggested by some. As an institution it has served us well for 170 years. It has been under attack before. Twenty-one year ago a frustrated President was criticizing the Court as "too reactionary" and was asking authority to add to its membership. Calmer heads prevailed and the President's request was denied.

At that time, the distinguished and venerable New York Republican, the late Daniel A. Reed, posed this choice:

"I ask every American this question," he said, "Do you want to put your personal liberties in the hands of Congress and your State legislature? To those who think this is a wise thing to do, I call attention to the fact that 10 times since the year 1867 Congress, or one of its branches, has violated the provisions of the Bill of Rights. * * * The only power that stood between the citizens and these tyrannical acts of Congress was the Supreme Court * * * I cannot believe that in this period of worldwide dizziness the citizens of this Nation wish to destroy the only department of Government which can protect them from mob violence and encroachment."

What, then, can be done? If it is a duty of citizenship to respect and support the rulings of the Court, it also is true that the pronouncements of the Court, in and of themselves, should be such as to command public respect.

The Supreme Court of the United States should be composed of the nine ablest jurists in the Nation. On this Bench should sit the nine wisest and most learned legal authorities in the United States. They should be men of such judicial attainment and intellectual stature as to evoke from the public, the bar, and the bench the universal respect which is their due. Never should it be possible for anyone to say that their appointments had been essentially political in character.

The most constructive reform, in my judgment, would be the requirement that, as a minimum prerequisite to appointment, a member of this highest Court should be a person of previous judicial experience. Such a requirement could be made by a simple act of Congress, since on the matter of qualifications of Justices the Constitution is silent.

Adopt such a requirement as this, let all future appointments be confined to men who have performed previous service either on a Supreme Court of one of the States or on a Federal appellate court, and time will lay its soothing hand upon the turmoil that today surrounds the Court and heal the unhealthy ruptures that disturb our legal tranquility.

4. THE GROWING EMPHASIS OF BLOCS AND SEGMENTS

The fourth trend to which attention must be called is the ever increasing tendency to divide the United States into blocs and segments, economic factions, ethnic units, regional groupings.

Back in the 1940's, Stuart Chase wrote a book which he entitled "Democracy Under Pressure." If we were under pressure then, we are in a pressure cooker now. Schoolchildren pledge their allegiance to a flag which we hail as the symbol of "one nation, under God indivisible." If my observation of the past 4 years has given me any one great anxiety for the domestic future of our Nation, it is the dread that someday this essential indivisibility may disintegrate before the splitting onslaughts of selfish pressures.

Too many of us have come to think of ourselves not first as Americans, but first as members of the business community or indeed some segment of the business community, or as members of labor, and only secondly as Americans—as southerners or northerners first and Americans second—as belonging first to a particular racial heritage and only then, if at all, as belonging to America.

I am not certain that I know what can be done about this growing tendency. But I do know that it's growing and I do know that it is selfish at its core and insidiously un-American.

Marx and Lenin prophesied that capital and labor would be unable in the long run to coexist amicably. That class war here would inevitably come because of what they called the fundamental contradiction of a society such as ours—what they believed to be a natural hostility between the capitalist and his employee. When we allow ourselves to be divided into hostile camps, acting as though our differences were irreconcilable, each anxious to believe the worst about the other and each constantly poised to press an immediate advantage at the expense of the other, we tend to prove their satanic prophecy correct.

It is natural, I know, for Members of Congress to champion the causes of their own districts, their own States, their own regions. In this I am perhaps as guilty as any. But a Member of Congress and every public official—indeed, everyone who would set himself up as a leader of public thought—has the solemn duty to carry forever in the forefront of his mind the realization that he serves first the United States. Except as its future flourishes, his State and his town have no future. Except as the entire economy prospers, his economic segment of that economy will enjoy no lasting prosperity.

Except as business makes a reasonable return so as to permit expansion, there will not be jobs enough to go around for our growing labor force; and labor, in the long run, will suffer. Except as the working men and women of our Nation earn a decent and remunerative wage, there will be no market for the things business turns out, and business will suffer. If we forget this, we play a fool's game. He who enters the arena of politics pledged to champion exclusively any bloc or any segment, he who in public life uses his talents to divide class against class, or race against race, or region against region, prostitutes his talents; and in the end he plays the game of those who would divide us and in dividing would conquer us.

I think of one legislative reform which could minimize this growing tendency. It alone would not cure the basic malady, but it would help. The electoral college method of selecting our President and Vice President has surely outlived its original purpose. It is a relic of the powdered wig and snuff box era when nobody ever knew anything about presidential candidates and it was believed the public needed someone to do their actual choosing for them. If its only drawback were that it is archaic, there could be no harm in preserving it. The outmoded system, unfortunately, has given rise to numerous abuses, among them the glorification of voting blocs.

By lumping all of a State's electoral votes for the side which ekes out the barest margin of victory in that particular State, it has encouraged both parties to concentrate on those traditionally close areas of the country where a little extra effort can pay off most handsomely on the electoral scorecard. Undue and unintended influence thus has gravitated to the political bosses and ward politicians who can turn out the vote in those particular areas. We have come in this way to think of millions of Americans not as individual people but as members of one or another voting bloc. And in this it seems to me that we subtly degrade them as human beings and tarnish the image of a Nation of free and equal men.

We can correct this one particular cause by adopting any one of several electoral reform amendments which have been pending in every Congress for the past 20 years. I believe we need to reaffirm our faith in the average American as a person by enacting one of these proposals, to the end that one vote anywhere in the country shall be exactly equal to one vote anywhere else in the country.

Yet this alone will not cure the disease that increasingly separates and divides us. This is a task which calls for the most superb statesmanship and the most mature citizenship. Perhaps the danger has been no more clearly put than in the words of that distinguished jurist, Judge Learned Hand, who warned:

"That community is already in the process of dissolution where each man begins to eye his neighbor as a possible enemy, where nonconformity with the accepted creed is a mark of disaffection; where denunciation takes the place of evidence and orthodoxy chokes off freedom of dissent."

5. A STALE CONFORMITY AND THE BILL OF RIGHTS

Finally, to combat the stale conformity of the group-thinking which has huddled so many of us into separate camps, I think we need an urgent reemphasis of the Bill of Rights.

The most alarming revelation I have read in the past 2 years was made by Dr. H. H. Remmers, of Purdue University. His recently published book, "The American Teenager," is the result of 15 years of painstaking questioning of some 25,000 high-school students by the university's research staff.

Unless you're shockproof, you'll be shocked, not so much by teenage manners and morals, surprisingly enough, but by teenage opinions.

If the Purdue polls are accurate, the following eye-openers should be sufficient to start us thinking, and mighty seriously:

A solid 60 percent of the youngsters polled think that books, magazines, and newspapers should be censored.

A substantial 58 percent can see nothing wrong with employment of third-degree methods by police.

A third of them believe it would be okay for the Government to prohibit some people from making speeches.

Better than one-fourth think there are times when it's all right to search homes and private persons without a warrant.

Fifteen percent would refuse certain criminals the right to have a lawyer, and 13 percent even profess the opinion that religious belief and worship should be subject to legal restrictions.

The average one of these youngsters would probably fight you if so much as suggested that he wasn't a good American. Yet, if these figures are correct, an appalling number simply haven't been shown what America is all about in the first place.

If you asked if they believe in the Bill of Rights, they'd no doubt give you an emphatic "Yes." But the poll tends clearly to show that a lot of them actually do not.

Nobody, apparently, has explained to them that the Bill of Rights, the sanctity of the individual, is the one great peculiarly American contribution to the art of government.

Other nations have adopted, at least nominally, the republican form of government. Even Russia calls itself the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics. Other nations (Hitler's Germany included) have developed capitalistic economies.

Only America charted its bark by the course of a scrupulous observance of individual rights. Is a new generation losing the course?

Whose fault it is might be debatable. The schools, the churches, the families, perhaps we all share in the blame. Perhaps the younger set is merely reflecting an attitude they see in their elders. Can it be that in our frantic insistence upon "belongingness" we have made a god of conformity to our groups and have actually begun to mistrust ourselves to think for ourselves? Or to give the other fellow the right to think for himself as an individual?

When we wish to silence those who disagree with us we betray a shocking lack of confidence in our own convictions. When we confer social ostracism upon the fellow with a nonconforming opinion, we place a smothering stultification upon the very act of thinking.

There has never been a time in our history when we have needed more to encourage the processes of independent thought. Jefferson dedicated the University of Virginia to the "illimitable freedom of the human mind." The frontiers of the future are the frontiers of the mind. The future belongs to that nation, and to that society, which is not afraid of thoughts.

Ours is a nation which was founded upon the conviction that error of opinion may be tolerated so long as truth is free to combat it. Jefferson said that truth is the sufficient adversary of falsehood.

I do not despair of the future. The faith of our fathers was not misplaced. Their ennoblement of the individual is the very hope for which the world gropes in its awakening. Let us not hide that light under a bushel, for it is a light unto the gentiles and a lamp unto the world.

SENATE

FRIDAY, APRIL 24, 1959

The Senate met at 10 o'clock a.m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D.D., offered the following prayer:

God our Father, amid all life's changing scenes make us conscious of Thy overshadowing presence.

We thank Thee for the unquenchable impulse toward Thee Thou hast planted within us.

Open our eyes to see Thee, not just out on the rim of the universe on some distant star, but in the human love which hallows our own lives and sanctifies our homes—love which at its best bears witness to Thee and which alone is the balm able to cure the hurt of the world.

May our lives, freed of pettiness and prejudice, and radiant with good will which leaps all barriers, be open channels through which Thy saving grace may flow for the healing of the nations.

We ask it in the dear Redeemer's name. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, April 23, 1959, was dispensed with.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the Senate by Mr. Ratchford, one of his secretaries.

REPORT OF ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on Public Works:

To the Congress of the United States:

Pursuant to the provisions of section 10 of Public Law 358, 83d Congress, I transmit herewith for the information of the Congress the report of the St. Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation, covering its activities for the year ended December 31, 1958.

DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 24, 1959.

COMMITTEE MEETINGS DURING SENATE SESSION

On request of Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, and by unanimous consent, the following committee and subcommittees were authorized to meet during the session of the Senate today:

The Committee on Finance;

The Antitrust and Monopoly Legislation Subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary;

The Subcommittee on Governmental Organization for Space Activities of the Committee on Aeronautical and Space Sciences; and

The Civil Subcommittee of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

CIVIL WAR CENTENNIAL COMMISSION

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has been requested by the Vice President to announce the appointment by him, pursuant to 71 Stat. 626, of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] as a member on the part of the Senate of the Civil War Centennial Commission, vice the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. MORTON] resigned.

LIMITATION OF DEBATE DURING MORNING HOUR

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, under the rule, there will be the usual morning hour for the transaction of routine business; and I ask unanimous consent that statements in connection therewith be limited to 3 minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

STATUS OF PERMANENT RESIDENCE FOR A CERTAIN ALIEN

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Commissioner, Immigration and Naturalization Service, Department of Justice, transmitting, pursuant to law, a copy of the order granting the application for permanent residence filed by Jerzy Kudrawcew alias Piotr Wedrogowski, together with a statement of the facts and pertinent provisions of law as to the subject, and the reason for granting such application, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The following reports of committees were submitted:

By Mr. ENGLE, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, with amendments:

S. 1368. A bill to amend sections 503(a)(2) and 504 of the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 to facilitate financing of new jet and turboprop aircraft (Rept. No. 221).

AMENDMENT OF RAILROAD RETIREMENT, RAILROAD RETIREMENT TAX, AND RAILROAD UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACTS—REPORT OF A COMMITTEE—INDIVIDUAL VIEWS

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, from the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, I report favorably, with amendments, the bill (S. 226) to amend the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937, the Railroad Retirement Tax Act, and the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act, so as to provide increases in benefits, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 222) thereon. I ask unanimous consent that the report may be printed, together with the individual views of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be received and printed, as requested by the Senator from Oregon, and the bill will be placed on the calendar.

REPORT ENTITLED "NATIONAL PENITENTIARIES" (S. REPT. NO. 220)

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS], pursuant to Senate Resolution 230, 85th Congress, 2d session, as extended, from the Committee on the Judiciary, I submit a report entitled "National Penitentiaries." I ask that the report be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be received and printed, as requested by the Senator from North Carolina.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. LAUSCHE:

S. 1788. A bill for the relief of Calliope Kastelloriou; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. MAGNUSON (for himself, Mr. ALLOTT, Mr. BARTLETT, Mr. CARROLL, Mr. CURTIS, Mr. CHURCH, Mr. HRUSKA, Mr. HUMPHREY, Mr. JACKSON, Mr. KERR, Mr. MANSFIELD, Mr. MCCARTHY, Mr. MCGEE, Mr. MONRONEY, Mr. MORSE, Mr. MOSS, Mr. MURRAY, Mr. NEUBERGER, and Mr. SCHOEPPEL):

S. 1789. A bill to amend section 1(14)(a) of the Interstate Commerce Act to insure the adequacy of the national railroad freight car supply, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

(See the remarks of Mr. MAGNUSON when he introduced the above bill, which appear under a separate heading.)

By Mr. MCNAMARA:

S. 1790. A bill for the relief of Luca Nikolich; and

S. 1791. A bill for the relief of Helen Haroian; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. HAYDEN.

S. 1792. A bill for the relief of Lilia Alvarez Szabo; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. RANDOLPH (for himself and Mr. BYRD of West Virginia):

S. 1793. A bill granting the consent and approval of Congress to the States of West Virginia and Virginia to enter into a compact with respect to the boundary between such States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. BRIDGES:

S. 1794. A bill for the relief of the survivor of Charles E. Alden; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

AMENDMENT OF INTERSTATE COMMERCE ACT, RELATING TO ADEQUACY OF NATIONAL RAILROAD FREIGHT CAR SUPPLY

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, and Senators ALLOTT, BARTLETT, CARROLL, CURTIS, CHURCH, HRUSKA, HUMPHREY, JACKSON, KERR, MANSFIELD, MCCARTHY, MCGEE, MONRONEY, MORSE, MOSS, MURRAY, NEUBERGER, and SCHOEPPEL, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend section 1(14)(a) of the Interstate Commerce Act to insure the adequacy of the national railroad freight car supply, and for other purposes.

Mr. President, over the years, the freight car supply of the railroads has decreased substantially. Although the freight car shortage has not assumed its usual proportions in recent years because of the lack of traffic, there are now definite prospects for improvement in business. If the increased economic activity continues, there will be a freight car shortage in the summer and fall of 1959.

The railroads need to build additional freight cars to serve the shippers of the country. A per diem charge is the amount the owning railroad receives for a car when on the tracks of another railroad. Under the present law, the Interstate Commerce Commission, in establishing this per diem rate, can only cover the bare cost of ownership. No element of profit can be included. Thus the ICC cannot increase the per diem rates to encourage the building of additional cars or the speedy return of cars to owning railroads. Because of this provision in the law, it is often cheaper to use the freight cars of another railroad and pay the per diem for cars than to build freight cars.

The bill which I am introducing would allow the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix compensation for the use of freight cars that would encourage an adequate freight car supply and sound car service practices by including a fair return on the value of the equipment. Enactment of this bill would go a long way toward insuring the building of more freight cars and the returning of freight cars to owning railroads, thereby lessening the car shortage which plagues the shippers of the country.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 1789) to amend section 1(14)(a) of the Interstate Commerce Act to insure the adequacy of the national railroad freight car supply, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. MAGNUSON (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

MUTUAL SECURITY ACT OF 1959—AMENDMENTS

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], I submit, for appropriate reference, several amendments to Senate bill 1451, the proposed Mutual Security Act of 1959. I ask unanimous consent that these amendments be printed and lie on the table for 1 week in order that other Senators may join me in their introduction.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be received, appropriately referred, printed, and will lie on the desk, as requested by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent that the amendments be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, many of us who have long been supporters of the mutual security program also have been critical of some of the policies governing that program. Some of us wrote to the President of the United States after the conclusion of the last session of the Congress and asked that a reappraisal of the program be made, along certain lines which we suggested, prior to the submission to the Congress of the fiscal year 1960 mutual security program. My colleagues and I have been concerned that military considerations have played too great a part in the formulation of the program. This is not of course necessarily to say that the amounts requested for military assistance are too large, because modern weapons are very expensive. It is rather that the philosophy of the program is founded too much, we think, on the idea that the danger to the United States today is largely a military one, and that the threat from communism is largely a military threat. Many of us feel that in many parts of the world the most serious danger from communism cannot be met through military means. We are also of the opinion that there are serious problems for the United States arising from the economic and social revolutions in Asia and Africa which arise irrespective of communism and that there is a need today for a more adequate response on the part of the United States.

The President appointed a Committee headed by Mr. Draper to look into the questions raised by my colleagues on the Committee on Foreign Relations. The President, however, delayed doing so and he has approved the fiscal year 1960 program which was formulated without the benefit of the advice of the Draper Committee. I do not find in the fiscal year 1960 mutual security program, or in the changes in the legislation which the President suggested any substantial indication that the direction of the program is to be altered.

In the absence of leadership on the part of the President, those of us in the Congress must do the best we can to fashion the mutual security program to meet today's needs. This is the purpose of the amendments which I have introduced. These amendments deal with only part of the need for changes. I do not pretend that I have dealt with all the problems. I am sure that other Senators will suggest other amendments to cure other ills.

The first amendment is an attempt to clarify the purpose of the mutual security program. The tone of the existing policy language in the Mutual Security Act of 1954 is entirely too military in nature. Other important U.S. objectives have thereby suffered. My amendment retains the existing statement of purpose in the act but would add additional policy guidance which would place our economic and technical assistance in a more appropriate context.

Mr. President, the second amendment which I submitted deals with the important subject of the military force goals which the United States helps other nations to work toward. As those of us who are familiar with the program know, once these military force goals are fixed, a great many political and economic consequences follow. Pakistan, is an example of a country which, in the opinion of many, has been burdened with a military effort so great that its economic development has been retarded and its relations with its neighbors poisoned. My amendment is designed to inject political and economic analysis more adequately into the process of fixing the military force goals.

My third amendment would provide a more adequate basis for financing the Development Loan Fund. This amendment is not really new. The language is the same except for different figures as that which the administration submitted and which the Senate adopted 2 years ago. It proposes that the Development Loan Fund be financed on a banking basis like the Export-Import Bank and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development. My amendment would add capital to the Fund over a period of 5 years at the rate of $1.5 billion each year. These are large sums, Mr. President, but the need is very great. India alone can absorb $1 billion a year in outside capital.

The need for capital for economic development in Asia and Africa and Latin America can be measured in various ways, but the need cannot be measured accurately. I should point out that capital investment is already proceeding to these areas. I ask unanimous consent that I may insert in the RECORD at this point in my remarks a table showing the flow of investment capital from foreign sources to less-developed countries in the year 1957. These sources, including U.S. private and public investment, totaled $3.8 billion for the year 1957.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Estimated investment capital from foreign sources provided to less developed countries in 1957 [1]

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, the process of estimating the need for development capital must take into account, of course, the ability of underdeveloped countries to effectively absorb such capital investment, and one must decide what kind of rate of growth of per capita income it is feasible or necessary to try to achieve. I have here a summary of an attempt by economists at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology to estimate the additional—that is, beyond what is now being invested—amounts of foreign capital which could be productively absorbed annually by underdeveloped countries. This analysis concludes that the maximum annual additional foreign capital which could be productively absorbed would be $3.5 billion. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a summary of this analysis at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the summary was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUMMARY OF ESTIMATE BY MILLIKAN & ROSTOW OF ADDITIVE CAPITAL REQUIREMENTS OF LESS DEVELOPED AREAS AND POSSIBLE SOURCES [1]

1. "An examination of existing national programs" leads the authors to the conclusion that "the average maximum expansion in the [annual] level of capital formation that can be achieved by countries in the early stages of development is 30 to 50 percent in the first 3 or 4 years after planning for such expansion is initiated" (p. 96).

2. On this basis, and considering that some countries can now absorb more capital than others, "the amounts of foreign capital that could productively be absorbed by the underdeveloped countries," are estimated as follows (pp. 98–99):

[Billions of dollars per year]

India, Pakistan, Ceylon	0.8–1.0
Balance of non-Communist Asia (excluding Japan)	.4– .6
Middle East (excluding Pakistan but including Egypt)	.3– .5
Latin America	.8–1.0
Africa (excluding Egypt and Union of South Africa)	.2– .4
Total	2.5–3.5

3. "These levels of capital formation should produce rates of growth of per capita incomes of at least 1 or 2 percent per year" (p. 100).

4. "The maximum figure of $3.5 billion refers to the total annual additional foreign capital inflow into the underdeveloped area from all sources" (p. 103).

5. "The supply of the maximum annual figure of $3.5 billion might break down by source as follows (p. 106):

[In millions of dollars]

"Grants:
U.S. contribution	360
Other country	240
Direct private investment	500
Additional IBRD loans	400
Public loans:
U.S. contribution	1,700
Other country	300
Total	3,500"

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, a number of estimates of foreign capital needs of the underdeveloped countries have been prepared and made public recently. I refer to reports by the Committee for Economic Development, CED—"Economic Development Assistance"; MIT study for the Senate Special Committee To Study the Foreign Aid Program, January 1957; the International Development Advisory Board—Johnston report—"A New Emphasis on Economic Development Abroad," March 1957; the University of Chicago Study for the Senate Special Committee To Study the Foreign Aid Program, March 1957; "A Proposal: Key to an Effective Foreign Policy," by Max F. Millikan and Water W. Rostow; and National Planning Association, NPA—"A New Approach to Foreign Economic Assistance," April 1957.

These reports seem to agree that the need for capital flow into underdeveloped areas from all sources over and above present rates of investment fall in the range from $2 billion to $5 billion annually. Of this total, the amount that would be needed from United States public sources is variously estimated at from $1 billion to $2 billion. Mr. President, I aks unanimous consent that I may at this point in my remarks insert in the RECORD the summary of these reports which have estimated future assistance requirements from the U.S. Government to underdeveloped areas.

There being no objection, the summary was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE AMOUNT OF U.S. ASSISTANCE REQUIRED BY UNDERDEVELOPED AREAS

A number of estimates of the foreign capital needs of the underdeveloped areas have been offered in public reports over the past 2 years. These approximations have been based not only on the desirability of assisting in needed economic growth but also on a judgment as to the capacity of the less developed areas to absorb new capital.

Drawing upon the findings of the various reports which are cited below, the need for additional foreign capital inflow into the underdeveloped areas from all sources appears to fall in the range of from $2 billion to $5 billion annually. Of this total, the amount that would be needed from U.S. public sources is variously estimated at from $1 billion to $2 billion. In those reports which make no quantitative calculation, such as the report by the special studies project of the Rockefeller Brothers Fund, the conclusions called for substantial increases above the present level of appropriations.

A summary of the reports which estimated future assistance requirements follows:

1. The Committee for Economic Development (CED—"Economic Development Assistance"): In a policy report of April 1957, this business group suggested that an outlay of $1 billion a year for the next 5 years in addition to current U.S. economic assistance programs would be a "desirable and necessary investment."

"A program for additional economic aid expenditures averaging $1 billion a year," the CED continued, "would bring our total economic assistance to underdeveloped countries to some $2¼ billion a year." The CED envisaged that the outlay would be considerably less in the first years of the enlarged program. They concluded with the statement that "such an additional outlay for development assistance would deserve priority over many items now contained in or proposed for the budget."

2. MIT Study for the Senate Special Committee to Study the Foreign Aid Program, January 1957: The MIT study estimated that the underdeveloped countries require and could absorb between $2.5 and $3.5 billion of additional funds from all sources. (Page 2) They made no estimate of the amount which would be required from U.S. sources but it can be inferred that this would be of the order of $1 billion to $2 billion per year above the level of the present U.S. aid program.

3. The International Development Advisory Board (Johnston report)—"A New Emphasis on Economic Development Abroad," March 1957: In its report to the President, the Johnston Board said: "We believe that the size of the present development program * * * should be substantially increased" (p. 9). The Board placed the current rate of development aid (excluding technical assistance) at between $400 million and a billion dollars per year.

4. The University of Chicago Study for the Senate Special Committee To Study the Foreign Aid Program, March 1957: The University of Chicago study estimated that economic aid to Asia, the Near East, and Africa from all public sources should be a minimum of $2 billion per year at the outset and might eventually rise to a minimum of $5 billion per year before beginning to decline. (The Chicago study did not estimate the share to be supplied by the United States, although it is certainly at least half of the total.)

5. "A Proposal-Key to an Effective Foreign Policy," by Max F. Millikan and Water W. Rostow: The Millikan-Rostow book estimates that over the next 5 years a maximum annual figure of $3.5 billion, from all foreign sources, is required by the underdeveloped areas for successful economic growth. Out of this total, it is estimated that the United States share would come to a maximum of $2 billion per year.

Because of the problem involved in using so large a volume of foreign capital, Millikan and Rostow go on to estimate that actual demands for U.S. aid will more probably run at about $1.2 billion a year, if sound criteria for efficient use were applied.

6. National Planning Association (NPA)—"A New Approach to Foreign Economic Assistance," April 1957: The NPA statement concluded that the optimum level of aid which could be extended to underdeveloped countries now substantially exceeds that currently available amount of U.S. aid funds. Hence to insure their maximum effectiveness, the size of our economic aid program should be increased. The NPA Committee went on to suggest that a foreign aid corporation should be established with an original capital fund of not less than $1 billion and additional capital obtained as required.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, the administration is asking $700 million for the fiscal year 1960 for the Development Loan Fund. There are, however, on record the opinions by certain top administration officials which put the need for funds higher than that. I am not telling any secrets when I say that the Department of State lost out in this discussion for budgetary reasons. I have here statements by the then Acting Secretary of State Herter and by Undersecretary of State Dillon which indicate that the Department of State thought that the President should ask for $1 billion for the Development Loan Fund for next year. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may insert two brief statements by Mr. Herter and Mr. Dillon in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the statements were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

On November 13, 1958, Acting Secretary of State Christian A. Herter told the International Cooperation Workshop in Washington, D.C.:

"Among the five specific measures proposed by the President at Seattle, I should like to place some special emphasis on the Development Loan Fund.

"This Fund is a major instrument in our effort to assist the less developed nations to carry forward their own plans for progress. It is important to realize that the Development Loan Fund will be substantially out of funds available for new commitments by January 1, 1959. Yet it will have a backlog of over $1.5 billion of applications for loans to help on important projects in many countries. If the Development Loan Fund is to be an effective instrument for peaceful development, it must have resources for substantial increased activity on the order of $1 billion a year. It must also have continuity over a period of years.

"Only under such circumstances can the wastefulness of inadequate planning be avoided."

On November 7, 1958, Under Secretary Dillon, addressing the World Affairs Council of Northern California at San Francisco, said:

"In my view a most serious threat of all is the Soviet economic offensive. * * * I believe that we must place our chief reliance in meeting the Soviet challenge on the mobilization of our economic and technical resources, both public and private, to help raise the living standards of the less privileged nations of the world. * * *

"During the past 12 months, our country's responses to their needs has taken many forms. Perhaps the most striking is the Development Loan Fund, which has added a whole new dimension to foreign loan program. The fund, which began operation early this year, represents a new hope for the underdeveloped countries. * * *

"At the present rate of operations the fund will have committed all of its available resources within a few months which means an annual rate of operations of about $700 million. I believe that we should contemplate a still higher level of lending from the Development Loan Fund, something on the order of $1 billion a year."

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I offer these brief supporting data to show that the figure of $1.5 billion each for 5 years for the Development Loan Fund, contained in my amendment, has a firm basis in economic analysis.

My fourth amendment is designed to provide the President with greater power to counteract the economic offensive of the Communist countries by increasing his authority to transfer military assistance funds to economic purposes. My amendment would give the President the ability to transfer 30 percent rather than 10 percent of military aid funds to nonmilitary uses. The amendment would be permissive; the President could take advantage of it or not as he sees fit. Another reason for this amendment is the possibility that the full report of the Draper committee to the President may reflect a somewhat deeper penetration into the policy issues of the mutual security program. If that happens the President may need increased authority to transfer funds.

Mr. President, the fifth amendment which I am submitting today would clarify the authority of the chief of U.S. diplomatic missions to provide a political and economic judgment of military recommendations sent to Washington by the senior military representatives of the United States in the country. The amendment is designed to give the Ambassador greater control over the recommendations for military aid originating from his so-called country team.

Mr. President, I do not believe that these amendments are the last word. As I said before, other problems remain untouched and I expect that other Senators will have worthwhile ideas on what to do about them. I offer these amendments early, well before the Committee on Foreign Relations begins its hearings on the mutual security program, in order that the committee may have the benefit of comments on them by my colleagues, by the executive branch, and by members of the public. If any other Senators desire to sponsor these amendments with me I shall welcome such support.

The amendments submitted by Mr. FULBRIGHT were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

Amendments intended to be proposed by Mr. FULBRIGHT (for himself, Mr. HUMPHREY, and Mr. KENNEDY) to the bill (S. 1451) to amend further the Mutual Security Act of 1954, as amended, and for other purposes.

1. In order to clarify the purposes today of the mutual security program; on page 1, after line 4 insert:

"SEC. 2. Section 2 of the Mutual Security Act of 1954, as amended, which is a statement of policy, is amended to read as follows:

" 'SEC. 2. STATEMENT OF POLICY.—(a) Through programs of assistance authorized by this Act and its predecessors, the United States has helped thwart Communist intimidation of Greece and Turkey, helped Europe recover from the wounds of World War II, supported defensive military preparations by nations alerted by Communist aggression in Korea, and has soundly begun to help peoples of economically underdeveloped areas to develop their resources and improve their living standards.

" '(b) Programs authorized by this Act continue to serve the following principal purposes:

" '(1) the Congress of the United States perceives the identity of interest which exists between the people of the United States and the peoples of other lands who are striving to free themselves from foreign interference, to obtain or strengthen their national independence, to produce more goods and services and improve ways of living by methods which reflect popular will, and to establish responsible governments which cooperate with like-minded governments. The Congress declares it to be a primary objective and need of the United States to share these strivings by giving generously of our knowledge and substance to peoples willing to work energetically toward these ends. Programs authorized by titles II, III, and IV of chapter II and chapter III shall be primarily directed toward the purpose of this paragraph.

" '(2) The Congress of the United States recognizing that the peace of the world and the security of the United States are endangered as long as international communism and the nations it controls continue by threat of military action, use of economic pressure, internal subversion, or other means to attempt to bring under their domination peoples now free and independent and continue to deny the rights of freedom and self-government of peoples and nations once free but now subject to such domination, declares it to be the policy of the United States to continue as long as such danger to the peace of the world and to the security of the United States persists to make available to free nations and peoples upon request assistance of such nature and in such amounts as the United States deems advisable compatible with its own stability, strength, and other obligations, and as may be needed and effectively used by such free nations and peoples to help them maintain their freedom. Programs authorized by chapter I and title I of chapter II shall be primarily directed toward the purpose of this paragraph.

" '(b) It is the sense of the Congress that inasmuch as—

" '(1) the United States, through mutual security programs, has made substantial contributions to the economic recovery and rehabilitation of the nations of Western Europe;

" '(2) due in part to those programs, it has been possible for such nations to achieve complete economic recovery and to regain their military strength; and

" '(3) certain other friendly nations of the world remain in need of assistance in order that they may defend themselves against aggression and contribute to the security of the free world, those nations that have been assisted in their recovery should, in the future, share with the United States to a greater extent the financial burden of providing aid to those countries which are still in need of assistance of the type provided under this Act.

" '(c) It is the sense of the Congress that assistance under this Act shall be administered so as to assist other peoples in their efforts to achieve self-government or independence under circumstances which will enable them to assume an equal station among the free nations of the world and to fulfill their responsibilities for self-government or independence.' "

2. In order to prevent the burdens of military effort from interfering unduly with economic progress by underdeveloped countries, on page 1, after line 10, insert:

"SEC. 102. Section 105(b) of the Mutual Security Act of 1954, as amended, which relates to conditions applicable to military assistance, is amended by adding the following new paragraph:

" '(5) Military assistance to countries found by the Secretary of State to be underdeveloped shall, unless the Secretary authorizes an exception, be programed, and force goals shall be recommended, according to the principle that economic development needs shall have first call on the resources of such countries.' "

3. To provide for financing the Development Loan Fund in the same manner as other public banking institutions, such as the Export-Import Bank, and in order to emphasize the long-term nature of the United States effort to help less-developed countries; on page 2, strike out lines 11 through 17 and insert the following:

"(a) In section 203, which relates to capitalization, insert before the period at the end of the second sentence of subsection (a) ', and for advances to the Fund beginning in the fiscal year 1960, not to exceed $700 million. In addition, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to make, beginning in the fiscal year 1960, loans to the Fund in amounts needed to cover obligations incurred against the Fund. Except as provided in section 204(b) of this Act, the maximum amount of obligations incurred against the Fund during each of the fiscal years 1960 through 1964 shall be $1,500,000,000; and any unused portion of the maximum applicable to any period shall be added to the maximum applicable to the succeeding period.' and insert a new subsection:

" '(b) For purposes of the loans provided for in this section, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to use the proceeds of the sale of any securities issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act as now in force or as hereafter amended, and the purposes for which securities may be issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act are hereby extended to include this purpose. The President shall determine the terms and conditions of any advances or loans made to the Fund pursuant to this section.'

"(b) In section 204(b), which relates to fiscal provisions, after the first sentence insert:

" 'The amount of such obligations also may not exceed the limitations specified in section 203(a) of this Act except that, to the extent that assets of the Fund other than capitalization provided pursuant to section 203(a) are available, obligations may be incurred beyond such limitations.' "

4. In order to provide the President with greater power to counteract the economic offensive of the Communist bloc by increasing his authority to shift military aid funds to economic purposes, on page 7 after line 13 insert:

"(a) In section 501, which relates to transferability of funds, designate the present tax as '(a)' and add the following new subsection:

" '(b) In view of the rapidly increasing danger to the independence of friendly countries which is presented by the trade and assistance programs of international communism, and not withstanding subsection (a) of this section and the fourth sentence of section 202(b), the President is authorized to transfer to and consolidate with funds made available for nonmilitary use under titles II, III, and IV of chapter II up to 30 per centum of the funds made available for military use under Chapter I' ".

5. To better insure that economic and political considerations shall be weighed with military considerations in fixing force goals to be supported by military assistance and in determining end-item requirements; on page 8, after line 18 insert:

"(c) In section 523(b), which relates to coordination with foreign policy, add the following new sentence:

" 'The Chief of the Diplomatic Mission shall make sure that recommendations of such representatives pertaining to military assistance are coordinated with political and economic considerations, and his comments shall accompany such recommendations if he so desires' ".

EQUITABLE REIMBURSEMENT TO STATES FOR CERTAIN FREE AND TOLL ROADS—ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS OF BILL

Under authority of the order of the Senate of April 17, 1959, the names of Senators LAUSCHE, KERR, and KEATING were added as additional cosponsors of the bill (S. 1714) to authorize appropriations for the Federal-aid primary system of highways for the purpose of equitably reimbursing the States for certain free and toll roads on the National System of Interstate and Defense Highways, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. BUSH on April 17, 1959.

THE DEVELOPMENT OF INTERNATIONAL EDUCATIONAL PROGRAMS OUTSIDE CONTINENTAL UNITED STATES—ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS OF CONCURRENT RESOLUTION

Under authority of the order of the Senate of April 20, 1959, the names of Senators SYMINGTON, ENGLE, and BIBLE were added as additional cosponsors of the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 24) encouraging the development outside the continental United States of international educational programs, submitted by Mr. MCGEE (for himself and other Senators) on April 20, 1959.

APPOINTMENT OF MEMBERS OF SELECT COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL WATER RESOURCES

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, under the authority of Senate Resolution 48, I announce the following appointments to the Select Committee on National Water Resources from the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs: The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON], the Senator from Washington [Mr. JACKSON], and the Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL].

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I announce the following appointments to the Select Committee on National Water Resources, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, under authority of Senate Resolution 48: The Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON], the Senator from California [Mr. ENGLE], and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL].

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I have been requested by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER], chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to announce that the following Senators of that committee have been appointed as members of the Select Committee on National Water Resources, pursuant to Senate Resolution 48: The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. HART], and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG].

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, on April 20, 1959, the Senate approved Senate Resolution 48, which authorized the formation of a committee designated as "The Senate Select Committee on National Water Resources." The resolution, among other provisions, authorizes the chairman of each of the committees on Interior and Insular Affairs, Public Works, Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and Agriculture and Forestry to designate three members from the respective committees to serve on the select committee. In accordance with this provision I wish to announce that I have selected the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. KERR], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CASE], and myself to serve on the select committee as representatives from the Committee on Public Works.

ADDRESSES, EDITORIALS, ARTICLES, ETC., PRINTED IN THE RECORD

On request, and by unanimous consent, addresses, editorials, articles, etc., were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. ROBERTSON:

Address to be delivered by him at Tullidge Clinic dedication, Ararat, Va., April 25, 1959.

By Mr. DODD:

Letters written by him to the Director of the United States Information Agency and editorial comment, including at the Moscow Fair a U.S. exhibit on the role of religion in American life.

By Mr. BYRD of Virginia:

A speech delivered by Senator ROBERTSON at the annual meeting of the Tidewater Group of Building, Savings and Loan Associations at Norfolk, Va., on April 22, 1959.

TIBET IS A VAST PRISON

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I hold in my hand an article entitled "Report From Refugees—Tibet Is a Vast Prison." The article bears a dateline of April 22. It was published in the Washington Daily News on that date, and comes from their United Press correspondent who wrote from the scene.

I now read the article:

REPORT FROM REFUGEES—TIBET IS A VAST PRISON

(By M. M. Gupta)

KATMANDU, NEPAL, April 22.—Communist Chinese troops have turned Tibet into a vast prison with thousands of Tibetans being whipped each day in the streets and Buddhist nuns sent to army camps for the pleasure of the troops, refugees fleeing to Nepal reported today.

They said nearly 2,500 Tibetan monasteries were damaged or destroyed by Communist artillery in the past month and nearly 8,000 monks killed, 12,000 arrested and about 800,000 lamas forced to flee homeless and hungry into the mountains.

This correspondent traveled through the snow-covered 17,000-foot mountain passes to reach the border of Tibet and interview the refugees. At the Nepal-Tibet border a few miles north of the village of Tarke, I met some refugees who said some of 30 well-armed Chinese divisions in Tibet were led by the Russians.

One English-speaking Tibetan named Thote, a 27-year-old graduate of Peiping University, said the Chinese killed 165 members of his clan in the village of Ghetumba in Kham Province. He said he saw his father machinegunned for refusing to betray other Tibetan patriots.

Thote said that during his flight to Nepal he has passed through 65 villages that had been known as good trading centers and that every one was destroyed by the Communists with not a sign of life visible anywhere.

"Every Tibetan was a prisoner," he said. "The whole country was turned into a vast prison. Dusk-to-dawn curfews were imposed all over Tibet and did not allow normal living.

TORTURE

"Thousands of peaceful, innocent Tibetans were being whipped daily in open places in the course of questioning and inhumane methods were being applied for confession. Mostly the people preferred to confess as desired by the Chinese than stand tortures any longer.

"Markets are closed; essential consumer goods have disappeared; trade is finished, resulting in numberless deaths inside houses from artificial starvation caused by the Chinese. Any mention of devotion to the Dalai Lama was a serious crime and people were being forced to show their entire devotion to the Panchen Lama.

"Large numbers of nuns, who locally are called 'ennis,' have been forced to live in army camps at the pleasure of the Chinese. Several nuns reportedly committed suicide to escape Chinese brutalities," he said.

HUNGER

Lithon, another refugee, said 20,000 Chinese troops were searching each house and every person in search of offenders along the southwestern border of Tibet and that most of the people had fled to the barren plateaus and now were dying of hunger and cold.

"The Chinese have confiscated every ounce of corn available in the area and have scorched-earthed all the standing crops in the field, turning the entire vegetation into ashes," he said.

Despite this campaign of terror, the refugees said the Tibetans still were continuing their fight against the Communists, and showing open defiance of their Red rulers.

Mr. President, this situation is most shocking. It is one more glaring piece of evidence of what the Chinese Communists really are. I should think that, after this, those who have been advocating recognition of Red China would hang their heads in shame.

Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire.

PRESERVATION OF BATTLE ACT

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, there has been introduced by my colleagues, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN] and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], Senate bill 1697, to amend the Mutual Defense Assistance Control Act of 1951, and which would undercut seriously the provisions of that act. I believe strongly that the so-called Battle Act has proved the test of time, and has admirably served in the preservation of our national integrity.

One short year ago I fought shoulder to shoulder with our former colleague, Bill Knowland, to preserve the integrity of the Battle Act by defeating the so-called Kennedy amendment to the Mutual Security Authorization Act, which attempted to accomplish what S. 1697 now seeks to accomplish.

It is not my purpose at this time to debate the merits of the bill; but, in view of the fact that it has been introduced, I should like to ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD an editorial from the Oakland Tribune, written by our former colleague, in regard to this matter.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Oakland (Calif.) Tribune, Apr. 16, 1959]

FINANCING COMMUNISTS

For some years a sturdy piece of legislation known as the Battle Act has stood against those who would scatter the U.S. taxpayers' dollars around the world with indiscriminate judgment in promotion of their role of global do-gooders.

Now a new attack has been made upon that barrier which was designed to prevent the funneling of any large share of the American economy into any country that classes our economic system as an enemy to be overcome.

Under a bill offered by Senator JOHN KENNEDY and Senator GEORGE D. AIKEN, American economic aid could be sent into Communist satellite countries as a wedge to pry loose Moscow control.

The Battle Act, which specifically forbids aid to any nation controlled or dominated by Communists unless there is a Presidential decision that such aid is merited and can be beneficial to the United States, would be practically destroyed by the Kennedy-Aiken measure.

A similar attempt was defeated in the Senate last year by the slim margin of 43 to 42.

The best argument Senator KENNEDY could bring up in introducing the second attempt Tuesday was that "there is a real opportunity for giving our foreign policy a flexibility which might exploit cracks in the Iron Curtain."

That is as flimsy as it is unrealistic. Hungary stands as an outstanding example of what comes when the people of any satellite state shows opposition to Moscow. Poland is an example of a satellite state that has received U.S. assistance, showing in return only a still closer subjugation to Moscow.

And what have we received in return for the hundreds of millions of dollars sent to Yugoslavia? There has been no evidence of a desire to aline foreign policy with that of the West. There has been no departure from communism. There has been nothing at all from Marshal Tito that serves the interests of the United States.

It is particularly unwise at this time to earmark our dollars for any Communist country. Rather than contribute to the economy of any Red state, now is the time to draw tighter, not loosen, the Treasury purse strings.

HARMFUL FALLOUT FROM NUCLEAR EXPERIMENTATION

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, on March 29, 1959, I called to the attention of the American people a program which I advocated for the minimization of harmful fallout from nuclear experimentation. At that time I think I stood practically alone in advocating my views. I realize full well, as ranking minority member of the Armed Services Committee, the Aeronautical and Space Sciences Committee, and the Appropriations Committee, that nuclear experimentation must continue, but with my abiding regard for human life, I feel it should be conducted in a way to minimize harmful effects. It was in that regard that I made my statement of March 29. I am happy that that view has now become the administrative official position, and I hope that my proposals can be worked out at the coming Geneva conference.

Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire.

POLISH CONSTITUTION DAY

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, on May 3, 168 years ago, one of the most remarkable documents known to Western civilization was enacted—the first Polish constitution.

Our own U.S. Constitution was only 2 years old at that time. Like our charter of freedom, the Polish constitution proclaimed the principles of religious toleration, the secret ballot, and freedom of thought, and in other respects it is somewhat comparable to the Constitution of the United States.

Polish people everywhere, people of Polish descent, friends of Poland, will mark this day as a never-to-be-forgotten milestone in the quest for freedom.

There is nothing Communist tyrants can do to destroy that milestone.

Like the spirit of freedom itself, the Polish constitution endures.

From time to time, we can even see the spirit of Polish freedom through the Iron Curtain.

We can see how heavy is the Communist yoke.

In February of this year, for instance, the U.S. Embassy in Warsaw was packed for a week by Poles on the strength of a false rumor that the United States was seeking Polish workers to go to Alaska and other States. The rumor started and took hold in a farming district in eastern Poland near the Soviet border. More than 1,000 people answered the false rumor that freedom in America was available.

A few months previously, another rumor started. This one was that parts of eastern Poland would be taken by the Soviet Union. That rumor started such a wave of despondency that the Polish radio had to devote special broadcasts to fight it.

The contrast in reactions to these two rumors needs no underlining. It is a tragic condemnation of international communism that a nation with Poland's heritage must endure Soviet domination.

Poland's cause is our cause, and we can never sacrifice her noble people to permanent slavery behind the Iron Curtain.

Let us remember that great Polish patriots such as General Pulaski joined our own patriots in fighting for American liberty.

Let us remember that Poland gave to the world men of arts such as Chopin and Paderewski, who later became Premier of his native country.

Let us remember that Poland gave to the world the great astronomer, Copernicus.

There is no field of human endeavor that does not find Poland in the forefront, despite her tragic history of division and redivision.

Let us pray that the day will soon come when we can celebrate this Constitution Day with a free people in a free Poland.

OREGON CENTENNIAL CALLS ATTENTION TO STATE'S LEADERSHIP IN GOVERNMENTAL REFORM

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, this year my native State of Oregon celebrates 100 years of statehood. Oregon's centennial has appropriately stimulated an abundance of backward glances—personal reminiscence of a pioneer era, historical vignettes of explorers and missionaries, analysis of economic growth from a fur trader's outpost to a major food and lumber producing center. The heroic conquest of plain, river, and mountain marked Oregon's progress from frontier wilderness to centennial State. The efforts of the people of Oregon to settle and develop the Oregon country have provided an addition to American history which is rich in names and events.

Yet the story of Oregon's first 100 years as a State is not just a story of man's victory over nature in the harnessing of mighty rivers, the utilization of verdant forests, and the breaking of fertile soil. Oregon has contributed more than fine pine and fir lumber, fruit and grain, and "wild West" stories, in return for full membership in the Union.

ANOTHER GREAT "OREGON TRAIL"

The Oregon Trail which led across plains and peaks to the Pacific Ocean symbolizes the westward migration. It will always be recalled as part of an epic chapter in the historical heritage of the United States. But there is another "Oregon Trail," a path blazed by the people of my State with equal courage and initiative. It was charted, not by scouts and wagonmasters, but by politicians and voters. The route is today marked, not by stone cairns and wooden signboards, but by statutes and constitutional amendments. And while the wagon tracks which marked the passage of a restless people who were seeking new land and a new life have faded, the marks of this Oregon Trail remain, and continue to be cut deeper by constant use.

Today, this trail is called the "Oregon System." Because of its lasting significance—not merely for Oregonians, but for all Americans—this reform may well be noted as the most notable landmark in the rich and full history of my State. I wish to speak briefly on its meaning today.

FRAIL MIGRANT LEADS FIGHT

The story of the "Oregon system"—consisting of the governmental procedures known as the initiative, referendum, and recall, and including direct election of U.S. Senators—is largely the story of one man and his dramatic fight to translate into actual practice the words "government of and by the people." The man's name was William Simon U'Ren. He was a frail, determined migrant from Colorado with fervent ideals and a propensity for inducing other people to share his burning faith.

Between the years 1900 and 1910, U'Ren sponsored and promoted many sweeping governmental reforms which were destined to make Oregon a laboratory for testing the wisdom and sovereignty of the electorate. The name of U'Ren is listed in history books and civics texts more often than that of any other Oregon political figure. Lincoln Steffens long ago described U'Ren as "the law-giver," and the description has stuck.

Two publications played an important part in the formation of what was to become the "Oregon system." U'Ren came to Oregon in 1889, full of a reformer's zeal. In a Rocky Mountain mining camp, he had read Henry George's epic "Progress and Poverty." The book convinced him that the single-tax could solve most of the economic ills of mankind. While changing from a boat to a train at Oakland pier, U'Ren picked up a frayed pamphlet about the initiative and referendum as they had been adapted from the ancient landesgemeinden in the cantons of Switzerland, where all the men in an alpine district made the local laws.

U'REN WORKED FOR SECRET BALLOT

As a newcomer in Oregon, U'Ren worked fanatically in the crusade of the Australian Ballot League, helping Oregon to pioneer among the States in guaranteeing the secret ballot. U'Ren's real goal, however, was the single tax. Because he knew the conservative Oregon Legislature would never enact such legislation, he decided to turn to the people at the polls.

The reformer began promoting the initiative and the referendum. Under the proposal known as the initiative, the signatures of 8 percent of the registered voters could place any suggested law on the ballot, for the people to decide with their ballots. The referendum was slightly different; it provided that 5 percent of the voters could force a plebiscite at the polls, on any proposition enacted by the legislature. Both ideas were based on the widespread circulation of petitions through city marketplaces and along rural roads.

In seeking to secure adoption of these methods, U'Ren enlisted the aid of such groups as the Farmer's Alliance, the Oregon Knights of Labor, and the State grange. He recruited support from men as far apart on issues as a conservative newspaper editor and a liberal labor leader. The task was made easier by the fact that the Oregon Legislature was suspected of subservience to special interests.

LEGISLATURE SUBMITTED AMENDMENT

When public opinion gradually but steadily mobilized behind U'Ren, the legislature could no longer resist his importuning and lobbying. In 1901, it submitted to the voters a proposed constitutional amendment embodying the initiative and referendum. At the elections of 1902, the amendment was adopted overwhelmingly.

U'Ren, however, was still primarily interested in the single tax. Yet, despite several attempts with the new initiative petition tool, U'Ren's economy panacea was rejected by the voters. But there were other woes for which the reformer had cures, one of which directly concerns this body, the U.S. Senate.

In the Oregon Legislature, U'Ren had been horrified at the deals and trades which determined who would represent Oregon in the U.S. Senate. The situation seemed hopeless, for the Federal Constitution plainly stipulated that Senators in each State should be chosen by the legislature thereof.

CANDIDATE'S PLEDGE CREATED

U'Ren's imaginative mind created an idea known as proposition No. 1. This proposition was a pledge asked of each candidate for the Oregon Legislature, as follows:

> I further state to the people of Oregon, as well as to the people of my legislative district, that during my term of office I shall always vote for that candidate for U.S. Senator in Congress who has received the highest number of the people's votes for that position.

U'Ren turned next to his initiative method; and at the election of 1908 there was placed on the ballot a measure instructing the legislature to support the people's choice for U.S. Senator. Decisive approval followed—69,668 votes in favor, and only 21,162 in opposition.

With one State electing its Senators at the polls, the old appointment form had no chance of surviving elsewhere; the contrast was too great. In 1913, the 17th amendment to the Federal Constitution was ratified, thus spreading from sea to shining sea William S. U'Ren's conviction that the U.S. Senate should represent the sovereign will of the people, as expressed at the ballot box.

SENATOR BORAH CREDITS U'REN

The famed Senator William E. Borah, of Idaho, was later to say of the 17th amendment:

> The original work for this amendment was done in the State of Oregon by the same man who drafted proposition No. 1.

Many eminent American political observers believe, Mr. President, that the reform originated by U'Ren in Oregon was a vital factor in rehabilitating the prestige of the body in which we sit. Until U.S. Senators were chosen directly by popular vote, many men regarded the House of Representatives as more worthy of attainment than the Senate. The direct election of Senators reversed this estimate.

In the early days, as the New York Times has noted, the Senate often adjourned in order to permit its Members to hear key debates in the House. James Madison, the author of our Federal Constitution, said he "could not afford" to accept a Senate seat, because the debates were of scant influence on public opinion. So Madison went to the House of Representatives, and thence to the White House. Indeed, during the first century of our national history, 12 out of 25 of our Presidents could look back upon earlier service in the House.

But, after the change began in Oregon, the Senate came to be considered as definitely the place of greater influence. The popular election of its Members, as proposed by William S. U'Ren, had wrought the change.

MANY STATES HAVE FOLLOWED OREGON

The recall of public officials also was added to the Oregon constitution, in 1908, as part of U'Ren's arsenal of reforms. All of these varying devices for putting the Government more directly in the hands of the people are known as the "Oregon system", because they had their American origins in Oregon, and because they have been used more often in Oregon than in any other State. Following Oregon's leadership, at least 39 other States of the Union have, in varying degree, adopted the initiative and referendum. The recall is part of the constitution of 28 States.

Naturally there have been criticisms of these methods of direct government. Yet, U'Ren scoffed at suggestions that the initiative and referendum should be jettisoned because the voters had passed some unwise laws. "Some mighty weak men have been put into high public office," he once said to me, "and yet no one talks of curtailing the right of every man and woman to vote."

For U'Ren, the Oregon system was the Bible and the Koran; and he was dedicated fiercely to it, as an illustration will indicate. Norman Hapgood, the editor of Collier's once wrote that U'Ren, alone among men, had once changed the brilliant and stubborn mind of Woodrow Wilson. The 27th President had been adamantly opposed to the initiative and referendum until he heard U'Ren talk fervently, in his study, in defense of the Oregon system. Wilson not only revised his views, but also apologized publicly for his earlier hostility to the initiative and referendum.

COURAGE, PERSEVERANCE BEHIND REFORMS

Today we tend to take for granted many of these governmental and social reforms; but, as the story of William S. U'Ren illustrates, they were won for us with courage and perseverance not unlike that exhibited by our hardest and most brilliant generals.

Mr. President, adoption of the initiative and referendum, provision for the recall of public officials, and leadership in pioneering the direct election of Senators are major contributions by my State to Government in the United States. But another event sparked by Oregon action looms large in the history of political and social progress in this country. I refer to the "Brandeis Brief."

The Brandeis Brief was the memorable defense prepared by the eminent Louis D. Brandeis in the case of Muller against Oregon, decided by the U.S. Supreme Court in 1908. That decision affirmed the progressive legislation, passed 5 years earlier by the Oregon State Legislature, limiting to 10 hours in 1 day the working hours of women in factories and laundries. I have had the Library of Congress prepare a brief summary of the case of Muller against Oregon; and because the summary presents so well the Supreme Court's action. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed at this point in the RECORD, in connection with my remarks.

There being no objection, the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BRIEF OF MULLER v. OREGON, 208 U.S. 412 (1908)

In error to the Supreme Court of the State of Oregon to review a judgment which affirmed a conviction in the circuit court for the county of Multnomah in that State requiring a woman employed in a laundry to work more than 10 hours daily.

Facts:

On February 19, 1903, the Legislature of the State of Oregon passed an act (Session Laws, 1903, p. 148), the first section of which is in these words:

"SECTION 1. That no female (shall) be employed in any mechanical establishment or factory, or laundry in this State more than 10 hours during any one day. The hours of work may be so arranged as to permit the employment of females at any time so that they shall not work more than 10 hours during 24 hours of any one day."

Section 3 deals with criminal penalties.

On September 18, 1905, an information was filed in the circuit court of the State for the county of Multnomah, charging that the defendant "on the 4th day of September, A.D. 1905, in the county of Multnomah and State of Oregon, then and there being the owner of a laundry known as the Grand Laundry, in the city of Portland, and the employer of females therein, did then and there unlawfully permit and suffer one Joe Haselbock, he the said Joe Haselbock, then and there being an overseer, superintendent, and agent of said Curt Muller, in the said Grand Laundry, to require a female, to wit, one Mrs. E. Gotcher, to work more than 10 hours in said laundry on said 4th day of September, A.D. 1905, contrary to the statutes in such cases, made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the State."

A trial resulted in a verdict against the defendant who was sentenced to pay a fine of $10. The supreme court of the State affirmed the conviction (48 Or. 252, 85 Pac. 855) whereupon the case was brought to the Supreme Court of the United States on writ of error.

Question: Is the statute under which the defendant was convicted constitutional, so far as it affects the work of a female in a laundry?

Decision: Yes, affirmed.

Reasoning: Mr. Justice Brewer delivered the opinion of the Court.

By the decisions of the State supreme court, the State statute does not conflict with any provisions of the Oregon constitution. The Court takes judicial cognizance of all matters of general knowledge, such as the fact that women's physical structure and the performance of maternal functions place her at a disadvantage which justifies a difference in legislation in regard to some of the burdens which rest upon her. As healthy mothers are essential to vigorous offspring the physical well being of women is an object of public interest. The regulation of her hours of labor falls within the police power of the State, and a statute directed exclusively to such regulation does not conflict with the due process or equal protection clauses of the 14th amendment.

The right of a State to regulate the working hours of women rests on the police power and the right to preserve the health of the women of the State, and is not affected by other laws of the State granting or denying to women the same rights as to contract and the elective franchise as are enjoyed by men. While the general liberty to contract in regard to one's business and the sale of one's labor is protected by the 14th amendment that liberty is subject to proper restrictions under the police power of the State.

The limitations which this statute places upon her contractual powers, upon her right to agree with her employer as to the time she shall labor, are not imposed solely for her benefit, but for the benefit of all. The two sexes differ in structure of body, in the functions to be performed by each, in the amount of physical strength, in the capacity for long-continued labor particularly when done standing, the influence of vigorous health upon the future well-being of the race, the self reliance which enables one to assert full rights and the capacity to maintain the struggle for subsistence.

The Oregon statute of 1903 providing that no female shall work in certain establishments more than 10 hours a day is constitutional so far as it affects the work of females in laundries, although like legislation affecting male employees may be invalid.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, the reasoning of the Court, as expressed in the opinion delivered by Justice David Brewer, seems elementary to us today. Yet, as the distinguished newspaper, the St. Louis Post-Dispatch has pointed out editorially, it is necessary to see the issue in the terms of 1908, in order to recognize what a landmark that decision is in the legal history of social progress. I ask unanimous consent that the editorial entitled "Landmark in the Law," from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of December 26, 1958, be printed at this point in the RECORD, in connection with my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, Dec. 26, 1958]

LANDMARK IN THE LAW

Social progress in perspective becomes a mighty, steady flow of countless events that merge into one another. Yet now and then a landmark stands out and one of these is a decision by the Supreme Court handed down 50 years ago. We refer to the case of the historic "Brandeis brief," Muller v. Oregon, decided in 1908.

Its issue seems quite elementary now, after the passage of a half century. All the Oregon Legislature had done was to pass, in 1903, a law forbidding the employment of women in factories and laundries for longer than 10 hours in 1 day. Everyone now agrees that it was a regulation for the public welfare.

But we need to see Oregon's 10-hour factory law for women, not in terms of 1958, but in the framework of its own day. For in 1908 the Supreme Court was only 3 years beyond its 5-to-4 decision in the bakeshop case of Lochner v. New York which rejected a State law designed to limit employment in bakeries to 60 hours in a week. That was the decision which brought Justice Holmes's memorable protest: "The 14th amendment does not enact Mr. Herbert Spencer's 'social statics.' "

Oregon officials knew that a victory for their 10-hour law for women in factories and laundries would amount in part at least to a Supreme Court reversal. And so they engaged the foremost legal advocate of social causes of the times—Louis D. Brandeis, first of Louisville and St. Louis, then of Boston, and later to sit on the Supreme Court himself by appointment of Woodrow Wilson.

The brief that Mr. Brandeis prepared in behalf of the Oregon law is what makes Muller v. Oregon a social progress landmark in the law. For it was something new in Supreme Court pleading. There was very little on the precedent law and for a simple reason: there was little law. Indeed the American law took up only 2 pages out of the total of 113 pages in the brief. The references to foreign law took up five pages more. The rest of Mr. Brandeis' brief presented the social and economic experience around the world which justified the enactment of the Oregon statute.

To support his case, Mr. Brandeis quoted a message of Theodore Roosevelt to Congress, a debate in the British Parliament, proceedings in the French Senate, reports of German factory inspectors, the New York Bureau of Labor Statistics and the U.S. Industrial Commission. He cited findings in a book by Mrs. Sidney Webb, medical authorities, and other qualified groups and persons.

A good description of the brief appeared in the opinion which Justice Brewer wrote for a unanimous Supreme Court:

(After citations to laws): "Then follows extracts from over 90 reports of committees, bureaus of statistics, commissioners of hygiene, inspectors of factories, both in this country and Europe, to the effect that long hours of labor are dangerous to women, primarily because of their special physical organization. The matter is discussed in these reports in different aspects, but all agree as to the danger. Following them are extracts from similar reports discussing the general benefits of shorter hours from an economic aspect.

"Individual instances are given tending to support the general conclusion. These reports may be summed up in what an inspector for Hanover, Germany, says: 'The reasons for the reduction of the working day to 10 hours—(a) the physical organization of women, (b) her maternal functions, (c) the rearing and education of the children, (d) the maintenance of the home—are all so important and so far reaching that the need for such reduction need hardly be discussed.'

This marshaling of social fact so impressed the Supreme Court that the entire Bench said with Justice Brewer: "We take judicial cognizance of all matters of general knowledge." The Justices said expressly that Oregon had a full right to limit the hours of work a woman might do in a factory or laundry.

Now, after a half century, it is eminently in order to salute the Oregon legislators who passed the law, Louis D. Brandeis who blazed a legal trail with his pioneering brief, and Justice David J. Brewer and his eight colleagues on the Supreme Court whose forward-looking decision riveted a sound principle into the American way of life.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, in pointing out this legal landmark in the field of labor legislation, I think it also pertinent to note that Oregon was one of the first States in our Nation to initiate workmen's accident compensation; and that my State early recognized the rights of labor unions; and that in 1935 the Oregon Legislature passed the "Little Norris-La Guardia" Act, which was modeled after the Federal law of that name.

These illustrations, Mr. President, indicate clearly that the first 100 years of my State of Oregon have not—as too many people believe—been filled only with Indian fighting and lumbering. We Oregonians are truly proud of the rich pioneer heritage of our State. But we are also proud of the heritage of governmental and social reform which we have been able to share with all of the United States. I hope my brief remarks today on these contributions will serve to point out these important landmarks, as we in centennial Oregon review our first 100 years.

NOMINATION OF CLARE BOOTHE LUCE TO BE AMBASSADOR TO BRAZIL

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, in the recent hearing before the Committee on Foreign Relations concerning the nomination of Mrs. Clare Boothe Luce to be Ambassador to Brazil, certain statements were made by Mrs. Luce about the writer of an article about her.

I have received a letter from Mr. Max Ascoli, one of the authors of the article and one of the persons to whom Mrs. Luce referred. In order that the matter be clarified, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Ascoli's letter be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE REPORTER,
New York City, April 22, 1959.

The Honorable J. W. FULBRIGHT,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR FULBRIGHT: I have just gone through the printed text of the hearing on April 15 of your committee on the nomination of Mrs. Clare Boothe Luce. As you well know, during that hearing Senator WAYNE MORSE asked Mrs. Luce a number of questions about her policies and behavior while she was Ambassador to Italy—questions all suggested by an article, written by Claire Sterling and myself, that appeared in the Reporter magazine and that you have been kind enough to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 17, 1959.

Although I would be strongly tempted to discuss the answers Mrs. Luce gave to Senator MORSE'S questions, I think that no good purpose would be served in doing so in a letter to you now. But I cannot help reacting to two statements that, in an exceedingly confused way, Mrs. Luce made and that involved directly myself and my Rome correspondent, Claire Sterling. Mrs. Luce said, "The author of that article, as you well know is very sympathetic, and has been for a long time, to the Socialist position in Italy." I assume she means me. In that case, I can only answer that there is much truth in the statement about my sympathy for the Socialist position in Italy as there is in the assumption that the members of your committee are aware of it. I can easily quote editorial after editorial in the Reporter in which I denounced Nenni as "the man who, all over the world, has become the symbol for fellow travelling socialism," (editorial of June 9, 1953).

Later, again in answering Senator MORSE, Mrs. Luce says that "the reporter of the magazine very much hoped" that the left of center anti-Communist Italian parties would join "with the Socialist pro-Communist left." Here, she cannot mean anyone but Claire Sterling. This, again, is a plain misstatement of facts. In her articles on Italian politics, Claire Sterling repeatedly stated that should the Nenni Socialists ever free themselves from their Communist bonds, and should they join forces with the Saragat Social Democrats, then, as she put it in an article in the November 29, 1956 issue, they "would be able both to check the Christian Democrats and work with them." In other words, whatever political bias Claire Sterling might have had has always been in the direction of wishing that the Christian Democratic Party could be strengthened by a coalition with the anti-Communist left.

Finally, may I point out the fact that Claire Sterling is a reporter, that her stories are edited by me, and that the editorial politics of my magazine as far as Italian affairs are concerned have been undeviatingly against the Nenni fellow travelers and their Communist masters. So have been my actions.

As Mrs. Luce's references to Mrs. Sterling and myself, although cloudy and sly, are fairly obvious, I am compelled to write to you.

Sincerely,

MAX ASCOLI.

TAXATION OF LIFE INSURANCE COMPANIES

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD a statement of the action of the Committee on Finance on the life insurance income tax bill, H.R. 4245.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATE FINANCE COMMITTEE ACTION ON H.R. 4245, TAXATION OF LIFE INSURANCE COMPANIES

1. The committee revised the method employed in phase one of the bill in computing the deduction rate. Instead of this being the average of each company's earned rate and an assumed rate (the company's own assumed rate for the current year or the industry average assumed rate for the prior year, whichever is higher) it is to be the company's own average earned rate for the last 5 years (current year and 4 prior years).

2. The committee decided that amounts deducted under phase two under the two special deductions, the deduction equal to 10 percent of additions to nonparticipating reserves and the deduction equal to 2 percent of current year's premiums on group insurance, should be taxed under phase three if these amounts are ultimately paid out to stockholders. This is accomplished by requiring the amount of these two special deductions to be added to the policyholders' surplus account.

3. The committee increased the small business deduction under both phase one and two from 5 to 10 percent of net investment income (as otherwise computed). The ceiling deduction of $25,000, however, remains the same. Thus, the maximum benefit will be reached with an income of $250,000 instead of $500,000.

4. The committee adopted an alternative to the deduction equal to 10 percent of additions to nonparticipating reserves. In lieu of this deduction taxpayers may elect to take a deduction equal to 3 percent of the current year's premiums on nonparticipating policies for contracts for periods of 5 years or more.

5. The committee provided that net operations losses from the years 1955, 1956, and 1957 may be carried forward to 1958 and subsequent years.

6. The committee provided that in lieu of the regular 5-year carryforward of net operations losses, new companies for their first 5 years of existence are to have a 10-year carryforward from each of these 5 years.

7. The bill presently provides that if a company in any year does not qualify as a life insurance company any income on which the tax was deferred under phase three becomes due as of the end of the last year it qualified as a life insurance company. The committee amended this to provide a 2-year interval of nonqualification as an insurance company, before this phase three tax becomes due in such cases. However, if any of this income on which the tax was deferred is paid out in this 2-year period the tax becomes due on this amount.

8. The committee changed the bill to provide in phase one for a division all items of income, including tax-exempt income, partially tax-exempt interest and dividends received from other corporations, between the policyholders and the life insurance company. The portion of all items attributed to the policyholder are set aside and not taken into account in computing the life insurance company's tax. The portion of the income items attributed to the policyholders is to be determined by expressing the policyholders' requirements as a percent of investment yield (net investment income plus tax-exempt income, etc.). The policyholder requirements (except for the use of the 5-year average) are determined in the same manner as the policy and other contract liability deduction under the House bill except that there is no downward adjustment in the requirements for tax-exempt interest, etc.

The life insurance company's tax base is then computed by subtracting from its share of investment yield, its share of tax-exempt interest, its share of thirty fifty-seconds of partially tax-exempt interest, and its share of the 85 percent intercorporate dividends received deduction. An added statutory proviso makes it clear that in no event is any tax to be imposed on tax-exempt interest or on the 85 percent of intercorporate dividends which are deductible under general code provisions. A somewhat similar revision was made in the phase two tax base.

9. The committee decided to allow policyholder dividends, the 10-percent deduction for additions to reserves for nonparticipating policies (or 3-percent deduction for premiums) and the 2-percent deduction for group insurance to add to, or create, an underwriting loss which may be offset against phase one taxable investment income to the extent of $250,000 of such items.

10. The committee adopted a provision preventing a double tax with respect to reinsurance where the reinsuring company pays the ceding company's tax with respect to the reinsurance.

11. The committee agreed to provide in the case of organizations taxed as insurance companies, which would be exempt from tax as local beneficiary associations under section 501(c)(9) except for the fact that their investment income exceeded 15 percent of their total receipts that: (A) under the phase one tax their actuarial reserves are to be treated as life insurance reserves even though not required by State law, and (B) under the phase two tax only a small proportion of decreases in reserves built up before 1958 arising from voluntary lapses of policies are to be taken into account in determining receipts.

12. The committee agreed that distributions to shareholders in redemption of life insurance stock are not to be treated as resulting in a phase three tax if the stock was issued before 1958, if the stock is limited as to dividends, and if the stock can be called at the option of the company at a premium of not more than 5 percent.

13. Although the phase three tax is not to apply to 1958 income, the committee agreed to set up the shareholders surplus account for income of 1958. Therefore amounts taxed in 1958 can be paid out in subsequent years without first paying a tax on distributed income of the subsequent year.

14. The committee agreed in phase three to lower the ceiling for the policyholders surplus account. The 60-percent ceiling was lowered to 50 percent in the case of premiums. In the case of reserves the committee provided a ceiling of 25 percent of additions to reserves since 1958 or 15 percent of total reserves, whichever is higher, instead of the present single limit of 25 percent of reserves.

15. The committee agreed to provide assessment companies with a 3 percent assumed rate of interest on their reserves for phase one. Although they set aside a portion of assessments as reserves, since they have no assumed rate they technically would have no policy reserve requirements without this change.

16. Where a company has reinsured policies of assessment companies and reserves of these companies are used by the reinsuring company to cover deficiency reserves and loading expenses with respect to the reinsured policies, the committee agreed that the reserves are to qualify as deficiency reserves to the extent they do not represent loading expenses. Therefore decreases in these deficiency reserves (except for the loading element) will not be treated as taxable income.

17. Where a company sold its entire industrial insurance business in 1958, the committee agreed the sale is to be considered a capital transaction. Since capital gains and losses are not to be taxed in 1958 such transactions would have no tax effect in 1958. No implications are to be drawn from this, however, as to the tax treatment of such transactions in the future.

18. The committee agreed to permit companies to make an election for 1958 only between the approximate and exact methods of revaluing preliminary term reserves to a net level premium basis. Then under the committee decision, the company would have a new election between these methods binding for 1959 and subsequent years.

19. The committee agreed to make it clear in the committee report that life insurance departments of mutual savings banks are to be treated as life insurance companies for all purposes of the bill. It also agreed to provide in the statute that these departments of mutual savings banks are to have until April 16, instead of until March 16, each year to determine the amount of their policyholder dividends.

20. The committee agreed to provide that foreign insurers may for phase three allocate the portion of a distribution that is allocable to U.S. business on the basis of either U.S. surplus to total surplus (as in the bill) or on the basis of U.S. insurance liabilities to total insurance liabilities. It also provided apportionment rules where a Canadian company mutualizes, along the lines of those provided elsewhere in the bill.

21. Since under the bill capital gains occurring prior to 1959 are not taxed, the committee agreed to provide that proceeds from installment payments received after 1958 on pre-1959 sales are not subject to tax.

22. Where an insurance company is required to shift to an accrual method of accounting an adjustment in income is taxed by a measurement which includes one-tenth of the adjustment in 1957 income (then after this additional tax is determined, the final tax on the adjustment is 10 times this amount). The committee agreed to provide that in measuring the additional tax on this adjustment under 1957 law that the "two for one limit" (designed to tax investment income of over-capitalized companies at 52 percent) is not to be taken into account solely by reason of this adjustment. It also agreed to provide that for the additional tax on the adjustment any effect of this additional income in reducing the special interest deduction (where investment income was less, or only slightly exceeded, interest requirements) is to be ignored.

23. The committee agreed to make it clear under the bill that the interest paid deduction is to be available where a life insurance company is required to make payments or credits on special contingency reserves of a nonforfeitable character which it must hold as a liability under some group insurance policy such as that authorized under the Federal Employees Group Life Insurance Act of 1954.

24. The committee agreed to make the phase three tax gradually effective over a 3-year period, with the result that one-third of the phase three tax otherwise payable in 1959 will be due; two-thirds of the 1960 tax will be due; and the full tax will be due in 1961.

25. The committee agreed to treat variable annuity companies as life insurance companies for tax purposes and their reserves as life insurance reserves. This treatment is provided for a 5-year period to give Congress an opportunity to review the treatment at that time to determine whether they should come under the life insurance provisions or some special provisions should be adopted for them.

26. The committee agreed to impose certain limitations on the application of phase two for the 1958 tax liability. If the phase two tax base for 1958 (after deduction of the phase one base from gain from operations and reduction of the remainder by 50 percent) exceeds the phase one tax base, the phase two tax base is to be reducd by 10 percent of this excess.

SENATE BILL 1686 PROPOSES A PRACTICABLE FOOD-STAMP PLAN FOR A NECESSARY NUTRITIONAL DIET FOR NEEDY CITIZENS

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, it is with a sense of satisfaction that I associate myself as cosponsor of Senate bill 1686 the food-stamp plan presented by the distinguished junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. SYMINGTON] and the able senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY].

This bill (S. 1686) is a realistic and practicable measure to provide for the public welfare by securing a minimal dietary level among our very low income and unemployed persons.

In spite of the growing recovery from the recession of 1957–58, for which we are all duly grateful—in spite of the more hopeful appearance of statistics of employment and production—there are millions of American families, Mr. President, to whom these figures are still mere shadows and abstractions. These are the people who have not, and are not now sharing in the return to national prosperity. These are the 4,300 still currently unemployed, the unnumbered hundreds of thousands working only a part-time week, and the several million Americans—the aged, the blind, the disabled, and the dependent children—whose only means of support is that of public assistance.

These people for the most part live on the bare level of subsistence, with the nagging knowledge of want constantly at their elbow. Life can endure on these terms, but it cannot prosper, it cannot thrive.

The purpose of S. 1686 is to offer these people the means of supplementing their present grossly inadequate diets in order to achieve a necessary level of vitamin, mineral and protein nourishment. The able junior Senator from Missouri has already offered a lucid explanation of the detailed mechanics by which this bill will achieve its purposes. I would therefore direct my remarks to more general considerations.

Somewhat more than 30 years ago, Mr. President, the noted economist, Alfred Marshall, stated that "The study of the causes of poverty is the study of the causes of the degradation of a large part of mankind." Though poverty is no longer the common lot of people that it once was, one need not be assailed as a "prophet of doom and gloom" for admitting that we still have in the United States much of what John Kenneth Galbraith has termed "case" poverty and "insular" poverty—the first applying to individual persons and families who have been unable, for a variety of reasons, to cope with their environment, the second applying to entire communities or regions which have failed to share in the national well-being.

The pending measure, my colleagues, is not designed as a panacea for either of these conditions. But this legislative body would be doing less than its duty if we failed to employ every means at our disposal to remedy these conditions. The first and most apparent means at hand is that of our vast agricultural surpluses which can provide the necessary nutritional level for these marginal people.

One hundred years ago the American farmer provided sufficient food for himself and three others; today he produces enough to feed himself and 20 others. In the past 20 years, the American farmer has through his own industry and initiative, and by applying scientific methods to farming, increased his efficiency as much as in the 100 years preceding. This is the root fact behind our farm surplus.

In 1958 the farm surpluses were 7.5 percent above demand at a satisfactory price. Given the present rate of increase in farm output of 2 percent annually and the current population growth rate, experts estimate that this surplus will be, by the year 2000, 12 percent above demand—or approximately 24 percent of the 1958 total farm output.

Yet, with all this, Mr. President, and with storage costs of our surplus commodities running at the figure of almost $1 billion a year, it is estimated that the diet of one-fourth of our population is deficient in such vital components as calcium, protein, riboflavin, ascorbic acid and other essential nutrients. The implications are obvious: in spite of our wealth of mechanical and technical inventions—in spite of our application of scientific methods to agriculture—we have lagged in some of the vital areas of social invention.

We are still inclined too often and too regularly to think in terms established during the early stages of the Industrial Revolution in England by Malthus and Adam Smith. These were the terms of a society still governed by the economics of scarcity, by a population that grew more rapidly than did the increase in food supply, and by the belief in a Darwinism that applied the law of the jungle to human affairs—the so-called law of the survival of the fittest.

These conditions no longer prevail in our society, though the thinking borne of them often does. This is the kind of thinking which—still governed by the fears and anxieties of an age long gone—declares that the richest nation in the world cannot afford each of its citizens a decent diet. While in all truth, Mr. President, if we are rightfully to maintain our position as a leader among the civilized nations of the world, we cannot afford not to maintain for each of our citizens at least the nutritional level necessary to maintain his physical and intellectual energies. We have the means to do so; the question presented by the pending bill is whether we have the imagination and will. And this is a question which strikes at the heart of the meaning of a civilized society.

We have read of the practice in ancient Sparta—which has existed also in contemporary primitive societies—of placing the young infants in the open, exposed to the rigors of the elements—thus to test their capacity for survival. Through such a practice the Spartans produced a strong and hardy race which bequeathed its very name as synonym for the sterner virtues.

But it has been to Athens—not Sparta—that the Western World has looked for guidance in civilized ideals for over 2,000 years. While Spartans excelled in the martial qualities and the capacity for survival, culminating in the military defeat of their sister city, it is the civilized and humane virtues of Athens which have inspired mankind since.

Mr. President, I suggest that there may be an analog in our own society in our tendency to make as the cardinal test of a person's role in our Nation his capacity to survive in the arena of economic competition. The measure of our civilization is, at least in part, our ability to achieve a broader base of value than this, and to assure the claims of human dignity to those who, through no fault of their own, have failed in this particular respect.

I believe that S. 1686 offers a positive step in this direction—in the direction of a civilized society using its resources to provide more humane and enlightened conditions of living for all its members. For this reason, Mr. President, I urge the early passage of S. 1686.

THREE HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE SETTLEMENT OF NANTUCKET ISLAND

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, during this year Nantucket Island is celebrating the 300th anniversary of its settlement. Massachusetts is proud to celebrate with this island county its long and distinguished record of growth and accomplishments.

Nantucket has contributed to the exploration of the world through the efforts of its whaling masters to find new grounds where they might hunt the largest mammals on earth. The courage of its captains and crews is legendary, and the courage of the folks at home who waited for them, sometimes for 3 and 4 years, to return from dangerous voyages, is well known.

Whaling skippers formed our first close contact with what is now our 50th State, often engaging Hawaiians in their crews. Whaling skippers discovered and identified the Antarctic continent, and searched the ice north of the Bering Strait.

Heavily decimated in the War of 1812, the whaling fleet recovered only to be later supplanted by the oil wells of the interior.

Now Nantucket, recognizing the value of its past and the enterprise of the people who built it, looks forward to the future in providing service to the United States. A restful resort without equal, its people seek to provide the tired and the tense with an opportunity to revitalize themselves to face the world with renewed vigor.

May I suggest to my fellow Senators and to the people of the United States with justifiable—and understandable—pride that I feel that they would do well, in seeking a summer haven, to try this 300-year-old community, in which they will find the best qualities of the past combined with the best qualities of the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed.

LABOR-MANAGEMENT REPORTING AND DISCLOSURE ACT OF 1959

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEUBERGER in the chair). If there is no objection, the Chair lays before the Senate the pending business.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1555) to provide for the reporting and disclosure of certain financial transactions and administrative practices of labor organizations and employers, to prevent abuses in the administration of trusteeships by labor organizations, to provide standards with respect to the election of officers of labor organizations, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I call up the amendment which I have at the desk; it is identified as "4–20–59—A."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 8, in lines 6 through 16, it is proposed to strike out all of subsection (d) and renumber subsections (e) and (f) as (d) and (e).

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I yield myself 5 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, this amendment to title I of the pending bill will eliminate section 101(d), under which the Secretary of Labor is given authority to exempt from the financial reporting requirements certain unions or classes of unions which have fewer than 200 members and have gross annual receipts of less than $20,000.

The bill already gives to the Secretary adequate authority to prescribe simplified forms of reporting when detailed reporting by small unions, as well as small employers, constitutes an undue burden on them.

So I see no reason why large unions should have an unqualified obligation to report financial data, but small unions should have no unqualified obligation. Size is no gage of the honesty or the efficiency of a union operation.

The Secretary of Labor testified, in the hearings before the House committee a few weeks ago, that he does not favor the authority which would be given to him by the pending bill to grant an exemption from the reporting requirements. He favors a provision which would be applicable to all unions, large or small, giving recognition to the fact that the requirement to report in great detail may be a burden to small unions and their officers, many of whom, of course, are underpaid, by providing for those unions and their officers simplified forms for reporting. I think that is the wise way to handle this matter.

Last year, this language was adopted on the floor of the Senate as an amendment to the Kennedy-Ives bill, and then it was eliminated by a subsequent change.

Mr. President, I believe I have said everything it is necessary to say on this question at this time. Therefore, I reserve the remainder of my time, and shall be glad to hear if it is possible for the sponsors of the bill to accept the amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I would be reluctant to accept the amendment, though I know what the Senator from New Jersey has said has merit.

The amendment of the Senator from New Jersey relates to lines 6 through 16, subsection (d), which appears on page 8 of the bill. Let me state the problem involved.

The way the language originally appeared in the Kennedy-Ives bill last year, when the matter came before the committee it provided that unions having fewer than 200 members and less than $20,000 in assets were automatically exempted, unless the Secretary made a finding that they should be included.

Now, in a compromise, that provision is rephrased so that such unions are included unless the Secretary exempts them. The unions are not exempted from the reporting requirements contained in the first parts of the title, but they are exempted from the rather detailed reporting requirements relating to financial transactions.

The reason is that if less than $20,000 annually is involved no one has very much of an opportunity for substantial stealing; and, if there are fewer than 200 members in a union, of course, very likely the officers are underpaid or unpaid, and it is a small operation. Such unions are subject to penalties with regard to shakedowns, conflict of interests, and so forth.

For that reason, we thought it was not unreasonable to give the Secretary the power granted. So many reports will be submitted to the Secretary that nothing will be done about these matters unless the Secretary receives a complaint against a paper local, or something of that kind. At that time the Secretary can ask for a full report.

I appreciate the position of the Senator from New Jersey, but I feel the provision of the bill is the best solution of the problem. I hope, therefore, the amendment will be rejected.

Mr. President, I am prepared to yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time on the amendment has been yielded back. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CASE].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I believe the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER] has an amendment to offer. I wonder if he would care to call it up now?

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], and myself, I call up my amendment identified as "4–23–59—A."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky for himself and other Senators will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed, on page 54, line 17, to strike out all of section 601, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 601. Section 14 of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is amended by adding thereto the following new subsection as follows:

"(c) (1) Nothing in this act shall be construed as to prevent any State or Territorial agency other than a court, from exercising jurisdiction over all cases over which the Board has jurisdiction, but by rule or otherwise, has declined to assert jurisdiction: Provided, That the State or Territorial agency shall apply and be governed solely by Federal law as set forth in section 8(a) and 8(b), and 9 in this act, as the case may be, and Board and Federal court rules of decision construing said sections 8(a), 8(b), and 9. Injunctive relief under section 10(j) and 10(l) shall be available to such agency: Provided further, That no petition under section 10(j) shall be filed unless it has been expressly approved by the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board.

"(c) (2) The State or Territorial agency may petition any district court of the United States within such State or Territory for the enforcement of a final order of such agency and for appropriate temporary relief or restraining order. Such court shall make and enter an order or decree enforcing, modifying, enforcing as so modified, or setting aside in whole or in part the order of such agency.

"(c) (3) Any person aggrieved by a final order of the State or Territorial agency granting or denying in whole or in part the relief sought may obtain a review of such order in a district court of the United States in such State or Territory. Upon such filing, such district court shall proceed in the same manner, and have the same jurisdiction, as in the case of an application for enforcement under section (c) (2)."

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COOPER. Yes; I yield.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MANSFIELD in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time used for the call of the roll not be charged to either side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kentucky? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, the amendment I have called up is the one I offered last evening, and which I explained at that time. As Senators will remember, I withdrew the amendment in order that it might be printed and be at the desks of the Members of the Senate.

The amendment would be a substitute for section 601 in S. 1555. It deals with the important subject of the no man's land.

Yesterday the Senate rejected the amendment offered by the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN], which would have permitted either courts or State agencies to assume jurisdiction of disputes arising under the Taft-Hartley Act over which the National Labor Relations Board failed or refused to assume jurisdiction. Section 601 of the committee bill, which is the provision proposed by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] in the committee, provides that State agencies under certain circumstances may assume jurisdiction over such cases.

Yesterday the senior Senator from Arkansas asked me to distinguish the amendment which I have offered from section 601 presently in the bill. I did that briefly, but for the RECORD I should like to explain the differences again.

First, section 601 in the bill now provides that the National Labor Relations Board may delegate—rather contract—to State agencies the right to assume jurisdiction over cases which the Board decides it does not wish to consider or cannot consider. I think even the author of that language would agree that as presently written into the bill, this provision would limit the authority and power of a State agency even though jurisdiction had been delegated to it.

Second, the present section in the bill provides that even though jurisdiction is delegated, the National Labor Relations Board upon its own determination may later withdraw that delegation and itself assert jurisdiction.

Third, under the provision now in the bill, the right of an appeal from a decision by the State agency could only be to the National Labor Relations Board. Therefore, the language is very restrictive.

A great many Senators believe, and I believe, that because the provision is so limited, very few States, if any, would be likely to follow the provisions of section 601. My judgment is that section 601 as presently written would not solve the problem. I make that statement with due respect to the senior Senator from Oregon. As the Senator has said, we have all wrestled with this problem.

The problem is that under the Taft-Hartley Act, employers, employees, and unions have certain rights accorded to them. However, there is no forum in which those rights can be secured in cases over which the NLRB is unable to assume jurisdiction. Yesterday I opposed an amendment which would permit State courts to take jurisdiction. I will not recite again the reasons for my opposition. The Senate rejected the proposal of the Senator from Arkansas to permit State courts to take jurisdiction.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. I am beginning to be convinced by the argument which has been made regarding this matter that the whole purpose is to keep any jurisdiction away from the courts of the several States. Am I correct?

Mr. COOPER. They have no jurisdiction now.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. No; and the whole purpose is to keep it away from them.

Mr. COOPER. The State courts have no jurisdiction now.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. I did not say they had any jurisdiction. However, we gave it to the NLRB, but if it will not take jurisdiction we have determined not to give the State courts jurisdiction. Is that correct?

Mr. COOPER. The Senate determined that yesterday.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. And it is argued that the Senate should do it again today. Is that correct?

Mr. COOPER. I have offered an amendment which will provide a remedy. It has been argued that there is need for a remedy, and that justice will be denied unless a remedy is afforded. My amendment offers a remedy, and it offers a forum. There are other problems involved in this matter, too. There are reasons underlying a desire for a particular kind of remedy only in the State courts, for that would give large opportunities for the issuance of injunctions. My amendment would guard against abuse.

I shall state the remedy which the amendment I offer proposes. The States have an interest in this matter. No forum is available for the settlement of these disputes. Under my amendment States can create administrative agencies or use administrative agencies which now exists to serve their citizens. The argument and the fact that there is no forum for these disputes is met by this amendment.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator said, if I understood him correctly, that the State could use any administrative agency. Could an industrial commission, for example, be used to handle labor disputes?

Mr. COOPER. I cannot foretell what a State might do. I assume that a State would make its decision through its State legislature. It could decide that a State agency was equipped to handle the assignment. If one so equipped did not already exist, the legislature could create an agency to handle such disputes.

Mr. GOLDWATER. If it is the Senator's contention that an existing State agency could be designated by the State legislature to handle these cases, he has a point. In that case, he would go far to satisfy some objections to the amendment, because the amendment specifically bars courts. In my own State of Arizona, the industrial commission handles a great many labor matters. It does not get into the labor-management field.

The State Legislature of Arizona could designate the industrial commission to handle cases which the NLRB feels are small, or have only a slight impact on commerce. If the legislature were to do that, is it the Senator's understanding that the amendment would permit such action?

Mr. COOPER. It would be within the discretion and power of the State legislature, of course.

Mr. GOLDWATER. If there are no laws applicable at the State level, and the State designated an agency such as I have mentioned, would the Senator still feel that that agency could handle a dispute which the NLRB would not handle?

Mr. COOPER. Yes; absolutely.

Mr. GOLDWATER. If the Senator will make that point clear to the Senate, I believe he will find less objection to his amendment. What concerns those of us who have sought relief through the courts is that we want a faster way of obtaining relief.

I can assure the Senate there is no desire on our part to hamstring unions or to hamstring management. We want to bar cases like the Coffey case, by allowing some recourse for relief. If the Senator will bring out that point when more Senators are on the floor, it will help a great deal. If he will bring out the fact that a State agency such as I have referred to could act, I believe he will gain more support for his amendment.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COOPER. First I wish to comment on the statement of the Senator from Arizona. I believe it is correct to say that under my amendment an existing agency could assume jurisdiction. That would be a matter for the State legislatures to decide. However, I wish to invite the attention of the Senator and the Senate to the fact that once a State agency has been enabled to take jurisdiction over these cases, and has in fact assumed jurisdiction, then it is bound by Federal law. In its decision it must follow Federal law, the applicable rules of the NLRB, and of the Federal courts. Furthermore, a review or an appeal would go to the Federal courts, rather than to the NLRB.

My reason for incorporating this provision in the amendment is to secure uniformity, and to give strength to the principle which was adopted when the Taft-Hartley Act was passed. We gave jurisdiction over these cases affecting interstate commerce to the NLRB at that time. We placed such cases under the Taft-Hartley Act. That is my reason for incorporating this provision that Federal law and applicable NLRB rules shall be followed. I believe it is a logical reason.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I should like to ask one more question.

Mr. JAVITS. I should like to answer the question of the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. COOPER. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. As co-author of the amendment I should like to state to the Senator from Arizona my understanding of how it will work. A State will pass a law, if it does not have one now, vesting authority in a State agency, either existing or newly created, to handle cases with respect to labor-management relations, elections, and unfair labor practices.

When the agency has been so empowered, if it is not already so empowered by existing law—and there is existing law in 11 States, with Oregon having just come in, and in the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico and in Hawaii—it can specifically assume jurisdiction and handle this kind of cases. When it does, the pending amendment, if it is incorporated into law, becomes operative with respect to relations between that agency and the Taft-Hartley law as amended by Congress.

Mr. GOLDWATER. No matter what agency was designated by the State legislature, that agency would have to follow Federal law. Is that correct?

Mr. JAVITS. Exactly.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Even though the NLRB's reason for not hearing the case was that the case did not bear sufficiently on commerce, which is a reason, in my meager understanding of the situation, which would remove it from the responsibility of Federal law?

Mr. JAVITS. I do not believe that is quite accurate. The amendment states: "Jurisdiction over all cases over which the Board has jurisdiction." If it has jurisdiction, then the Federal law applies. The Board may have its reasons for deciding it will not assume jurisdiction; but the amendment refers to "all cases over which the Board has jurisdiction."

Mr. GOLDWATER. I should like to ask the Senator a question on that point. We say that the NLRB has jurisdiction over labor-management disputes affecting commerce. Let us assume that the NLRB says, "This particular dispute does not have an effect on commerce." Does the Federal law then apply?

Mr. JAVITS. I should say no, because in that case the Board has said it has no jurisdiction.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Let me pursue that question one more step. If the NLRB says it cannot take the case because it has no effect on interstate commerce, then the State agency, under the Senator's amendment, would have the authority to act. Would the State then have to use Federal statutes?

Mr. COOPER. I will say categorically, in my opinion, no. It would not. The only kinds of cases over which the NLRB can now assume jurisdiction are those which have an effect upon interstate commerce. Authority to deal with such cases is the only kind of power which could be delegated or which the State agency could assume under my amendment. So if the NLRB decides that a case does not affect interstate commerce, the State agency, in my judgment, would not be bound by this amendment.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I should like to bring out one point. It may not be in the form of a question. I think the discussion of this point is where all of us become a little bit lost.

The cases about which we are talking, the ones with which I am concerned—and I am sure other Senators who have discussed this matter are concerned with them—are obviously cases which are so small that the NLRB will not assume jurisdiction. We who are interested in the "no man's land" situation have no idea in the world that the "no man's land" action would enter into industry-wide bargaining or into plants of 200, 300, 500, 1,000, or more employees, where interstate commerce is clearly affected.

Our only concern is for the little man who is operating a garage and who has 5 or 10 employees; or for a man like Coffey, who had 10 or 12 truckdrivers; or a small merchant on Main Street, who might have 20 employees. From the very nature and size of the business, I feel certain the NLRB would immediately say it was not interested in such a case. I think we lose sight of that situation.

I hope Senators do not believe for 1 minute I think that by providing this kind of relief at the State level I am trying to get the States into matters which are purely interstate commerce, because I am not.

Mr. COOPER. The Senator from Arizona has touched on the critical point at issue and toward which this amendment and the similar amendments we have been discussing are directed. First, it has been established that in cases which affect interstate commerce in a material way the NLRB has jurisdiction under the Taft-Hartley Act. If my amendment is adopted, a State agency could assume the same jurisdiction where the NLRB determines it will not take jurisdiction. But in cases which do not affect interstate commerce—cases in which the NLRB determines that interstate commerce is not affected—then, of course, a State agency would not be bound by this amendment. That is my judgment.

Now, I think there may develop, in the further consideration of this problem and through the work of the committee which has been appointed to review the problem, standards, so that the NLRB will be able to say that certain classes of cases are not within the contemplation of the Taft-Hartley Act, and are, therefore, subject to State jurisdiction. This amendment is a beginning toward that goal. It offers a forum, and it offers a procedure.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I should like to ask the three lawyers who are the sponsors of the amendment—because I am not a lawyer—Is there a difference between not having jurisdiction and refusing to assert it?

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kentucky yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. I think it is very important that we make the legislative history perfectly clear. As one of the cosponsors of the amendment, and as the chief sponsor of the provision in the bill, I want the record to show my position with respect to its legislative meaning.

Suppose a case comes before the NLRB, and objection is raised to the jurisdiction of the Board on the ground that the case does not involve interstate commerce, the Board rules that the case does not involve interstate commerce, an appeal is taken, and the courts finally rule that the case does not involve interstate commerce. In such an instances there is no question about the fact that the State has jurisdiction and that there is no Federal problem at all.

The second type of case is one which comes before the National Labor Relations Board, the Board admits it has jurisdiction, it admits that the case comes under the commerce clause, but the Board says:

> The case is so small from the standpoint of the number of employees involved and the size of the plant, and the effect on interstate commerce is so insubstantial, that we will not take jurisdiction.

As to those cases, the Supreme Court of the United States has held very clearly that the Board has jurisdiction, that the Board cannot waive jurisdiction, and that the Board should take jurisdiction.

I wish to make it very clear that it is not my intention, so far as my participation in this amendment is concerned, to give jurisdiction over those cases to the States for the application of common law principles in State courts. What we say to the States in those cases is that so long as interstate commerce is involved, and the Federal Government, therefore, has jurisdiction, although the National Labor Relations Board says it is so burdened with a caseload that it cannot handle such cases because it has many more major cases to take up its time, we are taking the position of the Supreme Court of the United States, namely, that the workers and employers involved are entitled to the same protection of the commerce clause under Federal jurisdiction as are the workers in a plant which employs 2,000 instead of 8.

As to those cases, the State, can use any agency it desires. Arizona can use its industrial commission, if it wants to do so. The State can give to the industrial commission jurisdiction over those cases. But the State agency will be bound, under the Cooper-Javits-Morse amendment, to the application of Federal law, the appeal will be to the Federal courts, and Federal law will apply. I think we would perform a great disservice to all concerned if we did not make that perfectly clear. That is the way it would have to be until legislation was enacted by the Federal Government to create the kind of standards about which the Senator from New York and the Senator from Kentucky just spoke: cases which would take away from the Federal Government jurisdiction over matters arising under the commerce clause.

I hope that time will never come, because if ever it does we will have destroyed the principle of uniform rights under the Constitution of the United States for all employees, whether they work in large or small plants. It is my intention to prevent such a happening, so far as my participation in the amendment is concerned. I want to make it very clear that I am supporting an amendment which, in effect, carries out the Supreme Court decisions, and says, in effect, to the National Labor Relations Board: You cannot waive the Federal rights of persons who may be concerned in cases which involve interstate commerce.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Let me see if I understand the Senator correctly. The Senator said, if I correctly understood him, that as to a case which clearly has no effect on interstate commerce, and as to which the NLRB has no jurisdiction, a State agency could assume jurisdiction. Do I correctly understand that, even though the case does not affect interstate commerce and there is no argument on that point, the Senator from Oregon would have Federal law apply?

Mr. MORSE. Oh, no. It could not now. Those are intrastate cases, not interstate cases. The Federal Government has no jurisdiction in intrastate cases now.

Let me cite a hypothetical case. Suppose an intrastate case comes before the National Labor Relations Board, and the Board makes a mistake in its decision. It wrongly decides that it has jurisdiction. The case is appealed, and the court looks at it and says to the Board: "You are wrong. You do not have jurisdiction in the first place, because there is not one iota of interstate commerce involved. This is an intrastate case, pure and simple." Under the existing situation the Federal Government has no jurisdiction in such cases.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Would the Senator clear up one more point? Do I correctly understand that the Cooper-Javits-Morse amendment would allow the State courts to handle cases which are clearly intrastate, or are not interstate?

Mr. MORSE. They do now. The Cooper-Javits-Morse amendment has absolutely nothing to do with an intrastate commerce case.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, at this point will the Senator from Kentucky yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JORDAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, neither does the amendment have anything to do with a case which the Board finds it has no jurisdiction.

Mr. GOLDWATER. If the Board found it had no jurisdiction, because of a lack of impact on interstate commerce, and if an appeal of that decision were to fail, then the local courts or the local agency could handle the case, under the local law.

Mr. JAVITS. That is exactly correct; in that case, the case would be strictly intrastate, under this amendment.

Mr. GOLDWATER. But if, on appeal, that decision were to be reversed, the case would have to be dropped by the State agency, and it would revert to being handled under the Federal law.

Mr. JAVITS. That is correct.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Of course, my concern about this matter—and I compliment my colleagues for trying to reach a decision in regard to this question, because I recognize that it is a difficult one on which to legislate—is that under the decisions of the Supreme Court, beginning with the Jones and Laughlin case of the middle 1930's, it is rather difficult for me, as a layman, to find a business in the country which could properly be called purely intrastate. For instance, I have a feeling that a bootblack might be said to be in interstate commerce, because the paste he buys is produced in a factory outside his State. The Court's decisions have so broadened the interpretation of interstate commerce that I believe we must be concerned with that situation, because in this instance we are concerned with the really small businessmen—not those with businesses employing 50 employees or more; instead, I am talking about a small garage in Idaho which went broke or about Mr. Coffey's establishment in Nebraska which went broke—businesses involving 12 or 15 persons—because the decisions of the Supreme Court have held them to be interstate.

Mr. MORSE. But does not the Senator from Arizona think they should be given a remedy?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Of course.

Mr. MORSE. The Cooper amendment will give them a remedy.

Mr. GOLDWATER. But I do not think it would sufficiently speed up the proceedings.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona yield to me?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield.

Mr. COOPER. The point which the Senator from Arizona has raised would be just as applicable to the amendment which the Senate voted on yesterday, and defeated. In other words, if we give the jurisdiction to a State court, it would still have to decide whether it would take jurisdiction of such cases.

Mr. MORSE. Certainly none of us would want to take away from the courts the judicial power to determine jurisdiction. That power is quite basic to our system of jurisprudence.

Mr. COOPER. Of course.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, will the majority leader yield to me 5 minutes of the time in opposition to the amendment, so that I will not have to use any of the time available to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from North Carolina.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, first, I wish to thank the Senator from Kentucky for laying aside his amendment last night, so that we would have an opportunity to study it.

Let me say that I believe this amendment is an improvement over the present provision of the bill, in that the State agencies would get their authority from the Congress rather than from a contract with the National Labor Relations Board.

I wish to ask this question: Does the Senator from Kentucky think as a practical matter that any State will enact laws which will allow the ruling of an agency established and maintained by the State to be reviewed by Federal courts, rather than by State courts?

Mr. COOPER. I do not see any reason why that should not be done. We admit there is a need for a forum for these cases; and this amendment places on the States the burden of providing such cases with a forum.

The question arises as to why we should provide for an an appeal to the Federal courts, rather than to the State courts. But there is nothing wrong with such an arrangement. Congress has the power to confer jurisdiction upon the Federal courts, as the Senator from North Carolina realizes.

This amendment deals with a Federal question—in other words, with the Taft-Hartley Act, which applies to all labor disputes arising in interstate commerce. So it seems to me perfectly logical for the Senate to adopt this amendment.

Mr. ERVIN. I agree with the Senator from Kentucky that Congress has the power to confer upon State courts or agencies the authority to enforce a right which arises under the Federal Constitution or under the laws of the Federal Government. But I seriously question whether the Congress has the power to deny State courts the right to review the rulings of a State agency or to prescribe procedure for a State agency.

I agree with the Senator from Oregon that no substantive right has value unless there is some procedure by which that right can be enforced. But I do not believe it is necessary to create an unprecedented situation in this instance, by having Congress undertake to prescribe the procedure by which State agencies shall act, or to require that the rulings of the State agencies shall be enforced in the Federal courts, as distinguished from State courts.

The able and distinguished Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER]—who, in my opinion, is one of the great lawyers of the country—knows that the Constitution provides, in substance, that wherever Federal law controls a subject, the State court judges are sworn that they will enforce the Federal law, any State law to the contrary notwithstanding. That is done in order to promote uniformity. Our constitutional and legal history shows that this provision has been sufficient to secure uniformity of rulings in cases where concurrent jurisdiction has been conferred by Congress on Federal and State courts to enforce a federally created substantive right.

As a matter of fact, in a great majority of instances in which the Congress has created a new right, it has permitted that right to be enforced by the State courts—which, as I have just now pointed out, have to follow the Federal law.

Although I believe the proposed amendment is much better—by reason of clarity and by reason of having the Congress confer jurisdiction on a State agency—than the present provision of the bill, I think that the part of the proposed amendment which gives the Federal courts the right to review the rulings of the State agencies, to the exclusion of the State courts, will result in this remedy never being made available to anyone. This is true because I cannot imagine any State legislature in the country giving approval to a law which would deny its own courts power to review the rulings of its own agencies and vest that power solely in the Federal courts.

If it were not for that fact, and if we were willing to try to secure uniformity by means of the method which historically has been pursued in every generation in our country, in cases in which the States undertake to enforce Federal rights; that is, by letting the State agencies in such situations have their rulings reviewed in the normal way by the State courts, which are obligated to follow the Federal law, I believe this amendment would provide a proper remedy.

Mr. COOPER. Let me comment briefly, and then I shall yield to my fellow lawyer.

First of all, I do not think there is any question that Congress has a right to do this. We can confer jurisdiction on the Federal courts.

We recall the various measures, which have been introduced in the past several years, to remove jurisdiction from the Federal courts. So certainly we can confer jurisdiction. The Senator's question is only one of policy—namely, whether the States will wish to act in this way.

The argument made in support of the amendment which was defeated was based on the glaring lack of uniformity, and the need for uniformity. If there is a lack of uniformity, I think the States should act in accordance with a uniform policy.

I recognize the rule that in certain instances the State courts must follow Federal law. So there is nothing wrong with requiring the State courts to follow the Federal law in these cases. Otherwise, there would be 40 or more labor laws all over the country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time yielded to the Senator from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, may I have a little more time?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield 3 additional minutes to the Senator from North Carolina.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina is recognized for 3 additional minutes.

Mr. ERVIN. I thank the Senator from Texas.

Mr. President, I believe this amendment contains a very good idea. But what I regard as an unprecedented provision of the amendment is the one to the effect that the rulings of the State agency must be reviewed in the Federal courts, to the exclusion of the State courts. I honestly do not believe that a single State in the Union would ever pass a measure which would subordinate its agencies to the Federal courts to the exclusion of its own courts.

Mr. COOPER. I see no reason why the forum the amendment contemplates should not be provided.

Mr. ERVIN. Can the Senator think of any instance in our history in which that has been done? I cannot.

Mr. COOPER. I have inquired of the Department of Justice whether there are any instances. I have not received a reply. Whether there are instances or not does not mean we cannot provide the proper remedy and procedure.

Here is a situation applying to interstate commerce, and uniformity is provided by my amendment. I think there is good reason for it. It is a matter of judgment for Congress and would be a matter of judgment for the State legislatures if they wish to provide the forum.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kentucky yield to me?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. PROUTY. Even if this amendment should be adopted, is it not true that until 38 State legislatures passed or enacted legislation establishing the boards or authorities, nothing could be done in those States for at least 2 years, because the legislatures of most of them will not be in session during that interim?

Mr. COOPER. The situation differs in the various States.

Mr. PROUTY. I think there are at least 32 States of which that is true.

Mr. COOPER. As the situation now exists, there is no remedy. This proposal provides an opportunity to the States to afford a remedy.

Mr. PROUTY. I have a compromise, which I shall offer at the appropriate time, if I have the opportunity to do so, which would enable State courts to assume jurisdiction of such matters, and provide that an appeal could be taken to a State court, or a higher State court, but the State courts would be bound by Federal law. The States would also be authorized to establish their own agencies, which would be guided by Federal law, and would assume jurisdiction over these cases when the NLRB rejects them. But I point out that the provision would go into effect immediately. It would provide an immediate remedy. The proposal is not perfect, but it would give the small businessmen and the small unions something to stand on now. They would know where they stand.

The proposal of the Senator from Kentucky, however idealistic it may be—and it is that—is not practical, in my judgment, because most of the States will not want the agencies they have established subject to control by the Federal courts.

Mr. COOPER. My proposal is not idealistic; it is a practical proposal. It says to the States and the people who live in the States, "You have been complaining about the lack of a remedy. You now have the power to establish the remedy and provide a forum." It is up to the States. If they do not do it, perhaps the Congress ought to look for another remedy; but this is a remedy which would be available within a reasonable time.

Mr. PROUTY. Will the Senator not agree that in most States the remedy will not be available for at least 2 years?

Mr. COOPER. I do not know; but the proposal goes to the basic argument which was made yesterday, namely, whether we desire to have different labor laws in every State or whether we want to have the mandate of the National Labor Relations Act followed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield 5 minutes to me?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Colorado.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. ALLOTT. I wonder if I may have the attention of the Senators who have been discussing this matter, because I wish to refer to some of its phases. It seems to me there are some discrepancies in the amendment which we ought to consider, and I invite the attention of my colleagues to them.

We are all agreed that where an intrastate situation exists, the State agencies or the State courts and the State laws should apply. I am sure there is no disagreement with that statement on the part of any Senator.

Now we come to the next stage, where the NLRB has refused to accept jurisdiction because there is not involved a significant interest which affects interstate commerce. Personally, I cannot help believing that if a business is that insignificant as it affects interstate commerce, there is no reason why State law should not apply. I realize it is at this point that my thoughts and those of some of my colleagues separate widely. But I do not know that it is of necessity a matter of great governing principle here, because Federal law could be applied by the State agencies or the State courts in the same manner that State substantive law is now applied in the Federal courts.

Cases involving negligence, property rights, and breach of contract are now tried in Federal courts, with the law of the States concerned being applied. That is a point on which we are all agreed, I believe. It would be very easy simply to reverse the process, and apply Federal rules and Federal law to cases heard in State courts and State agencies.

Still speaking of the same situation, so that we may not become confused, in a case where the NLRB has refused jurisdiction because of the insignificance of the impact of the business upon interstate commerce, very frankly the question which concerns me more than anything else about the pending amendment is that the mention of State courts has been omitted from the amendment. As I understand, there are only 12 States which have agencies constituted to deal with such cases.

A few moments ago the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN] discussed this point. I am very much concerned with this problem, and I wonder if there is not a way whereby the situation can be changed.

The condition does not apply only to the Southern States, I may say. Many States would be genuinely concerned with respect to establishing a State agency. In Colorado, for example, the power could be given to the State Industrial Commission. When that were done, it would in effect establish a new State agency, or an agency with new power. I am sure we all would look askance at a suggestion that such an agency would, in effect, be put under the jurisdiction of a Federal agency. I know I would. It might be said that it would not work. That is not true. All the State agencies would have to do would be to decide the cases on the basis of Federal law.

I have already discussed this matter, Mr. President. I do not think there is too much discrepancy involved. I think such cases could be tried just as well under State law. But conceding that there would be no harm in applying Federal law to such a situation, and that in any proceeding before a State agency or a State court Federal law would be applied, pretty soon the Federal courts would be exerting great control over the State agencies, and would be telling those agencies, in substance, "Your procedure was wrong. Therefore, you should perfect your procedure this way. You will have to proceed this way. You will have to proceed this way on appeal." In effect, the State agencies would be controlled not only by State law, but in all the cases under discussion they would be controlled by the Federal courts.

I understand that the Senator from Kentucky was once a State judge. I cannot conceive that a man of his caliber could, as a State judge, fail to give complete recognition to Federal law, if such a mandate were given by the Congress. I see no reason why the Congress could not simply include in the proposal a directive so that the States which did not need to set up completely new agencies, or to cloak existing agencies with such powers, and increase their staffs, expenses, and so forth, could act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Colorado has expired.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield me 2 more minutes?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ALLOTT. I do not see why we could not, in such instances, have the State courts act. While I would prefer it the other way and while I have no particular objection to having Federal laws apply in the particular situation, I have great concern about having to appeal to the Federal courts when the National Labor Relations Board has said the matter is not an interstate matter. In effect, such a procedure would subject State organizations in appeal matters to the jurisdiction of Federal courts.

I think this is an important question for all Senators to determine. I should like to see the amendment amended to meet the objection.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLOTT. I am happy to yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Colorado has expired.

Mr. ALLOTT. I have been informed that my time has expired. Will the Senator request time for himself?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I have agreed to yield time to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] and the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS]. Does the Senator from Vermont desire some time?

Mr. PROUTY. Yes, I should like to have some time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. How much time would the Senator like to have?

Mr. PROUTY. I would appreciate it if the Senator could yield me 10 minutes. If I could have that much time it would help.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield 9 minutes to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. PROUTY. I thank the Senator from Texas.

Mr. President, as I suggested yesterday, this is one of the most important problems with which we have to deal in regard to the pending bill. I have prepared an amendment, designated "4–23–59–G," which is printed and can be read if any Senator is interested.

I agree that uniformity in labor legislation is highly important and desirable. The amendment which I propose will maintain uniformity, but it will also grant jurisdiction to State courts.

I should like to read a summary of the main provisions of my amendment. I think the amendment represents a compromise between the proposal made by the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN] and that offered today by the distingiushed Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER]. The main provisions of my amendment are as follows:

First. The NLRB must publish within 30 days after the enactment of this act the limitations on its exercise of jurisdiction which it proposes to observe and such limitations shall be substantially in accord with those now in effect.

Second. Any person not certain whether his case comes under the jurisdiction of the Board may petition the Board for a ruling if the Board does not act in 30 days on the petition it will be presumed the Board has declined jurisdiction.

Third. Whenever the Board by rule or otherwise declines jurisdiction over an unfair labor practice case, the State courts will have jurisdiction over such case. But the State courts shall apply and be governed solely by Federal law as set forth in section 8(a) and 8(b) of the National Labor Relations Act and National Labor Relations Board and Federal court rules of decision construing these sections.

Fourth. If a State sets up an agency to take jurisdiction over cases which the NLRB has declined by rule or otherwise such an agency may take jurisdiction over not only unfair labor practice cases but also representation proceedings and all other labor disputes. Here again the State agency shall apply and be governed solely by Federal law and Board and Federal court rules of decision construing such Federal law.

Fifth. Decisions of an agency or court of a State shall be reviewed in State courts according to State practice and procedure. And then shall be subject to review only by the Supreme Court of the United States upon writ of certiorari.

Mr. President, I should like to invite attention to what seem to me to be some basic weaknesses of the amendment proposed by the distinguished Senator from Kentucky.

In the first place, if the amendment should be agreed to, at least 33 States would be unable to take advantage of it for another 2 years. I have a list of the States, but I shall not take the time to read it.

I should like to mention briefly some of the other disadvantages which seem to me to apply to the Cooper amendment.

First, the amendment would not require the Board to establish standards determining whether it will take jurisdiction. Under my amendment this question would be taken care of, and the limitations on the Board's exercise of jurisdiction would be substantially in accordance with those now in effect.

Under the Cooper amendment a person might not know for months whether the Board has or has not jurisdiction over his case. Under my amendment any person could petition the Board for a ruling whether his case came under the Board's jurisdiction, and if the Board did not act within 30 days it would be assumed that the Board had declined jurisdiction.

Under the Cooper amendment the no man's land could exist indefinitely, if the sovereign States refused to establish agencies which would be, in effect, an arm of the National Labor Relations Board. Under my amendment this matter would be taken care of immediately, and the State courts could act on unfair labor practice cases as to which the Board had declined jurisdiction. My amendment provides that if States do create appropriate agencies they may handle all labor cases declined by the Board.

The Cooper amendment purports to give a State agency power to solve the no man's land problem, but it requires the State agency to go to a Federal court for enforcement of its orders. The same Federal court is the appeal agency for a person aggrieved by a final order of the State agency.

The effect of the amendment is to encourage States to establish State agencies which will be without power to solve cases brought before them unless they obtain enforcement orders from a Federal court. The amendment also would require a person to appeal not to the State courts but to the Federal courts.

My amendment would provide a definite and certain means of solving the problem, by allowing the State courts to act under the Federal law in unfair labor practice cases, which are the most serious problems now in the no man's land area, and it would encourage States to set up agents to take over other cases.

I gave an example yesterday of the situation which confronts us at the present time. Under the National Labor Relations Board jurisdictional standards the Board will accept cases in a nonretail operation involving gross business of $50,000 a year or more.

Let us consider what might happen at the present time. If we consider two manufacturers in the same State and in the same town, one with a gross volume of business of $50,000 and the other with a gross volume of $49,000, the National Labor Relations Board will exercise jurisdiction over one but it will decline jurisdiction over the second. In the second instance the management has no agency to which it can take its case of real or fancied grievance. That is the no man's land problem. The other company is governed solely by Federal standards.

I recognize that the amendment which I am proposing is not perfect, but it would maintain a certain degree of uniformity, and the uniformity would come into existence immediately. There would be recourse for grievances as soon as the bill were enacted into law, if my amendment should be agreed to.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROUTY. I am glad to yield.

Mr. COOPER. In this debate one problem has been entirely overlooked. I hope the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] will discuss it. It is the problem of injunctions.

Mr. MORSE. The Senator is correct.

Mr. COOPER. I hope I can demonstrate to the Senator from Vermont the fallacy of the amendment he is proposing and how it would be ineffective and, in my view, would not be operated uniformly with respect to injunctions.

The amendment which we have offered with respect to injunctions follows the exact procedure outlined in the Taft-Hartley Act. The amendment the Senator from Vermont is proposing would give State courts the power to issue injunctions. The Senator has said the courts would have to follow Federal law, but I believe we should consider the practical situation.

Today in eastern Kentucky there is mass picketing, and it is said that there is violence. Petitions have been presented to the State courts to issue injunctions in cases in which the courts now have authority to issue injunctions. The courts do not issue injunctions. I shall not discuss the reasons why, but they do not. Even though we give to a State court the power to issue an injunction, the court can refuse to do so if it wants to. That is a discretionary matter.

The amendment which we offer would give to Federal courts the power to issue injunctions under proper procedures.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Vermont has expired.

Mr. COOPER. I think that is one of the real values of my amendment, and, at the same time, one of the real safeguards.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, may I have the attention of the majority leader?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield time to the Senator from New York?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes. How much time is left?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Six minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, in the brief time I have, I should like to pursue one point which I shall make, and which we have just been discussing. The question is asked, Why do we not give the courts in the 38 States which have no State agencies the jurisdiction given to State agencies?

The reason we do not is that we cannot, because of the general judicial power of courts. We cannot limit their jurisdiction in the way we can limit the jurisdiction of an agency; and in view of the fact that we cannot repeal the Constitution and take away the interstate commerce clause which is in it now, every State agency designated under this amendment would become an arm of the National Labor Relations Board, subject to the same restrictions as the Board is subject to.

We cannot do that with a court. A court can issue injunctions against doing certain things in the presence of the court which it deems to be against its dignity. That power we cannot restrict. It is inherent in the power of the court. Hence, if we give jurisdiction to the courts in the other 38 States, which do not now have agencies, we shall be opening the door to exactly what the Taft-Hartley law was designed to prevent, namely, the unrestricted injunctive power of the courts.

That is the essence of the problem. There is no way of getting around it. The way we have handled the problem is by giving an open invitation, on reasonable terms, to every one of the other 38 States, saying to them "Designate an agency, and it will become an arm of the National Labor Relations Board, fully able to occupy the no man's land which is now vacant."

It seems to me that is reasonable. It opens up the entire question, and makes it susceptible to solution.

In reply to those who say that such a procedure cannot be made effective in less than 2 years, I say, first, that a special session of any legislature can be called. Second, we have been living with this condition for 12 years, and have not been able to do anything about it. I believe we are now in a position to make a measurable beginning.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield 4 minutes to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, the Senator from New York has made a brilliant legal argument as to why it would be a mistake to turn jurisdiction over to the State courts in the 38 States which do not now have agencies. Turning jurisdiction over to State courts would produce further delay, because if we were to turn it over to the State courts, there would still be available to a dissatisfied litigant an appeal to the district Federal court anyway.

In most cases there would be an appeal to the Federal court. Why? Because the Supreme Court has held that this is a Federal question.

We cannot repeal the Supreme Court. We cannot repeal the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution. I want the legislative history of the bill to show that we cannot get away from the controlling fact that interstate commerce problems are involved in these cases, and the Supreme Court has made it perfectly clear that the National Labor Relations Board cannot waive its jurisdiction. That being the law, what do we propose to do?

We propose to provide a remedy. We propose to say to the State, "Name a State agency—industrial commission, welfare board, or any other State agency you wish to name—and you can have jurisdiction over these cases; but you must follow the Federal law."

As the Senator from New York has pointed out, we can do that with an administrative body. We cannot do it with a State court. Therefore, all we would be doing would be to buy further delay in these cases, if we go to the State court first, and provide an appeal to the Federal court, in order to bring the case under Federal jurisdiction.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, may I have 2 or 3 minutes on the bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield 5 minutes on the bill to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORSE. I also wish to suggest that we must not overlook the point which the Senator from Kentucky has just made. I am at a loss to understand why Senators who are so eager to provide for State handling of these cases overlook the fact that we have written into our proposal the injunctive processes of the Taft-Hartley law. Does any Senator believe that labor likes that? Let him go into the reception room and find out. We are proposing in the amendment to grant injunctive protection, which ought to be eagerly seized. We propose to give to employers in the States the injunctive protection of the Cooper-Javits-Morse amendment because we believe there must be some teeth in the procedure for the handling of the no man's land cases.

However, we believe that there should be uniform injunctive processes. We do not think there should be available the injunctive processes of 49 States or 50 States as soon as Hawaii enters the Union. We believe that the injunctive procedure should be uniform across the country, and that the injunctive principles of the Taft-Hartley law should be applied uniformly. What a remedy we have given.

My last point deals with the question so often asked, What about the States doing something about it? In the first place, I say most respectfully that the States, as well as the Federal Government, have an obligation. They owe it to the employers and workers in the various States to provide a remedy. Eleven of them have done so. There are some State labor boards or agencies. I happen to believe that once the people of the States understand the remedy we have offered, they will say to their Governors and legislatures, "Get busy and give us an agency which can provide sorely needed relief."

Let me cite a homely example. A plumber from Salem, Oreg., sat in my office a little while back, while I was working on the procedures in the bill. He said, "What we want is a remedy. I am going broke because I cannot get anyone to take jurisdiction over my case." He said, "I used to belong to the plumbers union, and I know the workers' problems, too. What we need is a forum in order to apply the Taft-Hartley law to my case."

We are offering such a forum. There are thousands of such cases as that across America.

For these reasons, because I am opposed to a step of delay, which is all we would get, in my judgment, under the Prouty amendment, and because I think it is important to have injunctive processes with teeth and a uniform application of the injunctive processes of the Taft-Hartley law, I am proud to join the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from New York in sponsoring this amendment.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. ALLOTT. In the event the pending amendment should be agreed to, would it be subject thereafter to an amendment which would strike it from the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the amendment were agreed to, no further amendment of the amendment would be in order.

Mr. ALLOTT. Does that include an amendment to strike?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It would not be in order to strike it from the bill if it were agreed to.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, I call up my amendment designated "4-23-59—G," and offer it as a substitute for the pending amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All the time has been exhausted. The Senate must vote on the pending amendment before the amendment of the Senator from Vermont can be considered.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, as I understand, the Senator from Vermont is offering his amendment as a substitute for the pending amendment.

Mr. PROUTY. That is correct.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is what I understood the distinguished Senator from Vermont to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There can be no debate.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I realize that, unless it is by unanimous consent.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I am opposed to the amendment, but I think it would be only fair to allow the Senator from Vermont some time. Can he not be allowed 5 or 10 minutes on the bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. We will give him all the time he desires.

Mr. MORSE. I do not think it was clear to him that he could have time on the bill.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I yield the distinguished Senator from Vermont 5 minutes on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont will be stated.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment, instead of being read, be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment offered by Mr. PROUTY, ordered to be printed in the RECORD, is as follows:

On page 54, strike out all of section 601 and insert the following new section:

"SEC. 601. (a) Section 6 of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is hereby designated as section 6(a) and said section 6 is amended by adding thereto the following new subsection (b):

"'(b) (1) The Board in its discretion may, by rule or otherwise, decline to take jurisdiction over any labor dispute, unfair labor practice, or representation proceeding if, in the Board's judgment, the effect thereof on commerce is insufficient to warrant the exercise of jurisdiction.

"'Within thirty days after the date of enactment of this subsection, the Board shall clearly establish and publish by rule or otherwise such limitations on its exercise of jurisdiction as it proposes to observe for the purpose of excluding from its jurisdiction any labor dispute, unfair labor practice or representation proceeding: Provided, That such limitation shall be substantially in accord with those now in effect.

"'(2) The Board in the same manner may establish and publish modifications of such limitations on its exercise of jurisdiction as it has established pursuant to paragraph (1), but no such modification shall have the effect of staying or otherwise affecting any proceeding duly instituted before any appropriate court or agency of any State or Territory (including the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, Guam and the Virgin Islands) prior to the expiration of thirty days' publication of such modification; nor shall any such modification permit the Board to withdraw exercise of its jurisdiction over any proceeding which has been duly instituted before the Board prior to the expiration of thirty days' publication of such modification.

"'(3) Any person may petition the Board for a determination as to whether a particular case involving a labor dispute falls within the limitations on its exercise of jurisdiction established pursuant to paragraphs (1) and (2). Notice of such petition and its contents shall be given contemporaneously by the petitioner to any known interested persons or his representative, and such notice shall have the effect of staying any proceeding to which the petition refers explicitly and to which both petitioner and any person or persons given such notice are the parties. Any person given notice may file an answer with the Board not later than ten days after receiving such notice. The Board's determination, unless arbitrary, shall be final and binding upon the petitioner and upon all parties notified by petitioner as provided in this paragraph. If the Board should make no determination within thirty days after the filing of the initial petition, it shall be presumed that the Board has determined to be outside its jurisdiction any case to which the petition explicitly refers, and to which petitioner and any person or persons given appropriate notice are the parties.'

"(c) Section 14 of the National Labor Relations Act as amended, is amended by adding thereto the following new subsection (c) as follows:

"'(c) (1) Whenever the Board has declined jurisdiction over an unfair labor practice, the courts of any State or Territory (including the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, Guam and the Virgin Islands) shall have jurisdiction over such unfair labor practices: Provided, That any State or Territory may, by legislation or otherwise, provide that an agency rather than the courts thereof shall assume and assert such jurisdiction.

"'(2) Whenever the Board has declined jurisdiction over any labor dispute, unfair labor practice, or representation proceeding any State or Territory (including the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, Guam, and the Virgin Islands) may, by legislation or otherwise, establish an agency to assert jurisdiction over such labor dispute, unfair labor practice, or representation proceeding and such agency shall not be precluded from asserting jurisdiction by virtue of the fact that such labor dispute, unfair labor practice or representation proceeding affects interstate commerce.

"'(3) In determining unfair labor practice proceedings being prosecuted in accordance with paragraph (1) of this subsection, or in determining labor disputes, unfair labor practices, or representation proceedings pursuant to paragraph (2) of such subsection, the State or Territorial court or agency shall apply and be governed solely by Federal law as set forth in section 8(a) and (b).

"'(4) Whenever any State or Territory establishes pursuant to this section an agency to assume and assert jurisdiction over any labor dispute, unfair labor practice or representation proceeding which the Board has excluded from its exercise of jurisdiction pursuant to section 6(b) of this Act, the courts of such States or Territories shall no longer assume or assert jurisdiction over unfair labor practice cases pursuant to paragraph (1) of this subsection except for cases then pending in such courts which may be concluded and determined by them.

"'(5) Proceedings brought in a State or Territorial court pursuant to paragraph (1) of this subsection shall be advanced on the docket and expedited for disposition. Such proceedings shall not be subject to removal to the Federal courts under the provisions of the Judicial Code (Act of June 25, 1948; 28 U.S.C.) as amended.

"'(6) Judgments or decrees of the State or Territorial courts shall be subject to review by the Supreme Court of the United States upon writ of certiorari as provided in the Judicial Code, as amended (Act of June 25, 1948; 28 U.S.C.).'

"(d) Section 10(a) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is amended by repealing the proviso thereto."

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, I have already outlined my proposal. At the outset, I might say that I have no objection at all to the proposal offered by the distinguished Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER], except that in my judgment it is not a practical approach. It relies upon the assumption that State governments will establish the various agencies. We should not overlook the fact that at least 33 States cannot do that for another 2 years, even if they should so desire, because their legislatures will not be in session.

Furthermore, I am sure very few States will establish agencies which will be subject to Federal jurisdiction. In that regard, we must be practical and realistic.

It is not that I object to the proposal made by the distinguished Senator from Kentucky or to the provision in the bill proposed by the distinguished senior Senator from Oregon. I am opposed to it primarily because I believe it is not a practical and realistic approach. I believe that instead of allowing the no man's land problem to continue, we should take action now. I agree that the amendment I propose is not perfect. However, it will at least give some relief to small business and small unions, where such relief is not now available to them through any agency or from any source.

I believe it is high time that we face reality. We should take some action now to enable State courts or State agencies to provide some relief, even though that action may be changed at a later date, if necessary and desirable—and probably it will be. Nevertheless, we should take action at this time.

I should like to go through once more the arguments which seem to me to be rather pertinent, and which suggest to me, at least, that the amendment I am proposing is satisfactory or, at least, workable.

The Cooper amendment does not require the Board to establish standards determining whether or not it will take jurisdiction. The amendment I offer specifically states that the limitations on the Board's exercise of jurisdiction must be substantially in accord with those now in effect. In other words, the Board cannot change its jurisdictional standards casually, day in and day out. Some standards will remain in operation.

Under the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER], a person might not know for months whether or not the Board has or has not jurisdiction over his case. In that time, I might suggest to the Senate, a small business could be put out of business, or a small union might be disregarded by an unfair employer, and neither unions nor employers could have their rights settled or their grievances heard.

My amendment specifically states that any person may petition the Board for a ruling as to whether his case comes under the Board's jurisdiction. If the Board does not act within 30 days, it will be assumed that the Board has declined jurisdiction.

Under the amendment of my distinguished friend from Kentucky the no man's land could exist indefinitely if sovereign States refused to establish agencies which would be in effect an arm of the National Labor Relations Board.

If we are to be realistic, we must know that few if any States will be anxious to take this action, since at this time only 12 States have established labor relations agencies, and none of the States have laws which enable the NLRB to cede jurisdiction to the State boards.

Therefore, as a practical matter it seems to me we must take action which will afford some relief, however imperfect it may be.

The proposal I am offering represents a compromise between the proposal of the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN] and that offered by my distinguished friend from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER]. It is not perfect, and I am not suggesting that it is. If we could have complete uniformity, and if every State could establish an agency which would act in accordance with Federal law, of course that would be the desirable approach. However, we cannot expect that. It is asking too much. Such an approach is visionary, at the present time, at least.

I do not wish to take too much time and prolong the debate. I desired to get into the RECORD my statement on an amendment which I believe is sound, logical, and workable. I hope it will be given serious consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BUSH in the chair). The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield 2 minutes more to the Senator from Vermont, on the bill.

Mr. PROUTY. I conclude by stating that under my amendment State courts could act immediately on unfair labor practice cases on which the Board has declined jurisdiction, and that my amendment provides that if States do provide agencies, they may handle all the cases declined by the Board. That is something that should be taken into consideration. My amendment offers immediate relief. In the event that my amendment is defeated, in 38 States no relief can possibly be available for a period of at least 2 years.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes on the bill to the distinguished Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. COOPER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont provides that jurisdiction shall be assumed by the courts or by such agencies as may be established by the States.

Some persons believe that the courts should take jurisdiction. Others—I am one of them—believe that the application of administrative law is better. I do not believe that there is much force to the argument that there would ensue a little delay if our amendment were adopted. There has been delay now for 12 years. I do not believe it is an argument to say that the States may not act. If the problem is important enough for the States to act, the States will act.

Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky yields back the remainder of his time.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROUTY] to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER] for himself and other Senators.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] is absent on official business.

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. BIBLE] is absent because of a death in his family.

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR] is absent because of illness.

Mr. KUCHEL. I announce that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CARLSON] is absent on official business.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] is necessarily absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum is present.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROUTY], offered as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER], for himself and other Senators.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROUTY], such time as may be necessary for him to ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont is recognized.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the pending amendment, which is the Prouty substitute.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, which is offered as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky.

On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] is absent on official business.

I also announce that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. BIBLE] is absent because of a death in his family.

I further announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR] is absent because of illness.

On this vote, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] is paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CARLSON]. If present and voting, the Senator from Minnesota would vote "nay" and the Senator from Kansas would vote "yea."

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. BIBLE] would vote "nay."

Mr. KUCHEL. I announce that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CARLSON] is absent on official business, and is paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY]. If present and voting, the Senator from Kansas would vote "yea" and the Senator from Minnesota would vote "nay."

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] is necessarily absent, and if present and voting, would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 40, nays 53, as follows:

So the amendment offered by Mr. COOPER (for himself, Mr. JAVITS, and Mr. MORSE) was agreed to.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to table was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, may we have order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I call up my amendment identified as "4–17–59—A."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will state the amendment.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Before the amendment is stated, I should like to say that following the disposition of the amendment it is my intention to call up my amendment identified as "4–17–59—C," providing for the prohibition of secondary boycotts. The amendment I am calling up now deals with organizational picketing. After the amendment is disposed of I will call up the other one immediately. I make that statement now so that Senators who are interested, pro or con, may be present to participate in the discussion of the amendments. I consider them to be very vital both to those who favor them and to those who are opposed to them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 25, beginning with line 21 it is proposed to strike all through line 3 on page 26.

At the end of the bill it is proposed to add a new section as follows:

SEC. 607. (a) Section 8(b) of the National Labor Relations Act is amended by striking out the word "and" at the end of paragraph (5), by striking out the period at the end of paragraph (6) and inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon, and by adding the following new paragraphs:

"(7) to carry on or threaten to carry on picketing on or about the premises of any employer for organizational purposes or for the purpose of forcing or requiring such employer to recognize or bargain with a particular labor organization as the representative of his employees—

"(A) within twelve months following the holding of a valid election under section 9(c) unless pursuant to such election such labor organization has been certified as the representative of the employees of such employer; or

"(B) during any other period unless there shall have been filed with such employer at least five days before the commencement of any such picketing a petition signed by a majority of the employees of such employer requesting that such employer recognize as the representative of his employees a particular labor union designated in such petition; and

"(8) to carry on or threaten to carry on picketing on or about the premises of any employer for the purpose of, or as part of any conspiracy or in furtherance of any plan or purpose for, the personal profit or enrichment of any person or persons (except a bona fide increase in wages or other employee benefits) by taking or obtaining any money or other thing of value from such employer against his will or with his consent."

(b) Section 8 of such Act is further amended by adding at the end thereof a new subsection as follows:

"(e) (1) Any labor organization which has officers or members engaged in activities affecting commerce, or which represents employees engaged in such activities, or which represents employees or has officers or members who are employed by any employer or in any industry engaged in activities affecting commerce, including any labor organization certified under section 9, acting, or recognized as the representative of employees of any such employer or in any such industry, or actively seeking to represent any such employees, or which charters or is chartered by another labor organization which is representing or actively seeking to represent any such employees, which engages in any activity defined as an unfair labor practice under paragraph (8) of subsection (b) shall be fined not more than $10,000 for each day during which it is so engaged.

"(2) Any person who orders, authorizes, encourages, or participates in any activity so defined shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both."

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, on the pending amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may modify my amendment as reported by striking out lines 1 and 2 on page 1 and by striking out lines 22 through 25 on page 3.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. MORTON in the chair). Without objection, the Senator so modifies his amendment.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield myself 5 minutes, to start with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, in the course of its investigations the Select Committee found that people are in many instances compelled to join unions, not of their own free will, not by their own knowledge, not with their consent, but simply by a labor boss walking into management's office, slapping a contract on the desk and saying to management, "You sign it and put your men into this union, or else we are going to picket you." It is as simple as that, but it is also said and done with emphasis. Sometimes they will settle for a payoff. Sometimes it is done simply to extort and get money out of management. It is a form of blackjacking or highway robbery, so to speak. That form of shakedown picketing is already taken care of in the bill, and the penalty for that kind of crime has been revised in the bill to conform to the penalty in the Hobbs Act, which is up to 20 years in prison.

There are other instances where the labor boss or bosses walk into the office of the management and, in the same manner, slap a contract on the desk and say, "Unless you have your employees join this union and unless you sign this contract, we are going to put up picket lines around your place of business." The management says, "Well, I don't know that my men want it."

The labor racketeer or boss says, "I don't care whether your men want it or not. You are going to do this or else we will put a picket line around you and put you out of business."

"But," management says, "let us have an election. Let the employees speak on the question.

The answer is, "We haven't got time for an election. That is too bothersome. This is the easy way for us. We demand that you do it this way."

What is the alternative? It is organizational picketing. That is where union leaders come to management and say, "We will organize your men, and put them in the union, irrespective of their wishes. We will make union members of them, or else we will picket your plant and apply that economic pressure on you."

That kind of pressure in many instances has put small businessmen completely out of business.

There is another practice, under which they approach the employer and say, "We have a majority of your men signed up."

There are three kinds: First, the complete shakedown; next, the shakedown to force the employer to make the employees join the union; the third is laying a contract before the employer and saying, "We have a majority of your men signed up."

The manager says, "Let me see the cards."

"Oh, no," they say, "we will not do that. But you will have to sign, recognize us, and bargain with us, or else you will have to suffer a picket line and the consequences of it."

The select committee has exposed many instances of union leaders having gone to the employer and having said, "Put your men in the union; otherwise we will settle for a sweetheart contract." So the employer signs up. In many instances, management itself has to pay the union dues of the employees—pay them for men who do not even know they are in the union. They never received a notice of a meeting and never heard of a meeting, until the committee exposed these practices.

But management pays the dues. For what? For a sweetheart contract. The employees are not helped; they get nothing out of it. Sometimes they have to pay dues. Sometimes the contract works in such a way that they pay dues and know they are in a union. But how much of an increase in salary do they get? Just barely enough so that management can hold it out to pay the dues.

Shakedown picketing has gone pretty far. It is a shakedown for the purpose of enriching the individual.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield myself 2 more minutes.

Of course, I do not think there is a Member of the Senate who can challenge the justice of penalizing those who exploit and extort under those conditions, under the guise or under the cloak of unionism. It is traditional that we are all proud of the members of unions in this country. But the shakedown practice is defiling unionism. Who can be proud of extortion? Who can be proud of compelling management and workers, irrespective of their will and their free choice, to become subservient in cases such as I have described? Those are the practices which are indulged in now; they are what the amendment seeks to prevent. It makes such practices unfair labor practices.

If a union engages in such practices, the amendment will penalize the union. The union will be penalized if it permits shakedown picketing. The amendment does not penalize the union for organizational picketing; it does not penalize the union for recognitional picketing. When I speak of penalizing, I mean penalizing for criminal action. But for a union which engages in shakedown picketing, the penalty is the same as for an individual who engages in it, except that the penalty for an individual is lighter. If a union engages in it, the penalty is a fine up to $10,000 a day for such time as it carries on the picketing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Arkansas has again expired.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield myself 1 more minute.

Mr. President, shakedown picketing is one of the vilest practices taking place in this country today. Unionizing and collective bargaining are premised on the free choice of individuals who work together to join a union of their choice, and to bargain collectively; it is not based upon compulsion to join a union.

"Compulsion" is an ugly word. Decent unionism does not require it; decent unionism does not need it. Honest unionism does not need to apply that kind of tactics.

If unionism is good, if it is sound, if it is right, if it is just, we can trust in the good faith and the quality of integrity of American workers voluntarily to accept it, to desire it honestly, and to be enthusiastic to secure the benefits which flow from worthy unionism. The workers will seek to unionize. But they ought not to be compelled and hijacked to join unions whether they want to or not, when they are not given a free choice. Compulsion and hijacking are nothing in the world but top-down organization; and top-down organization has no place in American law or American institutions, because it is a type of economic force to compel and subject people against their will.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Arkansas a few questions about the amendment. I yield myself 10 minutes.

Let us assume, for example, that all the meat dealers in a city are organized except one. The one unorganized meat dealer is underselling all his competitors in the city because the wages he pays are lower. What would be the effect of this amendment if a union placed a picket line outside the establishment of that meat dealer, saying: "This employer pays lower wages than the other meat dealers in the city"?

Mr. McCLELLAN. It would be prohibited under this amendment. There has never been any justification for saying that because three merchants want to run their business in one way they ought to be allowed to compel the fourth one to run his in the same way. The fourth one has as much freedom and right, under the principles of our Government, to employ his workers as he wishes, as the others have to employ theirs, and the employees have freedom to work for their employers as they please. If the arrangements of the fourth employer are satisfactory to his employees, and he is complying with the minimum wage laws of the country, who has a right to say to him: "We are going to compel you to run your business in our way"?

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator from Arkansas says that the one dealer has a right to do business as he wants to.

Why should the union be limited in its right to place a picket line on the sidewalk and to say, as a fact, "This man pays wages lower than are paid by other meat dealers in the city"?

Mr. McCLELLAN. Because that would be the use of economic force to restrain people from crossing a picket line to deliver to that man the supplies which he may need in order to operate his business. There is an economic force associated with the picketing that keeps the transportation and flow of commerce from the dealer whose plant is being picketed.

Mr. KENNEDY. This amendment goes much beyond preventing abuses commonly practiced by the Teamsters. If the Senator's amendment were directed solely to the trucking industry, and if it were directed at the Teamsters Union, I would support it. I would have no objection to an amendment which dealt with the unfair practices of the Teamsters Union. But this amendment applies to all labor. It would apply to the garment industry in New York City, whose sweatshops in earlier days were a disgrace to the Nation. This amendment would forbid the agreements which cleaned up these sweatshops.

Let us take the case of a racketeer employer in the garment industry who leaves New York City and goes to Pennsylvania. He hires Puerto Rican labor. He pays a wage which is 60 percent of the wage which employers in New York City are paying.

Does the Senator mean to say that his amendment would prevent the garment workers union from placing a picket in front of that employer's establishment, and saying, "This man pays wages which are only 60 percent of the union wages paid in New York City"? Would not the Senator's amendment permit that racketeer employer to undersell the other employers, and restrain their right to protect their economic interests?

Mr. McCLELLAN. Yes; and would the Senator from Massachusetts restrain union racketeers who have invaded that area? The testimony before the committee shows that they have taken over many industries. The same racketeers are responsible for the very conditions the Senator has described, and they have the responsibility for them. They secured that advantage because they used such tactics.

Mr. KENNEDY. The difference between the Senator from Arkansas and me is that every time he sees a union, he sees racketeering. Every time I see a union—except in a few cases, relatively speaking—I do not see racketeers; I see men and women who are attempting to advance their economic interests.

The Senator from Arkansas proposes to apply a universal standard because some racketeers have been exposed. This, in my opinion, would prevent any further union organization in this country.

Let us take another example: Suppose an employer who is antilabor says that he will move his company to another State if the union is successful in organizing his employees. Then the union attempts to organize his employees; and he dismisses the first three employees who express an interest in union organization. It will be 3 years before those unfair labor practices are finally adjudicated under the present procedures of the Board; but during that period of time, of course, the other employees will be reluctant to sign up, in the case of the pending amendment.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Does the Senator from Massachusetts wish to have a further answer to his question?

Mr. KENNEDY. Yes; I should like to have one.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I shall give it. I take the illustration the Senator from Massachusetts used—the one about the Puerto Ricans employed in the textile industry in New York City. That is where sweatshop conditions are inflicted upon them by the so-called union leaders, under the very tactics this amendment seeks to prevent. So I take the Senator's own example.

Mr. KENNEDY. Is the Senator from Arkansas suggesting that the great work which has been done by the Garment Workers Union in New York should be cast aside merely because there happen to be racketeers in that industry?

Mr. McCLELLAN. Not at all. I want to prevent racketeering in unionism.

Mr. KENNEDY. But two evenings ago, the Senate, in taking action on an amendment submitted by the Senator from Arkansas, whose work in exposing improper conditions I have supported—adopted the amendment, and did so on the basis of taking action to stop racketeering. But surely the Senate must realize the effect of that amendment, not only on racketeers, but also on all unions.

Let me refer to page 2 of the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, beginning in line 14, where we find the words "unless there shall have been filed with such employer at least 5 days before the commencement of any such picketing a petition signed by a majority of the employees of such employer requesting that such employer recognize as the representative of his employees a particular labor union designated in such petition."

In other words, before the union would be allowed to use this economic weapon, it would have to present to the employer such a petition. Under the Senator's amendment, a majority of the employees would have to present such a petition to the employer, not to the National Labor Relations Board; and the employer then could say, "If you persist in forming a union, I will move my business to another State."

Therefore, Mr. President, I say that the amendment will be of very little benefit in respect to driving racketeers out of the union movement.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, I submit the following amendment: On page 2, in lines 4 and 5, strike out the words "for organizational purposes or."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I should like to speak on my amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 2 of Mr. McCLELLAN'S amendment, in lines 4 and 5, it is proposed to strike out "for organizational purposes or."

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, let me inquire how much time I have left.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts has used 8 minutes of the time available to him on the McClellan amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. Let me ask how much time the distinguished Senator from North Carolina wishes to use.

Mr. ERVIN. Five minutes.

Mr. KENNEDY. Of course, the Senator from North Carolina is supporting the position of the Senator from Arkansas. However, I yield 5 minutes on the bill to the Senator from North Carolina.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina is recognized for 5 minutes on the bill; that time has been yielded to him by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I shall be glad to yield time to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas would make it an unfair labor practice under certain conditions to engage in organizational picketing or picketing to enforce the recognition of a union for bargaining purposes.

I go along with the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas insofar as it provides that it shall be an unfair labor practice to carry on, or threaten to carry on, picketing about the premises of any employer, for the purpose of forcing such employer to recognize or to bargain with a particular labor organization as the representative of his employees, under the circumstances set forth in the Senator's amendment. I would also go along with any proposal to make coercive picketing of any character an unfair labor practice.

But I think there is a right to engage in peaceful picketing for the purpose of persuading others to join a union; and I think there is a right to exercise that right in a peaceful manner near the premises of the employer.

So if my amendment to the amendment is adopted, it will make it clear that we are not interfering with any constitutional right of freedom of speech in connection with picketing for the purpose of persuading others to join a union.

I hope my amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas will be adopted.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield to me?

Mr. ERVIN. I yield.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Do I correctly understand that the Senator from North Carolina is proposing to my amendment an amendment which, in his opinion, would completely eliminate the objection which thus far has been expressed to my amendment?

Mr. ERVIN. I think so. I think my amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas would do away with the objection of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY]. I agree with him that we should not interfere with the right of freedom of speech to persuade others to join a union, so long as that right is exercised peacefully, by means of a picket line or by means of newspaper or radio or television advertisements.

I do not think a union has a right to picket for the purpose of forcing the recognition of the union as the bargaining agent, if it does not actually represent a majority of the employees.

So I go along with that part of the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas; but I cannot go along with the part of his amendment which prohibits peaceful organizational picketing, which is merely a peaceful way of trying to urge others to join the union.

Of course, any picketing carried on by force is illegal. But if picketing is carried on peaceably for the purpose of persuading others to join a union, I think it is proper and protected by the constitutional right of freedom of speech.

So I hope my amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas will be agreed to.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield to me?

Mr. ERVIN. Yes, if I have time.

Mr. LAUSCHE. What would be the situation under the Senator's amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas in a situation in which a businessman had 50 employees, all of whom were satisfied with their hours of work, their working conditions, and their pay, and when there was a complete understanding between the employer and the employees; but then a business agent of a union said to the employer, "I will throw a picket line in front of your place of business unless you have your workers join my union or unless you discharge your workers and hire union members"?

Mr. ERVIN. The situation on which the able Senator from Ohio bases his question is already outlawed under the Taft-Hartley Act, because in such a situation the agent would be undertaking to coerce the employer into coercing his employees to join the union; and such a situation is already taken care of by the Taft-Hartley Act.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Under what situation would the provisions of the Senator's amendment apply? Let us assume that the agent put pickets in front of the place of business; and let us also assume that the employees were satisfied with the hours, wages, and working conditions, and that the employer understood that they were satisfied. Yet the employer would be confronted with a line of pickets. Would that be permissible under the Senator's amendment?

Mr. ERVIN. Under my amendment, so long as the pickets merely resorted to peaceful persuasion to induce the employees in the plant to join the union, but not for the purpose of bringing coercion on the employer for recognition purposes, the picketing would be perfectly legitimate and permissible; and I honestly think it should be made permissible.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time yielded to the Senator from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, does the Senator from North Carolina desire to have further time?

Mr. ERVIN. I should like to have 2 more minutes.

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield 2 additional minutes to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. ERVIN. I thank the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. President, let me say that I think the Senator from Massachusetts and I are in agreement that when the object of the picketing is to induce the employees to join the union, if the picketing is conducted in a peaceful manner, it falls within the area which should be covered by the guarantee of freedom of speech which all Americans have.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield 5 minutes to me?

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio is recognized for 5 minutes, to be charged to the time under the control of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, I desire to offer my support to the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Arkansas.

In Ohio, the law, in the absence of Federal interference, declares that picketing is illegal except when there is in existence, between an existing employer and his employees, a legitimate dispute relating to hours of work, working conditions, or wages.

That law came into effect in about 1935. It grew out of a set of circumstances in which a business agent threw a picket line around a restaurant known as the Crosby Restaurant. A Mrs. Crosby ran that institution. She had 60 employees. All of them were satisfied with their hours, working conditions, and pay. The business agent descended upon her and said, "Discharge your employees and hire our union members, or compel your employees to join our union. Unless you do so, we will picket your place of business."

Mrs. Crosby spoke to her workers. Uniformly they said, "We are satisfied with all the conditions surrounding our employment. We do not want to join the union."

She reported that fact to the business agent. The business agent said, "Well, then, we will picket your place," and the union did. It picketed the place. In effect, the union finally destroyed her business.

I submit to my colleagues that the right to engage in business without interference by interlopers and outsiders is, in my understanding of the meaning of liberty and the Constitution of the United States, just as sacred as is the right of free speech.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. LAUSCHE. Yes.

Mr. McCLELLAN. In many instances the unions will hire persons from the outside to picket. The pickets are not employees of the plant. The unions bring persons from the outside to picket the place.

Mr. LAUSCHE. All of the employees of Mrs. Crosby were satisfied. I do not know whether the union hired outsiders to do the picketing, but the result on Mrs. Crosby was identical, whether the union tried to persuade the workers to join the union or attempted to blackmail Mrs. Crosby into yielding to the union's demands.

In reply to the Senator from North Carolina, I wish to repeat my philosophy of what is involved—the right to engage in business without interference by interlopers, when that business is run on such a basis that the employees are satisfied, is just as sacred as is the right of free speech sought to be exercised by the men who picket.

I wish to say further for the consideration of my colleagues that the first five titles of the bill, improved as they are, will do much in the way of remedying the abuses which have been in existence. But those remedies do not go to the causes and the reasons for the evils which have come into existence. The evils practiced by the racketeering labor leaders result from the fact that they have been vested with a power which they do not exercise properly.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. LAUSCHE. Yes.

Mr. McCLELLAN. The vesting of such power is one of the things that has been attractive to the racketeers and gangsters. They know that by the force or the power which has been given to the labor leaders by Congress they can humiliate or destroy a small business, or make it bow to their demands. Honest unionism does not need that power. If we remove the power, it will be taken away from the crooks and scoundrels who want to exploit humanity and seize upon the power Congress has given to unions so they can use it for exploitation.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. LAUSCHE. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Ohio has expired.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I yield 2 more minutes to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator knows that I am particularly concerned with the situation that applies to hotels. There have been repeated instances of the picketing of hotels in our State where the employees were satisfied. They were not members of the unions, but, nevertheless, the places were picketed. The damage done, of course, is very considerable, as was true in the case of the restaurant which the Senator has mentioned.

My question is this: Would it be possible to differentiate between a picket line to appeal to the employees to join the union and a picket line set up to force the employer into line by compelling him to bargain with the union?

Mr. LAUSCHE. There could be no differentiation between the two as to the results which would obtain. When a picket line is placed in front of a businessman's plant, it can be readily asserted that "we are merely trying to persuade the workers," but the net result is the destruction and ruination of that business.

Mr. HOLLAND. If the Senator will yield for one more quetion, he believes, then, does he not, as I do, that the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina would mean that picket lines could be thrown up ostensibly to persuade employees to join a union, but it would be really to ruin the employer? Is that correct?

Mr. LAUSCHE. I think the very situation I have described demonstrates that fact.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Ohio has expired.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield 1 more minute to the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio is recognized for 1 additional minute.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, the argument has been made that there may be many business houses having union contracts, but only one or two which do not have. My answer to that argument is, Why should the workers of one nonunion house be obliged, by intimidation and by the threat of destroying the employer's business, to join the union? If the employees can be persuaded to do so, well and good. But it is not right for the employees to be told, "You will be better off," when the worker says, "I am satisfied with my employment. I am satisfied with my wages, hours, and working conditions. I do not want to join the union." But the business agent says, "It does not make any difference whether you are satisfied or not. You are going to join."

It is at that point that I part with the philosophy that is being advocated against the proposal offered by the Senator from Arkansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Ohio has expired.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the able Senator from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I rise in support of the pending amendment. Blackmail picketing is a weapon of the racketeers. We cannot wipe out racketeering without bringing to an end blackmail picketing, and that is what the amendment deals with.

I call the attention of Senators to lines 14 to 21 on page 2 of the amendment. There it is provided that there may be picketing if the persons engaged in the picketing represent the workers inside the plant.

The McClellan committee has taken evidence of case after case in which racketeers have brought in pickets representing no workers inside the building. These pickets would come for the purpose of either destroying the man's business or of compelling him to place his workers in a union to which the workers did not wish to belong.

The distinguished chairman of the select committee, the Senator from Arkansas, I am sure remembers the case of the Terminal Barber Shops in the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel. Perhaps the Senator from Florida will be interested in what happened at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel.

The Waldorf-Astoria Hotel had three barbershops, which were operated by Terminal Barber Shops, Inc. This organization had its own union, which was not a company union but was an independent union. Nevertheless, an organizer for the A.F. of L. Barbers Union went to the owner of the barbershops in the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel and demanded that he put his barbers, not in the union of their choice, but in his union. The owner did not know what to do. He wanted to be a neutral and he wanted his men to decide, but the men did not want to have anything to do with another union, since they were satisfied with their own union. Pickets were stationed at the Wadorf-Astoria, not near the barbershops on the various floors, but at all the entrances to the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel. The evidence shows that for a few days business went on as usual, and then the Teamsters Union recognized the picket line and refused to deliver supplies to the Waldorf-Astoria. There were no linens brought in. There was no milk. There was no food. Supplies could not go out. The greatest hotel in the country was about to come to a standstill because some pickets, who represented not a single worker inside the barbershops, marched up and down.

As a result, the management of the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel had to say to the concern which had leased the barbershop space, "You will have to yield. If you do not, we cannot renew your lease." The owner of the barbershop had to say to the barbers, "You will have to give up."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, may I have 2 additional minutes?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield the Senator 2 additional minutes.

Mr. CURTIS. The owner of the barbershop had to say to the barbers, "You will have to give up the union of your choice and join the other union, or we will all be out of business."

Mr. President, the intent of the law is to give to the workers the right to organize and bargain collectively. That is the right we should defend today. We should not defend the right of an outsider, particularly a racketeer, to destroy someone's business when he does not represent any workers inside the business. As soon as we take away the unlawful and wrongful weapons of blackmail picketing and boycotting, which go hand in hand, we can expect honesty in unions, because evil men will not seek to get control of unions.

Mr. President, if it is wrong for high-school boys to picket someone's place of business and drive him out of business it is wrong for a union. If it is wrong for a competitor to surround a business and destroy it, it is wrong for any other organization, including a labor organization.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLAND in the chair). The time of the Senator from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. CURTIS. I urge that the amendment be agreed to.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, how much time is there remaining, pro and con?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts has 22 minutes remaining and the Senator from Arkansas has 7 minutes remaining.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN] to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN].

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois desires to speak, and after he speaks I will be prepared to yield back my time, except for 6 or 7 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does any Senator yield time to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I have only 7 minutes remaining.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield 10 minutes to the Senator from Illinois.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois is recognized for 10 minutes, from the time under control of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I shall address myself very particularly to my esteemed friend from Massachusetts. I think this can be most effectively done in the form of two memorandums or two letters. I trust every Member of the Senate will pay close attention, because here in simple compass is the core of the problem.

I first desire to read a letter addressed to the President of the United States, which reads as follows:

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: At the time this is written, our company has been threatened with a picket line because our employees have not joined local 714 of the Teamsters Union despite over 2 months of campaigning by this union.

Enclosed are copies of a letter received from the union containing the threat of picketing and a copy of a statement read to our employees by the company.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator desist for a moment? There is too much talking in the galleries and there is too much talking on the floor. The Senate will be in order, or the debate will be suspended.

The Senator from Illinois may proceed.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I continue to read from the letter:

As you are no doubt aware, we are faced with a dilemma. If we refuse to force our employees into the union against their wishes, we face possible loss of our business due to the picket line. If we force our employees into the union we are guilty of an unfair labor practice.

The letter is from a small company in Illinois which manufactures decorative molding and that sort of thing.

I now wish to read what I think is one of the most interesting documents I have seen in a long time. It is reasonably current, being dated the 4th day of March 1959. It is addressed to the president of the company and is signed by the secretary-treasurer of local 714. This is what the secretary says:

Local 714 is engaged in a campaign to organize your production and maintenance employees.

Every word has significance. He says:

To induce your employees to join this union, we shall shortly begin peacefully to picket your establishment.

There is no question what they have in mind, because they have said so.

We assure you that the picketing will be entirely peaceful. We have instructed our pickets not to threaten, intimidate, or coerce anyone.

The operation is peaceful, to induce the employees to join this particular union.

We wish to make it clear to you that local 714 does not at this time represent, and of course we do not claim to represent, a majority of your production and maintenance employees.

Local 714 does not ask you to recognize it as exclusive bargaining representatives for your employees or, indeed, ask you to recognize it for any purpose at this time.

They had been campaigning for 2 months to organize this little plant.

The purpose of our picketing is solely to call to the attention of union members and supporters of organized labor that your production and maintenance employees are not members of local 714.

We hope that the demonstration of support of local 714 in its efforts to organize, which this picketing will produce—

There is no question of what they are going to get—will persuade your employees to become members of our local union. When they do, they will join the thousands of other employees who are members of Local 714 and who are affiliated with the great International Brotherhood of Teamsters. In engaging in this picketing campaign, we are speaking for the members of our organization who are employed like your people and who feel the brunt of the unfair competition of your unorganized employees.

This point we must emphasize. We are not making any demand upon your company at this time to agree to or execute any contract with our union covering any of your employees. Under the law your company is permitted to recognize and bargain with our local union only after a majority of your production and maintenance employees have authorized the union to represent them. Therefore, even if your company should now or hereafter offer to recognize our union or enter into collective bargaining with us our union would refuse such an offer and we would continue to refuse until your employees lawfully authorize us to represent them.

Talk about the fine Italian hand of an insidious force. There it is. "We will destroy your business unless you tell your employees that we ought to represent them."

Should your employees desire to join our union, they may apply for membership at the office of Local 714, 4620 West Madison Street, Chicago 44, Ill., or ask one of the pickets for a membership application card which they can fill out and return to him. When we have received applications from a majority of your employees, we will contact you further.

This is not some fancied case. This is not the minority leader speaking. This is a letter from the secretary-treasurer of the union to the head of the company, telling him what is going to happen to him. He cannot tell him to join, because that would place him in the toils of the National Labor Relations Board. But if he does not join, his business will be destroyed.

Mr. President, I am not so much concerned about large enterprises. They have the resources to take care of themselves. This is a small company, which cannot stand the pressure. It will be out of business under this kind of treatment when the cards go up.

Yes; it is a demonstration effort. It is an educational effort; but that will be very poor comfort to the employer when he is out of business or in bankruptcy, or if he violates the law by forcing his employees to join the union.

One of the most skillful lawyers in the country must have written this letter. It is really a document for the books.

I continue to read from the letter:

You should also understand that it is your right under the Constitution of the United States and under the National Labor Relations Act to advise your employees of the economic detriment which you and they will sustain as a result of the withholding of patronage from your concern by union members and sympathizers as long as they remain nonmembers of our union.

Nothing is left to chance. The secretary of the union tells the president of the company that he has a constitutional right to advise his employees of the economic detriment which will happen.

There is the picket line. "So, Mr. Plepel"—that is the name of the head of the firm—"take your choice."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Illinois has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield myself 5 minutes under the bill.

"Take your choice, Mr. Plepel. Tell them to get into our union or we will put you out of business."

There is no intimidation, he says.

We shall shortly begin peacefully to picket your establishment. We assure you that the picketing will be entirely peaceful. We have instructed our pickets not to threaten, intimidate, or coerce anyone.

This will be milk and honey. It will be like balm in Gilead. No one will be able to take exception, but Mr. Plepel, your business is going down the drain.

That is what is involved in this amendment of the distinguished Senator from Arkansas. If it had no other appeal, it ought to appeal to every sense of justice and every throb of justice and equity that is in us.

You may, in the exercise of your lawful rights explain these detriments to your employees and urge your employees to apply for membership in the union and thereby acquire for themselves and for your company the good will of our union and its friends. You may not, and we are sure that you will not, threaten to take economic reprisal against your employees or grant them benefits, to coerce their choice in this matter. However, we feel sure that if your employees, who have been carefully taught to look to you for leadership on matters affecting their employment, are convinced that it is your sincere desire that they join the union, they will quickly realize that acquisition of union membership at the earliest opportunity is in their best interest.

Yours truly,

W. T. HOGAN,
Secretary-Treasurer, Local 714.

Aside from partisanship, aside from the question of whether a person is a conservative or liberal, aside from the question of whether or not he has a tag on him, this amendment appeals to fairness as nothing else can. I am speaking for the small companies. When representatives of the retailers came before the committee they recited instance after instance of what had happened. It is all in the testimony. Rather than resort to the testimony, I used the letter from the secretary-treasurer of the union to the president of a small company, telling him what is going to happen to him—and it is going to be so peaceful that not even a peace magistrate could take exception to the quiet atmosphere in which it will be done.

I think the Senate is on trial on the question of peaceful picketing. This amendment is for the protection of little people. In my judgment the more substantial concerns can take care of themselves.

That is the whole story. There is no amplification which I can give to that letter, and I rest the case on it.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, how much time have we?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois has been proceeding on 5 minutes yielded to himself on the bill, which he has not entirely consumed. He has 2 minutes remaining.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I had agreed to yield some time to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT]. However, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] probably wishes to comment.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I shall take only 2 minutes.

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, with regard to the question which the Senator from Illinois has raised, there is nothing in the free speech section of the Taft-Hartley law which would prevent an employer from calling his employees together, if he so desired, and saying, "I have no objection to any employee in my plant joining a union if he wishes to join a union."

Second, I call attention to the kind of literature and the information which chambers of commerce and other employer groups issue, notifying union members that they are on an employers' blacklist, and that if they continue their membership in the union they will be denied credit, for example.

I intend to speak at some length later, if I can get the time, on the great issue which faces the Senate this afternoon. In my judgment one of the fundamental principles and fundamental purposes of the free trade union movement is now at stake on the floor of the Senate.

I would have the Senate take at least enough time—and that is why I wish we had more time—to review some of the great doctrines enunciated by the courts of this country, which have been handed down in picketing cases, which, in my judgment, are the great landmarks for the preservation of some basic freedoms, including freedom of speech, freedom to pace the streets of America with signs notifying the public, for example, that here is a plant which is undermining high labor standards in the community because of the fact that it is not organized.

The courts have very clearly defined peaceful picketing, and what peaceful picketing includes. I wish to say to my friend from Illinois that it will be a sad day in Congress if this afternoon we strike a body blow against the cardinal principle of freedom of speech under the Constitution of the United States, which the Supreme Court in landmark case after landmark case has time and time again sustained under the practice of peaceful picketing.

I shall not vote, in effect, to undermine these great Supreme Court decisions about which I shall speak this afternoon at some length if I can get the time to do so on the bill.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield myself 30 seconds on the bill to say to my distinguished friend from Oregon that this is not a hypothetical case.

Mr. MORSE. I corrected myself in that regard.

Mr. DIRKSEN. This is a real case. That letter went to the president of a company. For aught I know, pickets are marching this afternoon in the State of Illinois. This is not a matter merely of words on my part. This is an actual instance which, in my judgment, appeals to fairness.

Mr. KENNEDY. I believe I have 11 minutes remaining.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts has 9 minutes remaining.

Mr. KENNEDY. I shall yield 3 minutes to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. MUNDT. I thank the Senator from Massachusetts, but I understand that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN] has yielded me 2 minutes. Therefore I have a total of 5 minutes. Is that correct?

Mr. McCLELLAN. Yes; I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I am sure the distinguished Senator wants to have the yeas and nays ordered on the amendment.

Mr. MUNDT. I am glad to yield for the purpose of having the yeas and nays ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas. They have not been ordered on the amendment to that amendment, offered by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I was greatly fascinated by the recent colloquy between the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Oregon. I was disturbed and concerned by the evidence brought into the RECORD by the Senator from Illinois, because it so clearly parallels a case in point in my own State of South Dakota. I should like to mention the case, which arose in Sioux Falls, S. Dak. It involved a dispute between a young electrical subcontractor and the powerful International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will suspend. There is too much confusion on the floor of the Senate. Senators who wish to converse will please leave the Chamber.

Mr. MUNDT. The case involved a dispute between a young electrical subcontractor and the powerful International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. This is not a hypothetical case. This is the kind of thing which can happen in any Senator's home town or State. It is happening.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator suspend? There seems to be a continuing insistence on conversations on the floor of the Senate. Senators will please leave the Chamber if they wish to converse. The Senator from South Dakota may proceed.

Mr. MUNDT. I thank the Chair. This is the type of case that can happen anywhere in the country, in small communities and in large ones, unless Congress takes action to illegalize illegitimate and blackmail picketing.

The subcontractor to whom I have referred employed at various times both union and nonunion electricians. He is a working electrician himself. He was advised by the business agent of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers that he should employ union electricians. The contractor said, "I am perfectly willing to allow my men to join the union. You can go and talk with them and try to get them to join. I have no opposition to that." However, he refused to compel them to join the union, believing that his workers had the same American right to join or not to join as other Americans have to exercise their independence.

The union representative advised the contractor that he did not want the contractor to induce his employees to join the union. I ask Senators to note this particularly. He did not want the contractor to induce his workers to join the union. He said, instead, that the contractor should dismiss his employees and hire union electricians who were available in the community.

Having a sense of loyalty to the men who were working for him and who had worked for him for a considerable period of time, the employer refused to do so. Following his refusal to dismiss his employees, and to hire people whom he did not know but who happened to belong to the union, the contractor was picketed, his business was ruined, and his employees were put out of work. He was blacklisted by the union.

He brought an action under the South Dakota labor laws and succeeded in obtaining a judgment in excess of $25,000, $20,000 being punitive damages awarded by the trial court jury.

The judgment was unanimously affirmed by the Supreme Court of South Dakota. It is now on appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Following Monday's decision in the Garmon case, it may well be that the contractor's case will be reversed by the Supreme Court, because in that decision the Supreme Court held that State courts had no right to award damages to a contractor who had been ruined and forced out of business if the picketing was peaceful, and that the only time the State has jurisdiction is when there is a criminal violation.

I submit to my colleagues in the Senate: Is this the kind of thing we are going to approve by voting against the McClellan amendment? This is the kind of thing we must eliminate by voting for the McClellan amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield 1 additional minute to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. MUNDT. I wish to make a special appeal on this point to my friends from the South, who have fought so long and so courageously for the concept known as States rights. If they really believe in the rights of States and in the rights of the working people in the States, and in the rights of State courts to rule from the standpoint of a man who has been put out of business in this kind of activity, I solicit their support for the amendment offered by a great son of the South, Senator McCLELLAN, of Arkansas.

If they have any lingering doubts as to what they can do for the people in this fight, I suggest they read the sickening dispatches which are coming from Henderson, N.C., involving the textile situation there.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes on the bill to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, the situation in which we find ourselves at this time proves the soundness of the proposition I made to the Senate, that we should restrict the bill to malpractices in the internal affairs of the unions, and not extend it to matters in the field of the Taft-Hartley Act.

We have before us an amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas. I favor much of it. There are some provisions in it which I oppose. If, instead of legislating on the floor of the Senate in this manner, we had had this proposal ironed out in committee the committee could have drawn a bill which would have cured the evils the amendment is intended to cure, without the infliction of injury on others. It is impossible in the time available to us on the floor of the Senate to find phraseology which will accomplish this. Therefore one is compelled to vote on the basis of whether the amendment is 50 percent good or 50 percent bad. That shows the unwisdom of writing legislation on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ERVIN. I shall be glad to yield in a moment. I undertook to have all non-germane Taft-Hartley amendments stricken from the bill and proposed an amendment to this effect. It was my purpose to urge that all other Taft-Hartley amendments be rejected, and that the bill be restricted to its primary purpose, that is, the prevention or punishment of demonstrated malpractices in the internal affairs of unions. But the Senate rejected my amendment and thus decreed that this bill should be used as a vehicle for amending the Taft-Hartley Act.

Like other Members of the Senate, I now have to vote my views on amendments proposed to the Taft-Hartley law.

Since we do not have adequate time to adopt or change the phraseology of the bill in order to make it certain that good and not ill will be accomplished by such amendments, we must necessarily vote for or against the amendments to the bill based on our somewhat hastily formed opinion as to whether they will do more harm than good.

Mr. MUNDT. The Senator from North Carolina is not contending, is he, that this issue was not brought up before the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare?

Mr. ERVIN. I am not a member of that committee, but I understand it was brought up, and that the committee did not take action.

Mr. MUNDT. I know it was brought up, because I was one of the Senators who testified in support of legislation of this type. I think I read in the newspapers that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN] also presented the problem to the committee.

Mr. ERVIN. The Senator from South Dakota was one of those who favored my endeavor to restrict the bill to the internal affairs of unions. Of course, when we lost, and the majority decreed otherwise, it became necessary for us to do the very best we could, under very unfavorable circumstances, to write amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act on the floor of the Senate amid the heat of debate—a course of action which is certainly not desirable.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I oppose this amendment. The Senator from Illinois has given us an example, although there may be other factors present about which we know nothing. We have no idea what the conditions are in the company he cited—the kind of wages paid, the number of hours the employees work; what the previous employee-employer relationship has been. But let us take his example at face value. Let us say there is unfair pressure on an employer to coerce and force his employees to join a union. I would be against that kind of pressure. I think it should be prohibited.

But the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas goes far beyond that. Let us look at the language of the Senator's amendment. He says it is directed to racketeers and unreasonable pressure on employers.

Can the Senator from Arkansas tell me why the words beginning on line 14, page 2, have been written in exactly this form:

> During any other period unless there shall have been filed with such employer at least 5 days before the commencement of any such picketing a petition signed by a majority of the employees of such employer requesting that such employer recognize as the representative of his employees a particular labor union designated in such petition.

Let me demonstrate what an employer could do with that petition. He could discharge the first 5 employees whose names appeared on it. It would take, under present procedures of the Board, 3 years for an unfair labor practice complaint against him to be acted on if an appeal were taken.

During that time, other employees would immediately revoke their signatures on the petition, and the union would be unable to protect its economic interest against the economic interest of the low-wage employer.

Second, the employer could write a letter to the chamber of commerce, asking that it send letters to merchants requesting that the employees be denied credit in that town. Under the law today such activity would be permissible.

Third, the employer could say to the employee, "If you vote to have a union come into the plant, I will move my shop to another State. Then all the employees would be out of work." As Judge Hand said, the speeches of employers on such occasions have more than the force of persuasion.

So when the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Illinois seek to deal with wrongdoing, in the name of the small businessmen, giving us reprehensible examples, I accept their statements and examples. But on the strength of such examples I do not propose to shackle honest trade unions with broad language which is as ill advised as that in the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas.

I have been a member of the McClellan committee since its inception. I have supported proposals which I think will apply to the racketeers. But I do not think proposals such as the one now presented should be accepted by the U.S. Senate.

In my opinion, the effect of this amendment would be extremely serious. It would end any chance for this bill to pass, and it should end it. I myself would be forced to vote against the bill and ask that my name be stricken from it, if this amendment were adopted. The amendment has nothing to do with labor racketeers. It goes to the whole question of the economic relationship of employers and employees. Unless we are ready to limit in some degree the rights of employers, I do not think we should adopt an amendment which seeks to deal with racketeers but which circumscribes completely the economic rights of employees.

Of course there is an economic struggle. Fifty or sixty thousand enterprises went broke in a recent period. The whole free-enterprise system is an economic struggle. There is an economic struggle between employees and employers; between organized labor and unorganized labor. I do not propose, under the pretense of antiracketeering, to take away the economic rights of one group as against all other groups.

That is why we have created a blue ribbon committee. We are attempting to write a bill which will regulate picketing of the kind which the Senator from Illinois described, but it will not prohibit all picketing.

I hope the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas will be defeated.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I yield myself 1 minute on the bill.

The Senator from Massachusetts would sound very persuasive indeed this afternoon except for one thing. At least three efforts were made to include a picketing amendment in the bill, but the Senator's committee resisted those efforts.

Mr. KENNEDY. Did the Senator from Illinois at any time propose restricting in any way any employer rights under the free speech section of the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Then why was not an effort made to put an antipicketing amendment in the bill? The attempt to include such language was resisted. So the Senator from Arkansas had virtually no other choice than to offer that kind of amendment.

If the Senator wants to say that the Senate is on trial, it is on trial, because on a straight vote down the line every effort was made by the committe to resist an antipicketing amendment.

The language can be revised later. It can be revised in the House. But this is the only opportunity which the Senate will have to include such a provision. I trust the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas will be agreed to.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts asked me why the language in subtitle (B), on page 2, line 14, was included. I do not want to deny to a majority of the employees their rights—their economic rights—to bind together in collective bargaining. I do not want to deny them the right to picket or the right to demand the use of economic force, when a majority of the employees want a union. That is why I included that language.

If there is an election, they cannot have another election for a year. I do not want to deny them the right during that year, if a majority of the employees decide they want an election, to let them petition their employer and give him 5 days' notice. Then if the employer does not bargain or recognize the union, I want to give them the right to strike.

We talk about freedom of speech. I do not know when freedom of speech has ever extended without bounds. I can walk down the street, swinging my fist. That is a type of freedom. That is freedom of action. But when my fist comes in contact with someone else's nose, that is where my freedom ends. [Laughter.]

We may have freedom of action and freedom of speech; but when a picket line is thrown up and legitimate processes of our economy are stifled through the power which has been given to unions to organize picket lines and say, "We will cut off supplies," that is where freedom ends.

If the Senator from Massachusetts had wanted to do something to correct these practices, he had the opportunity. Now we have to do our best to legislate on the floor of the Senate. We will have no other chance.

The conditions which exist need remedying. I do not want to deny the workers their rights when a majority of them want a union. I do not want to deny them freedom of speech. I want them to have freedom of speech. I do not want them to wait a year to hold another election. I want them to have the opportunity to hold an election in the intervening period.

But I am opposed to blackmail picketing. I am opposed to shakedown picketing. I am opposed to top-down organization. The only way such conditions will be corrected is by law. As I said a while ago, if these practices are not corrected, there will only be a continuation of the activities by the Dioguardis. That crowd has been exploiting employees in all sections of the country. They are racketeers and gangsters.

The Senator from Massachusetts said I saw a gangster every time I looked at a labor union. I have repeatedly said throughout the country that the great majority of labor unions and their leaders are honest. I repeat that statement. The great majority of the citizens of America are honest and law abiding. But there are a few with whom we have to deal. If we did not have laws for the protection of those who are honest as against those who are scoundrels, there would be bedlam in the United States; there would be barbarism. There would be the same thing in unionism. As I said in my opening remarks, the criminal element, the syndicated crime that is moving in and is using unionism as a vehicle, would gobble up the Meanys and those like him. The ethics codes would not stop that. Some talk about ethics to halt that crowd. Mr. President, they would laugh in our faces, and would think we were silly to mention such a thing.

I yield back the remainder of the time available to me.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, on the question of agreeing to my amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, before that question is put, I ask that the amendment to the amendment be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Ervin amendment to the McClellan amendment, as modified, will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. To the modified amendment of Mr. MCCLELLAN, Mr. ERVIN proposes the following amendment:

On page 2, in lines 4 and 5, strike out "for organizational purposes or".

Mr. ERVIN. In other words, my amendment will restrict the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas; but if his amendment is amended by my amendment, the amendment as amended will still allow peaceful picketing for the purpose of persuading others to join the union.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN] to the modified amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN]. On this question, the yeas and nays have been requested.

Is there a sufficient second?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota will state it.

Mr. MUNDT. Has all available time on the Ervin amendment to the McClellan amendment been used; or does some time remain on the question of agreeing to the McClellan amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time on the amendment has expired.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, notwithstanding the unanimous-consent agreement under which we are operating, I ask unanimous consent that each side may have 10 minutes in which to explain the pending amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I shall be glad to yield 10 minutes on the bill to any Senator who wishes to discuss further the pending question.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, may we have an explanation of the significance of the proposal to strike out the stated words of the McClellan amendment? I have not heard an explanation of the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. ERVIN. I shall be glad to explain it, Mr. President.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes on the bill to the Senator from North Carolina.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina is recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, the McClellan amendment, as now drawn, would make it an unfair labor practice to engage in organizational picketing, which is picketing designed to persuade others to join unions; and the amendment would also make it an unfair labor practice to engage in picketing to coerce or force an employer to grant recognition to a union which does not represent a majority of his employees. In my opinion, the latter should be outlawed.

But I believe that to prohibit organizational picketing, which is conducted peaceably, would be to interfere with the right of freedom of speech under the first amendment.

Violence in connection with picketing is now unlawful.

My amendment to the McClellan amendment provides, in effect, that Congress is not attempting to take away the right to picket peaceably for the purpose of persuading others to join a union.

Unless my amendment to the amendment is adopted, I believe the McClellan amendment, if adopted, would be in violation of the right of freedom of speech, because the McClellan amendment would then prohibit peaceful action to persuade others to join a union. I am sure that the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN] does not intend that. But I am convinced that the words of his amendment do exactly that.

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, would the Senator's amendment to the McClellan amendment allow those who wished to have a union organization to march up and down the street in front of the place of employment, and to carry placards reading "Join the Union"?

Mr. ERVIN. Yes.

Mr. SMATHERS. But the Senator's amendment to the McClellan amendment would prohibit so-called blackmail picketing, would it?

Mr. ERVIN. My amendment would not impair the provisions of the McClellan bill outlawing picketing to force an employer to recognize a union which does not represent a majority of the employees.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield myself 2 minutes on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts is recognized for 2 minutes on the bill.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I do not agree at all with what has just been stated. All this matter comes down to is the question of how the National Labor Relations Board will define recognition picketing, as opposed to organizational picketing.

Will the Senator from North Carolina explain what he believes the difference is?

Mr. ERVIN. Yes. I think organizational picketing is picketing which is done for the purpose of pursuading others to join a union. If such picketing is done in a peaceful and proper manner, I think the right of freedom of speech protects it.

Under the McClellan amendment, recognition picketing is picketing which is done for the purpose of forcing an employer to recognize as the bargaining agent of the employees a union which does not represent a majority of the employees.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield myself 2 minutes on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts is recognized for 2 minutes on the bill.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, the problem is to determine whether the union represents a majority of the employees. In view of the fact that the bill provides for prehearing elections, I think it would be much better to determine this question by that means.

But I must say in frankness that I do not think the Senator's amendment to strike from the McClellan amendment the words "for organizational purposes or" amounts to anything of importance, unless it is possible to show whether the union represents a majority of the employees.

So the problem comes down to the question of how to determine whether the union becomes the legitimate spokesman for the employees.

I do not believe the mere acceptance of the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas would accomplish what the Senator from Florida thinks it would.

I suggest that perhaps a much better procedure would be to provide that for a certain period of time following a legitimate election, there could not be picketing. Such a provision would accomplish what the Senator seeks to accomplish. But I do not think the amendment he proposes, in its present form, would do that.

Mr. ERVIN. If my amendment to the McClellan amendment is adopted, organizational picketing, when carried on in a peaceful and proper manner, for the purpose of persuading others to join the union would be allowed; but recognition picketing, for the purpose of forcing or requiring the employer to recognize or bargain with a particular labor organization as the representative of his employees, if the labor organization did not represent a majority of the employees, would be prohibited.

Mr. KENNEDY. How would the latter be done?

Mr. ERVIN. I have just defined it.

Mr. KENNEDY. But the Senator from North Carolina has said that the prohibition he proposes would apply only to a union which did not represent a majority of the employees. How would that be determined?

Mr. ERVIN. The purpose of my amendment to the amendment is to permit peaceable organizational picketing, but to prevent recognition picketing. Organizational picketing is picketing, conducted in a peaceful, proper manner, to persuade others to join the union. Recognition picketing is picketing which is designed to compel the employer to accept the union as the bargaining agent for the employees, regardless of whether the union represents a majority of the employees.

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator from North Carolina has accurately stated the difference. But how does he propose that the difference be determined?

Mr. ERVIN. One way—as the Taft-Hartley Act originally contemplated—would be to hold an election. But the provisions of the McClellan amendment take care of the situation in which there had not been an election, and in which recognition of the union as the bargaining agent of the employees is demanded, in violation of the spirit of the Taft-Hartley Act and its particular terms.

Mr. KENNEDY. But how would the Senator from North Carolina determine whether the union represented a majority of the employees, or whether it was merely attempting to coerce the employer?

I think the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina to the McClellan amendment needs considerable more consideration and debate.

I hope the Senate will vote on the McClellan amendment separately, and will deal with recognition picketing by means of a separate amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time available to the Senator from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. KENNEDY. I ask for 2 minutes on the bill.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts 2 minutes on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts is recognized for 2 minutes on the bill.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I suggest that the Senate vote on the McClellan amendment as it is.

If, thereafter, the Senator from North Carolina wishes to offer his amendment separately, as a means of establishing the difference between organizational picketing and representation picketing, he will then have an opportunity to submit such an amendment, and to debate it, and then to prescribe the ground rules for the determination of the existence of those two types of picketing.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, inasmuch as the yeas and nays have already been ordered on the question of agreeing to my amendment to the McClellan amendment, I should like to have the vote taken on my amendment to the amendment; because if the McClellan amendment were to be rejected, I would not have a chance to offer my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN] to the amendment, as modified, of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN].

On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered; and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. What is the pending question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendmend of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN] to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN] as modified.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. A "yea" vote would be a vote for the amendment to the amendment, and a "nay" vote would be a vote to reject it. Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. LAUSCHE. That is, a vote for the amendment which is now pending would be a partial rejection of the McClellan amendment. Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. And a "nay" vote would be at least some indication of support for the McClellan amendment. Is that correct? [Laughter.]

The legislative clerk resumed and concluded the call of the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] are absent on official business.

I also announce that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. BIBLE] is absent because of a death in his family.

I also announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR] is absent because of illness.

On this vote, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] is paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY].

If present and voting, the Senator from Arkansas would vote "yea" and the Senator from Minnesota would vote "nay."

Mr. KUCHEL. I announce that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CARLSON] is absent on official business and if present and voting, would vote "nay."

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] is necessarily absent, and, if present and voting would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 67, as follows:

So Mr. ERVIN's amendment to Mr. MCCLELLAN's amendment, as modified, was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN], as modified. On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SMATHERS (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY]. If he were present and voting, he would vote "nay." If I were at liberty to vote I would vote "yea." I therefore withhold my vote.

The rollcall was resumed and concluded.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] are absent on official business.

I also announce that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. BIBLE] is absent because of a death in his family.

I also announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR] is absent because of illness.

On this vote, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. BIBLE] is paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CARLSON].

If present and voting, the Senator from Nevada would vote "nay" and the Senator from Kansas would vote "yea."

On this vote, the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER] is paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY].

If present and voting, the Senator from Louisiana would vote "nay" and the Senator from Wisconsin would vote "yea."

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] would vote "yea."

Mr. KUCHEL. I announce that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CARLSON] is absent on official business, and is paired with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. BIBLE]. If present and voting, the Senator from Kansas would vote "yea" and the Senator from Nevada would vote "nay."

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] is necessarily absent, and is paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER]. If present and voting, the Senator from Wisconsin would vote "yea" and the Senator from Louisiana would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 59, as follows:

So Mr. MCCLELLAN'S amendment, as modified, was rejected.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask that it be stated. I might explain that it is similar to another amendment at the desk which will not be offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 59, after line 25, it is proposed to add the following new section:

SEC. 607. (a) Subsection (b) of section 8 of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is amended by striking out the word "and" at the end of paragraph (5), by striking out the period at the end of paragraph (6) and inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon and the word "and", and by adding a new paragraph as follows:

"(7) to picket or cause to be picketed, or threaten to picket or cause to be picketed, any employer with the object of forcing or requiring an employer to recognize or bargain with a labor organization as the representative of his employees, or forcing or requiring the employees of an employer to accept or select such labor organization as their collective bargaining representative—

"(A) where the employer has recognized in accordance with this Act any other labor organization and a question concerning representation may not appropriately be raised under section 9(c) of this Act; or

"(B) where within the preceding twelve months a valid election under section 9(c) of this Act has been conducted unless such labor organization has been certified as the representative of employees of such employer pursuant to such election; or

"(C) where a petition has been filed under section 9(c)(1)(A) by another labor organization or under section 9(c)(1)(B) by such employer, and such petition is pending before the Board."

(b) Subsection (1) of section 10 of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is amended by striking out the first sentence and substituting in lieu thereof the following: "Whenever it is charged that any person has engaged in an unfair labor practice within the meaning of paragraph (4)(A), (B), or (C) or paragraph 7 of section 8(b) or paragraph 2 of section 8(a), or has refused to bargain within the meaning of paragraph (5) of section 8(a) with a representative of his employees which has been certified by the Board within the preceding twelve months as such representative under the provisions of section 9, the preliminary investigation of such charge shall be made forthwith and given priority over all other cases except cases of like character in the office where it is filed or to which it is referred."

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time used for the reading of my amendment not be charged to me.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont state the number of his amendment?

Mr. PROUTY. It has no number.

Mr. KENNEDY. May I have a copy of it?

Mr. GOLDWATER. The language of the amendment of the Senator from Vermont is identical with the language contained in my amendment designated "4-23-59—C."

Mr. KENNEDY. What was the unanimous-consent request?

Mr. PROUTY. That the time used in reading the amendment not be charged to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PROUTY. On this amendment, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, I think anyone who is familiar with my background will realize that I have always tried to be friendly to organized labor and to the workingman. I have likewise tried to be fair to the employer. Today I think we are faced with a situation which requires rectification, both in the interests of the workingman and the interests of the employer.

I have had distributed a statement. I suggest that Senators who are interested in it read it, as I read it, in order that they may have a full understanding of the purpose of my amendment.

Mr. President, I yield myself 30 minutes on the amendment.

This amendment imposes certain modest limitations on organizational and recognition picketing. It does not ban or in any manner diminish the right of a union to picket for any other objective.

Under my amendment a union would be prohibited from picketing or threatening to picket an employer only where the object of such conduct was to force the employer to bargain or deal with the union or to force the employees either to join the union or to select or accept it as their collective bargaining representative. Every other kind of picketing would be absolutely unaffected by this amendment.

But even where the union picketed for either of these two objectives—recognition or organization—it would not be in violation of the law under my amendment unless the picketing occurred in at least one of the three following situations:

First. The picketed employer had recognized and signed a contract with some other perfectly legitimate union which actually represented a majority of his employees, and hence, under the Taft-Hartley Act, no election would be held by the Board until such contract had expired; or

Second. The Board had held an election during the preceding 12 months and the picketing union had either failed to win the election or even to participate in it, and had thereby also failed to demonstrate that it represented a majority of the employees of the picketed employer; or

Third. The employer or the union other than the picketing union had filed a petition for an election with the Board, and the petition was still pending before the Board. In such a situation a picket line constitutes an attempt not only to force recognition from an employer or membership or support from his employees by means of economic pressure, but it also constitutes an attempt to undercut or circumvent the machinery which the law has established through the NLRB for determining the very question which the picketing union is attempting to resolve in its own favor by economic force during the very time when the machinery of the law is already in motion.

Whenever picketing occurs under one of these three circumstances, my amendment provides that the NLRB, as it does in cases of unlawful secondary boycotts, must, simultaneously with proceeding against the picketing union through its own administrative processes, seek a temporary restraining order against such union in the Federal district court. This is to provide immediate relief to the picketed employer and his employees, who might otherwise lose both their business and jobs if they had to wait for relief until the Board issued its cease and desist order many months, sometimes even years, later.

In order to safeguard unions against any possible injustices under these provisions my amendment also provides that the NLRB must seek such immediate relief through injunctions on behalf of unions and against employers in the following two types of situations:

First. Where the picketing union charges that the picketed employer has recognized another union which he has assisted or is dominating, or has collusively contracted with the Board decides to proceed on the basis of that charge; or Second. Where a union has won an NLRB election, been certified by the NLRB, yet, nevertheless, the employer refuses or fails to bargain in good faith with it during the 12-month period following such certification by the Board.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. Suppose a small businessman has six employees who belong to no union. His employees are not organized. For the purpose of this hypothetical case, let us assume that none of the six employees wants to join a union. Would the Senator's amendment prohibit picketing in such a situation?

Mr. PROUTY. No; absolutely.

Mr. CURTIS. The amendment would offer no remedy to the small businessman having a few employees who are not organized?

Mr. PROUTY. It would certainly offer relief if an election had been held; it would not if an election had not been held.

Mr. CURTIS. But suppose there are only a few employees and no election has been held, and it is conceded that the men do not want a union.

Mr. PROUTY. That is where the question of no man's land comes into the picture. Unfortunately, a solution has not been found for that situation.

Mr. CURTIS. I wonder if the Senator from Vermont would amend the language of his amendment so that blackmail picketing could not be conducted against a small businessman, whose employees are represented by no union, and whose workers insist they do not want anything to do with a union.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont yield so that I may answer the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. In partial answer to the Senator from Nebraska, the employer, in a case such as he has cited, could ask for an election; and if the employees voted for no union, or if they voted for some other union, then, as I understand the Senator's amendment, picketing would not be allowed.

Mr. CURTIS. Could picketing be started immediately when the employer asked for an election?

Mr. PROUTY. As soon as the petition was filed.

Mr. CURTIS. As soon as the petition was filed?

Mr. PROUTY. Yes.

Mr. CURTIS. So, in the situation I have cited, if the employer asked for an election, picketing immediately would become lawful.

Mr. PROUTY. Yes.

Mr. CURTIS. That answers my question.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. PROUTY. First, I should like to summarize my statement; then I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Let me summarize briefly and in short form what the amendment actually does.

First, it prohibits organizational and recognitional picketing by one union if another union has already signed a contract with the employer.

I think this is very important. Under existing law, a union not a party to a contract would not be entitled to an election for the life of the contract, but not more than 2 years; and the employer could not recognize such a union even if he wished to, under present law. Therefore, picketing by a union not a party to the contract is an attempt to coerce an employer to do something which the law forbids him to do.

In order to protect against that situation, if the union signing the petition were company dominated, there is a provision which states, in effect, that if an employee files with the Board a charge that the union is company influenced or company dominated, the Board must handle the matter on the highest priority basis, and the activities of the union wil be subject to injunction. Second, the amendment prohibits organizational or recognition picketing for one year after a union loses an election; third, the amendment prohibits organizational or recognition picketing by another union if the union or the employer has filed with the Board a petition for an election.

At this point I should like to quote from a statement by one of the outstanding experts in this field, a professor at Harvard Law School. He attended many of the committee meetings at which the bill was discussed, and also many of the committee meetings, last year, on the Kennedy-Ives bill. He is presently on the floor, and he has assisted the committee materially in drafting this bill.

Therefore, at this time I should like to quote from a statement made by Professor Cox in the course of an address which he delivered at the Conference of Labor on December 9, 1954, I believe, in connection with the 1954 convention of the CIO. I should like to have my colleagues pay close attention to this quotation from the address by Professor Cox; and I assure them that the part I shall read has not been lifted out of context in order to create a false impression.

In the course of his address, Professor Cox said:

> I submit to you, however, that neither picketing for recognition nor organizational picketing should be permitted after the employees have signified whether in truth the union is their organization. Public resentment runs strong against unions which carry on picketing for 10 months, a year, or even 3 years, when it is plain that most of the employees do not desire to have it represent them. In such cases the union may fairly be characterized as an outsider seeking to force itself on the employees, either by compelling the employer to coerce them into the union or else by destroying the business which provides their livelihood. * * * I wonder if section 8(b)(4)(C) should not be amended, therefore, to cover "no union" votes as well as certifications.

It seems to me that the suggestion of Professor Cox is a very reasonable one, and I can only assume that if he had had his way this provision would have been in the committee bill, as it is in my amendment.

Now I yield to the distinguished Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, first, I hope the Senator from Vermont will permit me to state that I am sure his amendment is offered in good faith, and that the Senator from Vermont seeks to deal in a very genuine way with real difficulties.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, I appreciate the Senator's statement, and I assure him that that is the motivation.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I mean that very sincerely.

I find myself in great sympathy with many of the features of the amendment, particularly point No. 2, which the Senator from Vermont has mentioned—namely, that there should not be picketing if an election had been held during the preceding 12 months and if the picketing union had failed to win a majority. Under those circumstances, I think there should not be picketing in an attempt to change the minds of the workers who already had voted; and I do not think any employer or group of workers should be subjected to the strain of continuous picketing, regardless of whether the election was won or was lost.

So I wish to make clear that I am heartily in sympathy with the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, so far as his point No. 2 is concerned.

Mr. PROUTY. I am glad to hear that.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I think I am in sympathy with at least the purpose of the Senator from Vermont in connection with his point No. 1, although I am not certain that his amendment meets certain of the dangers which inevitably would develop. I grant that when the employer has signed a contract with a perfectly legitimate union which actually represents a majority of his employees, under those conditions, picketing would be undesirable. But how could one tell whether the union in question was a perfectly legitimate union which represented a majority of the employees?

Would not it be possible for the employer to sign a "sweetheart" agreement with a union which purported to represent a majority of the employees? But if no election were pending or were being held, would there be adequate protection, under point No. 1, at the bottom of the page the Senator from Vermont has read?

Mr. PROUTY. I believe there would be. Certainly that was the intention.

Mr. DOUGLAS. As I read the safeguards which are set forth in the concluding portion of the Senator's statement, picketing would be permitted not when the union charged that there was a collusive agreement, but in those cases in which the Board itself initiated the proceedings.

In view of the fact that the Board is swamped with cases, what assurance would we have that the Board would proceed, even though there was a "sweetheart" agreement?

Mr. PROUTY. This amendment requires top priority on the part of the Board. So there would not be the delay which frequently occurs in connection with cases of this nature.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Would it have precedence over the top priority given to attempts made by employers to obtain injunctions?

Mr. PROUTY. I understand it would have the same priority.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The same priority?

Mr. PROUTY. Let me read from the amendment:

> The preliminary investigation of such charge shall be made forthwith, and given priority over all other cases, except cases of like character, in the office in which it is filed or to which it is referred.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Let me ask a question about point No. 3. I understand that it outlaws organizational picketing in cases in which an election is pending.

Mr. PROUTY. That is correct.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I wonder whether the Senator from Vermont really means to provide that. Is not picketing, when properly conducted, an attempt at peaceful persuasion? But during that period the employer could hold meetings inside the plant with captive audiences and could disseminate propaganda, and thus he would have a great advantage in carrying on an election campaign.

On the other hand, the union would have to operate outside the shop; and if it were prevented from picketing, where could it plead its case?

Mr. PROUTY. I believe that a union which files a petition may picket. But another union would not be allowed to picket. However, a union which filed a petition could picket, if it so desired.

Mr. DOUGLAS. But under No. 1, on page 2 of the amendment, if the petition had been filed by the employer, and was pending before the Board, organizational picketing would also be outlawed, apparently.

I am sure the motives of the Senator from Vermont in connection with this matter are of the best; and I wonder whether he will consider changing his amendment in such a way as to meet these difficulties.

Mr. PROUTY. Let me say to the distinguished Senator from Illinois that a second union would be barred from picketing, but not the petitioning union.

Mr. DOUGLAS. But if the employer petitioned for an election, he then could carry on his propaganda inside the shop, on company time, and with a captive audience, so to speak. But under the provisions of this amendment, the union would be prevented from making an appeal to the workers as they left the plant or as they entered the plant. So it seems to me that the amendment would restrict the workers in respect to the carrying on of their case, whereas the employer would be left free.

I do not think the Senator from Vermont means to have that done. So I wonder whether he will consider changing his amendment accordingly. As I have said, I feel very strongly in favor of portions of the amendment.

Mr. PROUTY. I believe a union can picket only if it makes a demand for recognition. Obviously it never makes such a demand unless it has a majority.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes; but in cases where the employer asks for the election, even though the union may think it has a majority in the election campaign prior to the election, the employer would be left free inside the factory, but the workers would be prevented from persuading near the place of work outside the factory.

Mr. PROUTY. Let me call attention to the fact that there already exists a prehearing section in the bill as it exists at the present time.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes; but while the provisions of that section speed up the processes, they still do not make them instantaneous.

Mr. PROUTY. It seems to me in the overwhelming majority of cases it would prove very effective in bringing some of these matters to a head.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I know the Senator from Vermont wants to have a fair amendment, and I know it is sometimes difficult to make these points on the floor of the Senate, but I ask him to consider these points very carefully.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, I was interested in the questions which the Senator from Illinois has asked, and I join with him in the assurance that the Senator from Vermont wishes to direct his amendment to the evil which is asserted respecting organizational picketing. I have read some of the cases on this subject. I do not wish to give the impression of discussing these questions from a legal viewpoint alone, but I wish to direct my remarks to the rights involved.

I call the Senator's attention to these situations, first in regard to subparagraph (A) of the Senator's amendment: Let us assume labor organization A is picketing an employer. Under the provisions of subparagraph (A), labor organization B could not picket the employer if labor organization A has been validly accredited or recognized as the bargaining representative, either by having secured a majority or by a valid election.

Mr. PROUTY. That is correct.

Mr. COOPER. That seems to me to be a reasonable proposition.

Now let us consider subparagraph (B). It goes to the right of a union to picket peacefully. Let us assume we are dealing with a case, under subparagraph (B), in which the employees have exercised their right, under the Taft-Hartley Act, to refrain from joining or selecting a union as their representative. That is a right the employees have. The amendment says that for 12 months there can be no peaceful picketing of the employer.

Let us assume that after 3 or 4 months the union, by means other than picketing, as a result of talks with the workers, peaceful persuasion, meetings with them, has secured a majority. Whereas ordinarily under the present law the workers would then have a right to picket because they have a majority, subparagraph (B) would prevent them from picketing the employer to secure the recognition which they have a right to have. Is that clear?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes.

Mr. PROUTY. Let me explain to my distinguished friend the Senator from Kentucky that once a union wins an election, the Board operates on the presumption that for a period of a year the majority of the employees want the union to be their representative. The Board will permit no rival union to picket in an effort to organize the plant or conduct an election. If a union is rejected, the Board cannot conduct another election for a year.

That is only logical, because once the employees reject a union, there should be a corresponding presumption that for 1 year they do not desire to be represented by a union. However, and I think this is most important, under the present law, even after a union loses an election and is not entitled to another election within a year, it still may continue to harass an employer and its workers with picketing tactics.

I could cite a case of this nature, but I do not wish to take the time now to do so. There are many such cases.

Mr. COOPER. I do not think that is a parallel case. In the case cited by the Senator there had been an election and a union had been recognized and had obtained a contract. So the Board has ruled that for 12 months that contract cannot be disturbed.

I am referring to a situation in which, by means other than picketing, a majority of the employees have decided they want the union to represent them. The amendment provides that even if that is the fact, the employees cannot themselves exercise their right, which they now enjoy, or which employees have enjoyed in other cases to picket peacefully.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. KEATING. The Senator from Kentucky is probably better informed than I am on this subject, but I believe under the present labor law once an election has been held and the employees have selected, for example, union A to represent them in a plant, there is nothing which union B, or the members which belong to union B, the heretofore minority, can do, anyway, for 12 months.

It does not seem to me that to bar union B from picketing a plant for a 12-month period deprives it of any rights which would otherwise be effective, because even if the employees changed their minds, during the 3 or 4 months' period, in the peaceful manner the Senator from Kentucky has outlined, there would be nothing union B could do to organize the plant or have an election before the 12-month period ended. Is that correct.

Mr. COOPER. That is correct. That situation is taken care of in subparagraph (A). I am now talking about subparagraph (B), concerning cases where the employees have exercised their right, under the Taft-Hartley law, to refrain from selecting a union as their representative. Subparagraph (B) applies to cases in which employees have said, in effect, in an election, "We do not want a union, or this union, to represent us."

The Senator has stated that if the employees have made a decision, the union cannot picket for a period of 12 months. Three or four months later the union may be able to demonstrate to the NLRB—and the union must demonstrate that fact to the NLRB—that a majority of the employees want the union to be their representative. The Senator has said that even though a majority of the employees then desire union recognition, and are entitled to it, they cannot picket to secure such recognition. Such a restriction would go beyond the present law.

Mr. KEATING. As I understand, that is the law today. If an election is held, and the employees vote to have no union represent them, another election cannot be held in that plant for another 12 months.

Mr. COOPER. The law today, as I understand it, is unsettled. The National Labor Relations Board has recently issued an opinion on this point but its opinion has been reversed by the Court of Appeals. The case is now on its way to the Supreme Court. Regardless of what is before the courts today, I am talking about a matter of substance, which is that the purpose of the act is to permit employees to have the right to join or not to join a union.

If the employees, by a majority vote, have selected a union, then under the law they have the right to act peacefully to secure recognition. The point I am making is that subsection (b) would go beyond the present law and in that way would take away the right. I should like to find a method to reach the exact point with which I think everyone wants to deal, namely, to prevent picketing to compel an employer to recognize a union when his employees, exercising their right to refrain from joining a union, have said, "We do not want to join a union."

However, under subsection (b), even though there is a case in which the employees have selected a union, they could not picket. I do not think that would be a proper prohibition. I am arguing on the basis of principle and substance. Unless that provision is changed, I could not vote for the amendment. I could offer an amendment to the amendment which I think would reach the point.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. KEATING. I was going to inquire of the distinguished Senator from Kentucky whether he thinks a change could be made which would cure that defect. I find myself in considerable sympathy with what the Senator says, in a case where the employees have voted for no union, and in a perfectly proper manner, without picketing or anything else, they are persuaded within a 12-month period to join a union. In that case a year is probably to long, and under those circumstances they should not be barred from picketing if they think it proper and desirable.

My support of the second section was based upon an understanding to the effect that after an election is held and the employees have voted for no union they could not have a vote for a 12-month period. I understand that is the decision of the court of appeals. Is that correct?

Mr. COOPER. That refers to a case in which the employees have selected a union. Subsection (b) deals with the situation where the employees have said, "We do not want a union." The argument is not analogous or parallel.

Mr. KEATING. Does the Senator from Kentucky have any language to suggest?

Mr. COOPER. Yes; I can offer some language.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Vermont has expired.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, does the Senator from Vermont desire more time?

Mr. PROUTY. I would appreciate it if the distinguished Senator from Arizona would yield me 10 minutes. There seems to be considerable interest in and cooperation for the amendment.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I yield 10 minutes on the bill.

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont yield for a question?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. SMATHERS. As I understand the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, it provides that once an election has been held, and after the result of the election has been determined, in case the result is that no union will be joined, there can be no further picketing on the particular employer's premises until 12 months have expired.

Mr. PROUTY. The Senator is correct.

Mr. SMATHERS. That is all the amendment provides?

Mr. PROUTY. That is all it would do.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. SMATHERS. I should like to observe that it seems to me it would be only fair so to provide. In my particular section of the country the unions have often endeavored to organize the hotels. When elections have been held and the unions have not won the elections, a short time later they go into the street and actually picket in such force and numbers that the people who come to spend the winter, or a few months to enjoy themselves, have to walk through the picket lines. The situation becomes so intense that finally the employer says, "I will do anything to get you fellows out of the way." That is a process of using economic power to stop somebody in the proper operation of his business.

To me, this seems to be a very reasonable and sensible provision. If there is an election and if the union loses the election, as anybody who loses an election must do, the union should wait a certain time for another election. There should be some reasonable time provided.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. PROUTY. I will say for the benefit of the distinguished Senator from Florida that Professor Cox also agrees with the Senator's attitude and with my position in this matter. He says:

> I submit to you that neither picketing for recognition nor organizational picketing should be permitted after the employees have signified whether in truth the union is their organization. Public resentment runs strong against unions which carry on picketing—

In such a situation. That is a quotation from his remarks.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORSE. I should like to have the attention of the Senator from Florida, because my question relates to his comment.

What the Senator from Florida had to say takes on an entirely different light if we ask the question, "Was it a fair election? Did the union lose the election because of unfair practices on the part of the employer?"

It is possible the employer made very clear, by way of intimidation, that if the employees voted for the union they would be out of their jobs. The employer may have used other unfair labor practices in order to prevent the employees from voting for the union.

My question is this: Does the amendment of the Senator from Vermont authorize the General Counsel of the Board to ask for a mandatory injunction whenever in his opinion there is a prima facie case which causes him to believe that in all probability an unfair labor practice charge will stand against the employer? Or does the amendment simply select certain possible unfair labor practice charges? If so, why not strengthen the amendment, as I think it would be strengthened, by providing that the General Counsel may proceed to get a mandatory injunction whenever he is satisfied that a prima facie case exists against the employer in respect to any unfair labor practice which may have affected the election?

Mr. PROUTY. I will say to the distinguished Senator, I think the two instances we have selected are those which occur most frequently. As the Senator knows, I am not an expert in the labor field, and I am not a lawyer, but I have tried to learn as much about this problem as I could during the few weeks I have had the pleasure and privilege of serving on the committee.

It seems to me, from what I can learn from the experts, that perhaps these cases are not so important as one might think at first.

I wish to point out also that these elections have to be valid elections.

Mr. MORSE. Of course, we would not know whether they were valid until there was a conclusion of a case on an unfair labor practice charge.

I want the Senator to know that I should like to work something out with him on this subject, but I do not think the Senator has selected for his mandatory injunction procedures the most common unfair labor practices on the part of employers. Those are the dismissals ahead of the election in order to intimidate the workers, and the type of intimidation by which the employer, by various indirections, makes clear to his workers, "If you want a job you had better see to it that you do not vote for the union."

What I would suggest is that the Senator agree to some language in the amendment which would provide for the mandatory injunction power on the part of the General Counsel whenever he thinks the record of the case shows that the employer might have been guilty of an unfair labor practice.

Mr. PROUTY. I appreciate the Senator's comments very much.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROUTY. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] a question.

In connection with the last recommendation of the Senator from Oregon, would he also include an authorization to the Attorney General to bring injunction proceedings against picketing when he concludes that there has been a fair election?

Mr. MORSE. Does the Senator mean the General Counsel of the Board?

Mr. LAUSCHE. The General Counsel, yes. If he is required to bring injunctive proceedings against the employer when there have been unfair labor practices, should he not also be authorized to bring action against the union for picketing when he concludes that there has been a fair election?

Mr. MORSE. I am a great believer in mutuality.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont. I send it to the desk and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, line 20, after the word "election" it is proposed to insert "or has been designated or selected for the purposes of collective bargaining by the majority of the employees in a unit appropriate for such purposes, pursuant to section 9(a)."

Mr. COOPER. This amendment would deal with the situation which I discussed a few moments ago. I have already explained its purpose. Suppose in an election the employees exercise their right and say, "We do not want to select this union as our bargaining representative. We do not want a union." But in 3 or 4 months, by means other than picketing, the union is able to persuade the majority of the employees that it should be their representative. In other words, that is what the employees wish, and a majority have selected the particular union. Then I think it would be reasonable, in the light of the intent of the act, to say that they have the right peacefully to picket the employer in an effort to secure recognition of the union.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. Does not the point which the Senator makes illustrate one of the hypotheticals to which I alluded, namely, an employer using unfair labor practices? The members voted against the union, and within the next 30 or 60 days, in talking among themselves, they say, "He did a job on us. He took advantage of us. The time has come to make it clear to him that we are going to have a union."

Then the picket line is stretched. Under the Prouty amendment, they would have to wait 12 months. What I am suggesting is that the Senator from Vermont include a mandatory injunction provision with respect to the General Counsel, in regard to all the unfair labor practices of the union. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE] has suggested that there be mutuality. Under the provision suggested, the General Counsel would have power to act against the union; but we should protect the union in the type of case which has been described.

Mr. PROUTY. Let me say to the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Oregon that I am prepared to accept the language of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield.

Mr. SMATHERS. Would the Senator also agree to accept the language proposed by the Senator from Ohio, so as to result in the mutuality which the Senator from Oregon himself admitted was needed?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Vermont has expired.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I suggest that the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts yield some of his time. He has 30 minutes. Much of this colloquy has been in opposition to the amendment. I suggest that he show his usual generosity and yield a little time.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield 10 minutes to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. PROUTY. I thank the distinguished Senator.

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, I wonder if I may finish what I was saying.

Mr. PROUTY. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. SMATHERS. Obviously, if there has been an honest election, there is no unfair labor practice. I believe what the Senator started to do in the first place was to protect the employer as well as the employee, in a case in which there had been an honest election, and in which the union had lost the election. It is not fair or proper that the union, after losing an election, should begin to establish a picket line in front of the hotel or other establishment, and, in effect, try to browbeat the employer into making some concessions to the union to which it would not be entitled as a result of the election.

Mr. PROUTY. It is my understanding that they would not be allowed to picket under those circumstances.

Mr. SMATHERS. That is correct. The Senator from Kentucky has offered an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont which would permit them to picket within less than 12 months if they could establish the fact that some unfair labor practice had been indulged in.

Mr. KEATING. Only if it were established that in the interim a majority of the employees had joined the union which desired to picket. Only under such circumstances could a picket line be established.

Mr. SMATHERS. I think the amendment is a good one.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, I accept the language proposed by the distinguished Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. KENNEDY. What is the question?

Mr. PROUTY. I ask unanimous consent to accept the amendment proposed by the distinguished Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, reserving the right to object—and I shall not object—I believe the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] should have a moment to decide what questions he wishes to ask.

Mr. KENNEDY. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont a couple of questions.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may suggest the absence of a quorum without the time occupied by the rollcall being taken from the time of either side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield 7 minutes to the senior Senator from Oregon on the bill.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I should like to have the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts for a moment. I am about to make a legal argument on the various organizational picketing amendments while Senators try to reach an understanding on the priority amendment. The majority leader has yielded me 7 minutes on the bill in which to make my statement.

I support the language of the Kennedy bill on all forms of picketing without change.

I should like to address myself to what I consider to be the single most important labor relations issue before this body, and before the country, a challenge to the labor movement of major dimensions.

The challenge arises in many forms in the various amendments even now on the table—the challenge of curbs on peaceful organizational picketing.

This is an issue which should not be considered in a context of stamping out crime, of preventing a ruthless and powerful labor organization from exacting a tribute from small employers and their employees. It is, instead, an issue involving a basic right of labor to protest with a historic and legally approved economic practice.

We are asked to enact amendments which will make it an unfair labor practice for a union to picket or threaten to picket with the object of forcing an employer to bargain under varying circumstances. The true thrust of these amendments is to prohibit traditional and proper union activity in organizing employees and securing recognition. But it prohibits without regard to what the employer has done before the picketing started, and without regard to the threat of nonunion employees to undermine the working conditions obtained through organization.

That is the type of fact situation that is before the Senate at this very moment under the Prouty amendment. It is necessary for us to provide protection for the union against an employer who has used unfair labor practices in an attempt to beat an election. And once the election has been beaten, it is then proposed that the union cannot proceed for another year to picket, even though the employer used all sorts of intimidation. He may have fired some of his employees before the election so as to make clear to the others that if they vote for the union they also will be fired. To call picketing resulting from the intimidating practices of an employer extortion or blackmail picketing exposes either unenlightened thinking or intentional mischief designed to curb one of labor's basic rights.

Certainly, the employees in such an intimidation case can bring an action before the National Labor Relations Board on the ground of unfair labor practices; but it will take a long time—at least several months—to have it decided. In the meantime, the employer is allowed to get by with his tactics of intimidation.

I am making a plea for the protection of the right of free men and women in this country to organize themselves into unions so as to stop that kind of unfair labor practices.

To call the picketing which has been talked about in the Senate this afternoon extortion or blackmail picketing, I think, misses the point entirely. I think it simply recognizes the failure to understand the kind of problems which face unions which are trying to organize in the face of the opposition of antilabor employers.

We are here talking about peaceful picketing—violent picketing or mass picketing is banned by the Taft-Hartley Act and subject to restraint by State courts in the exercise of their police power.

We are talking about a basic constitutional right to communicate; and while peaceful picketing is no longer considered to be an absolute expression of free speech, it is the single means of communication available to workers and their representatives.

In very much the same way that picketing has more effects than ordinary verbal expression, so the employer's speech to his employees, his heart-to-heart talk to employees before an election, his prophecies and predictions which the Labor Board recognizes as free speech—these also have a force independent of persuasion. We do not prohibit the employer's utterances because of their independent force; nor should we prohibit peaceful picketing. Both are a form of free speech in a context of uneasy balance—where perhaps there is abuse by some strong unions and most employers, but where the dangers to upsetting the delicate balance dictates extreme care.

We are asked then to curb the exercise by workers of their constitutional right of free speech expressed through peaceful picketing. And we are asked to curb it in an area where there can be no question that it serves a horoughly legitimate purpose. Organizational picketing is as old as the labor movement. The valid reason for its being is elementary economics and hornbook law.

I do not intend to discuss all the cases, but I shall place enough in the record to cover the point I want to stress, as I see it. We are dealing with a whole body of American law handed down by the courts in protecting the precious constitutional rights of labor which I rise to defend this afternoon.

The nonunion status of any firm is always a threat to the welfare of organized labor and its unionization is therefore always a proper end of trade union activity.

> Unions obviously are concerned not to have union standards undermined by nonunion shops (International Brotherhood of Teamsters v. Hanke, 339 U.S. 470, 475). The interdependence of economic interest of all engaged in the same industry has become a commonplace (American Federation of Labor v. Swing, 12 U.S. 321, 326).

For union organization to be "at all effective, employees must make their combination extend beyond one shop. It is helpful to have as many as may be in the same trade in the same community united, because, in the competition between employers, they are bound to be affected by the standard of wages of their trade in the neighborhood. Therefore, they may use all lawful propaganda to enlarge their membership, and especially among those whose labor at lower wages will injure their whole guild."

Who said that? Not the senior Senator from Oregon. That is from the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of American Steel Foundries v. Tri-City Central Trades Council, 257 U.S. 184, 209.

Now listen further to these words from landmark Supreme Court decisions:

> In order to render a labor combination effective it must eliminate the competition from nonunion goods, an elimination of price competition based on differences in labor standards is the objective of any national labor organization (Apex Hosiery Co. v. Leader, 310 U.S. 469, 503).

Indeed, the policy of the Taft-Hartley Act is based on explicit recognition that an evil against which the statute is directed is "preventing the stabilization of competitive wage rates and working conditions within and between industries"—section 1, paragraph 2. In the long run, to deprive organized workers of the means of competing with unorganized workers, dooms their objective to defeat.

Now let us return to the details of some of the amendments and what is wrong with them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Oregon has expired.

Mr. MORSE. May I have 2 more minutes?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield 2 more minutes to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORSE. These amendments seek to curb picketing after a union loses an election. That is the aim of the Prouty amendment now before the Senate.

This has considerable superficial appeal to those of us who are accustomed to abide by the decision of the ballot box. It may also appeal to others who, assuming a state of affairs which exists only rarely, conceive an employee's rejection of unionism as the result of his reasoned weighing of the arguments underlying realities for and against. But let us examine more.

Second. Such amendments would apply to prevent picketing irrespective of the employer's countermeasures. They would, for instance, ban picketing where the purpose was to advertise that, while the union lost a Board election, it did so because the employer exercised his rights of free speech and thus filled the air with such dire prophecies that the employees voted against the union.

Third. In the event the union chanced to consent to an election despite the employer's illegal conduct—because it takes several years to remedy violations of the statute—the union would be foreclosed from raising these violations as objections to the election. Under these circumstances, the election might be thought of as valid and any picketing for organization would be banned.

Fourth. It would appear, based upon the National Labor Relations Board's own decisions, that in most circumstances the ban against organizational and recognition picketing would, as a practical matter of fact, be construed to constitute a ban against all kinds of protest picketing after an election—see the various cases set forth in the hearings at pages 371–400. Certainly if the intent of these amendments is otherwise, it should be made very clear.

For instance, would these amendments permit the union after it lost an election to picket for these substantial reasons: (a) To persuade customers to patronize establishments paying better wages; (b) to protest antiunion propaganda issued by the employer; (c) to protest the discharge of union leaders; and (d) to protest various kinds of working conditions such as excessive workloads, lack of sick leave benefits, and so forth.

Fifth. By providing for a mandatory injunction—as nearly all these amendments do—the Board's General Counsel would have no discretion to decline the use of this extraordinary remedy even if he is reluctant to do so. He is therefore forced to use an artillery shell to kill a mouse. He is forced to use the remedy without regard to the equities involved. He must, for instance, give top priority to an employer's charge against a union and obtain an injunction even though the employer had embarked upon a large-scale campaign of unfair labor practices. In the meantime, the union's charge against the employer would be doomed to proceed in due course for several years. I know that this would be the procedure because this is the way it has worked under the Taft-Hartley Act. The Secretary of Labor's vagueness on this point when he appeared before the committee—see the hearings at page 343—makes apparent his unfamiliarity with NLRB procedures. A violation of a part of the act requiring mandatory injunctions compels an injunction against the union despite violations of the nonmandatory sections of the act committed by the employer. If the Board's General Counsel is to use his discretion and seek an injunction against such an employer and thus consolidate the cases, then we should be told so. A memorandum appears in the hearings at pages 400–407 discussing this problem. If indeed this is the intent, such amendment might properly contain an additional appropriation to cover the cost of an expansion program in the injunction branch of the NLRB. To say again what I said before, the thrust of these amendments ignores what the employer has done before the picketing started.

Labor law in America reflects increasing awareness that no sound economic theory permits free market thinking to be applied to wages and working conditions, as it is to prices. In the absence of collective bargaining the wage market is a fiction for wages and working conditions are established unilaterally by the employer. Competition among workers against each other for jobs produces not fair wages, but sweatshops; not increased productivity, but depressions. Society should not, under the guise of preserving freedom to compete, force them to bear the competitive burden which an entrepreneur, in hope of profit, voluntarily assumes. In modern industrial society, meaningful economic freedom for the vast majority of employees can be attained not through individual, but from collective action.

This was the reasoning behind Congress' declaration in 1914 in the Clayton Act that "the labor of a human being is not a commodity or article of commerce" and that labor unions shall not "be held or construed to be illegal combinations in restraint of trade under the antitrust laws." That declaration reflected recognition that "to render a labor combination effective it must eliminate the competition from non-union-made goods," and that elimination of price competition based on differences in labor standards is the objective of any national labor organization. Once the purpose of employee combination was thus recognized, sanction of the conventional tactics of organized labor in its effort to improve its material conditions followed inevitably. These tactics, peaceful primary picketing are the only civilized means through which organized workers can safeguard their own wages and working conditions against the competition of unorganized workers; the only way—short of governmental wage fixing—through which price competition based on differences in labor costs can be eliminated To deprive organized workers of these means of competing with unorganized workers dooms their objective to defeat.

Once we recognize that establishment of uniform wages and hours through collective bargaining as desirable, common sense should accept peaceful tactics by which unions traditionally seek in their own self-interest, to enlist nonmembers. Those who choose to work as nonunionists, by that very choice, tend to defeat and undermine the economic interests of union members in maintaining good wages and working conditions for themselves. In defense of their own economic position and in the face of varying shades of employer hostility, union members should accordingly be free to utilize such economic power as they possess to persuade employees of the value of their cause.

Freedom of choice of workers in the area of unionization, which some would transform into the central fact of labor policy, is unquestionably an attractive and serviceable principle. Few will disagree that freedom of employees to join unions should be protected from economic coercion by the employer. But prohibition of employer coercion is justified by considerations which are wholly inapplicable to the organizational tactics of unions. When the employer utilizes his power to persuade or control over jobs to defeat unionization, he takes advantage of his superior position to prevent his employees from obtaining even relative equality of bargaining power with him. But union members and nonunion members who are engaged in the same industry, trade, craft, or occupation are in competition with each other. Therefore, where the majority of a unit refuses despite lower wage standards to join a union for reasons unfathomable, the unit as a whole remains in competition with organized units in the industry. To forbid union members to attach economic consequences to such refusals—by peaceful picketing—would change the law in favor of nonunionism and create a sanctuary behind which incessant undermining of union standards would proceed with immunity.

More importantly, we all know that individuals or groups who reject unionization do not do so out of rational conviction that their economic interests will be better served by individual than by collective bargaining. Employees strongly suspect that their employer is antiunion and that by joining or voting for a union they will incur his hostility and invite reprisal. Moreover, under the law, employers are left free to exploit that fear by making their opposition to unionization explicit. Employees do not reach an objective basis for decision. When to the more subtle pressures the employer adds threats, discriminatory discharges, and so forth, even those few employees who are most convinced of the advantages of unionization are often unable to resist. Such overt employer pressure is illegal, but the legal remedy, at best, comes far too late, and it is far too risky to offer real assurance to an employee whose livelihood is at stake. Only economic counterpressure from the union can begin to even the scales. To outlaw such union pressure in organizational campaigns would thus tend to destroy, rather than to create, actual freedom of choice by employees.

I have endeavored to cover this subject with more than usual thoroughness—the legal background, the economic foundations, and the practical everyday procedures involving the dangers to curbing organizational picketing.

Mr. President, what I am pleading for is the protection of that great body of labor rights already handed down by the Supreme Court of the United States. I am pleading for the adoption by the Senate of only those amendments which provide for the principle of mutuality, about which I spoke 10 minutes ago on the floor of the Senate.

So far as the Prouty amendment is concerned, for example, it does not bring all unfair labor practices on the part of an employer under the mandatory injunctive power of the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board. It does not meet the test of mutuality. What the Prouty amendment does, let me warn the Senate, is to select only certain employer practices which come under the mandatory injunctive processes and powers of the General Counsel. It plays into the hands of the antiunion employer. Under the Prouty amendment the employer may proceed to break a union by way of using unfair labor practices before the election is held. We are making a great mistake in the way we are proceeding here on the floor of the Senate in drafting the Prouty amendment. That is how we can make horrendous mistakes in legislating.

I hope that in the conference which is taking place on the other side of the Chamber an agreement for mutuality will be reached. I hope an agreement in which just certain unfair employer labor practices will not be selected but that all unfair employer practices will be covered. Likewise I am for covering unfair practices by the unions too.

The intimidation devices which employers use, and to which I have referred earlier this afternoon, include employer labor blacklists, by means of which it is made perfectly clear that if the employee votes for a union, he will find himself without credit in the community. Mr. President, in a really antilabor community, the intimidation devices which are used to prevent men and women from organizing themselves for collective-bargaining purposes are really shocking.

So I say we should go slowly and carefully in dealing with the compromise. Let us make sure that we do not seek to override the great body of U.S. Supreme Court decisions in connection with the rights of free labor in America.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether he is ready to proceed.

Mr. KENNEDY. I hope that in a few minutes we shall be able to obtain an agreement on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, at this time I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I appreciate the remarks which have been made by the distinguished Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE]. I think he is perfectly correct when he says we must proceed cautiously in this field, because of the possible effect on the basic rights of free speech.

However, I do not think any Member of the Senate will disagree with the thesis that we must take some action to stop coercive picketing when the whole purpose is to organize from the top down, without the consent of the employees.

Mr. President, I have recognized the difficulties which we encounter in drafting an amendment to cover this particular point. I hope some such provision will be worked out, because I honestly do not believe that we can call this measure a labor reform bill unless it contains some provisions in regard to abolition of the malpractices which have been disclosed before the McClellan committee.

I do not know what form the amendment should take. But certainly reasonable men can proceed in a reasonable way to reach a conclusion which will enable the employees to have their rights.

I recognize the validity of what the Senator from Oregon has said about abuses pacticed by employers on employees. I realize that such things happen in this country. Certainly we do not condone them, any more than we condone the action of a union official in abusing an employer to such an extent that the employer, in turn, will permit the union official to bring the employees into his union.

But it seems to me that we must also think of the employees who do not wish to belong to a union—for instance, a group of employees who feel that they are being treated as well by their employer as they would be under any other circumstances, including the circumstances of union membership, and who, after having met together, decide that they do not wish to belong to a union. They may have reasons other than the fact that they are perfectly happy with the conditions provided by the employer; for instance, they may not like the affiliation of the union, because today unions are affiliated with politics; or they may not like the economic philosophy of the leader of their particular local. In connection with such situations, we get into the area of the right of association which, along with the right of free speech, is guaranteed in the first amendment of the Constitution.

So I believe we have a responsibility to provide protection in the specific fields which the committee has shown need protection.

I wish to make perfectly clear that I, together with my distinguished friend, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], recognize the extremely delicate and touchy nature of the field in which we are operating. But I repeat that if we do not take any action in this field, I do not see how we can call this measure a labor-reform bill.

I also hope we will make some provision in the field of secondary boycotts.

BLACKMAIL PICKETING

Mr. President, the so-called "friends of labor" in the Senate, when forced by the findings of the McClellan committee to be somewhat critical of union practices, always couple employers as being equally guilty. We hear, for example, of "sweetheart" contracts between employers and unions, whereby employees are forced to pay dues, but receive no better wages or working conditions. We hear of many labor-management contracts where the employees do not want a union, and have, in fact, rejected the union in a secret-ballot election. In almost all of these cases the contract is one wherein membership in the union is compulsory.

But even if we agree to every provision of the various union reform bills, including the committee bill, we shall have done absolutely nothing to prevent contracts of such kinds. No law will make union members vote against the union bosses, so long as the bosses have the power to compel membership and to threaten, coerce, and inflict economic and physical injury upon a worker and his family.

No law against racketeering and embezzlement will prevent an employer from entering into "sweetheart" contracts or other contracts with unions which have no members among his employees, so long as unions have the complete power to prevent the owner from using his own property, as well as the power to drive the employer out of business.

If this Congress refuses to do anything about recognition and organizational picketing, the hearings and the executive sessions of the Senate Labor Committee will have been a complete waste. If we close our eyes to the evils of recognition picketing, the hundreds of thousands of dollars and the years spent by the McClellan committee on its hearings will also prove to have been a complete waste.

Employees are free to join unions; since 1935, the Government has been protecting that right. The law says the employees also have a legal right not to join unions; but the Government has done absolutely nothing to protect and enforce that right.

The fate of personal freedoms in labor relations is at stake. Individual liberty is threatened, if not already destroyed, by the formidable and unbridled power of unions to intimidate employees and to coerce business.

This amendment is in the interest of small business and its employees. Big business is almost entirely unionized. Unions have found it more difficult to organize in small business, in the retail and service trades, on the main streets of America. There, the relationship between employer and employee is of a more personal nature. The employees often believe they have more to gain by speaking for themselves than by calling in a union to speak for them. They are closer to the business, and have an understanding of the ability of their employer to pay or not to pay increased benefits. Many of them are white-collar workers, and are traditionally reluctant to join unions .

Yet, it is this group which is more susceptible to recognition picketing than any other. This is true because recognition picketing always causes great losses in business, if not a complete shutdown. Many small businesses cannot operate if deliveries to their place of business are stopped. Thus, the Teamsters Union can bring any small business to a halt, if it is the union that is seeking recognition, or if it is cooperating with the union that is seeking recognition, by placing a picket line around the place of business. Small business is also especially vulnerable because it does not have the means of standing firm for long periods of time. Even if the small businessman is able to obtain deliveries because the Teamsters cross the picket line or because he is able to obtain delivery in some other manner than by means of unionized trucking companies, he may still see his business ruined. If he is in the retail or service business, he is almost sure to lose customers. Some people will not cross picket lines, regardless of the purpose of the picket line, as a matter of principle. Others will not cross picket lines as a matter of convenience. If the potential customer can satisfy his wants elsewhere, he will do so, in preference to enduring the jeers and catcalls which so often accompany the picket line. The businessman knows that business lost to a competitor is seldom regained. His alternatives are to force his employees to join the union or to face bankruptcy.

The employees of a business which is being picketed may be coerced into joining the union either by their employer or directly. If the business is retail or service, the loss to them is reflected in the amount of their sales. The effect of a picket line on the employee is much more than peaceful persuasion. If he goes through the picketline, the union labels him a "scab," which in union circles is the lowest form of life. Consequently, he may be coerced into staying at home, in the interests of his future job status, and to protect his own health and that of his family. Thus, there is no freedom of choice for the employees who are faced by recognition or organizational picketing.

The law provides an orderly way for a union to organize any business. By the use of handbills, meetings, home visits, and so forth, the union can obtain a majority of the employees as members. It then petitions the National Labor Relations Board for an election. The election is by secret ballot, and the employer is forbidden to interfere, restrain, or coerce his employees in their exercise of their choice. If the union wins the election, the employer is required by law to bargain with it. Having provided a lawful, orderly means of securing union recognition, the Government should insist that that process, and no other, be followed.

Our liberal friends argue that the union needs the picket line, or order to organize the sweatshop or the shop of the substandard employer. The answer is obvious: The employees of an employer of that type can be organized quickly and easily by the traditional method of handbills, meetings, and home visits.

Our friends refer to the possibility that the employer will destroy the union majority, by discharging the union adherents. Here, the law provides many remedies. Such employees are entitled to reinstatement and back pay for the time they have lost; and the Labor Board will secure it for them. The Labor Board will also set aside the election in such cases, and will order another election. If the union can prove it had a majority before the discharges occurred, the Labor Board may order the employer to bargain with the union without having another election.

With these arguments answered, our union-minded colleagues fall back on the old chestnut—that the matter needs further study. The evils of recognition and organizational picketing have been presented for many years in the hearings of committees of both Houses of Congress. We suspect that the matter will, in the opinion of some, need further studying until every reluctant employee in America has been coerced into joining a union. Perhaps that is what our liberal friends really want. If so, it would be more honest to pass a law requiring everyone to join a union.

Union leaders claim that this type of picketing is to inform the employees and the public that the employer is not operating according to union standards; that it is to advertise to the employees that their employer is not treating them in a right and proper way. They call it a method of peacefully persuading employees to join the union. For many years our courts listened to this contention, but now the courts and the public know that any picket line in front of a place of business exerts pressure and is coercive on both the employer and the employees.

Some try to mislead us by attempting to differentiate between "organizational" picketing and "recognition" picketing. It does not make any difference what it is called; the purpose is to compel the employer to sign a contract with the union.

Since the law requires, and will compel, the employer to bargain with a union which represents a majority of his employees, a strong argument may even be made for outlawing picketing by a union which has demonstrated its majority status. The amendment does not do this. Recognition picketing is banned in only a limited number of situations in the case of a union which has not proved its majority status.

The committee bill completely ignores the problem, and could easily mislead by banning a type of blackmail picketing which rarely occurs. It makes it unlawful to picket for personal profit. In such cases the union does not want recognition or a contract. If Congress accepts this provision, it may be construed as tacitly approving the kind of recognition picketing which our amendment seeks to prevent.

Recognition picketing is discussed on pages 74 to 78 of the report. The discussion is equally applicable to this amendment. I urge all Members of the Senate to read that section of the report before they vote on the pending amendment.

My amendment would make section 10(l) of present law applicable to the types of recognition picketing it seeks to prevent. Section 10(l) is sometimes referred to as the mandatory-injunction provision. This is a misnomer, in that the provision does not require the NLRB to seek an injunction every time a party claims a violation of the secondary-boycott provisions. Under present law, section 10(l) applies only to secondary-boycott cases and, to a lesser degree, to jurisdictional strikes. The provision does require the Board to seek injunctive relief in secondary-boycott cases in which the Board's regional office "has reasonable cause to believe such charge is true and that a complaint should issue." As a matter of practice, the Board has required a number of additional safeguards against indiscriminate use of the injunctive process. All petitions for injunctions must be approved by the Washington office of the Board, rather than just the regional office. The case is ordinarily handled by an attorney sent out by the Washington office of the Board's General Counsel. Injunctions are never sought without adequate notice and time for the opposing party to be heard. Several weeks' time elapses between the filing of the charge by the injured party and the petition for injunctive relief. This time lag is required by the regional office investigation, the Board's consideration of the regional office recommendation, and preparation of the necessary papers.

We gave some consideration to use of the discretionary injunction provided in section 10(j) of present law, as a sanction for violation of the restrictions on recognition picketing. We rejected that route, because a study of Board cases demonstrates that section 10(j) is almost never used, and is used in only the most extreme cases. In other words, the Board will not seek injunctions unless there is a congressional mandate that it do so.

Recognition picketing requires the same sanctions as secondary boycotts, if its use is to be curtailed. Like secondary boycotts, its prolonged use forces the employer to go out of business or to force his employees to join the union. Recognition picketing is at least a first cousin to the secondary boycott, in that pressure is applied to one party, to force him to apply pressure upon a third party, the employees.

The need for expedited action is illustrated by the Curtis case to which I have previously referred. The NLRB decision holding recognition picketing to be a violation of present law came down on October 30, 1957, after 2 years of such picketing. The picketing continued. Just this week the Supreme Court granted certiorari in this case. This means that a final decision on the matter may be expected in approximately 4 years from the time when the picketing began. The Curtis Co. is located in Anacostia, just a few miles from the Capitol. If any Senator wishes to take the time to do so, I believe he can still go over there and see the pickets. The Curtis Co. has been able to continue in business because it has been able to secure furniture in some other manner than through deliveries by trucks driven by members of the Teamsters Union. Few small employers have been so fortunate when faced by a recognition picket line.

It should be noted that my amendment also provides the sanction of an injunction under section 10(l) of the law against an employer who has refused to bargain with a union which has been certified as the representative of the majority of his employees, as well as against an employer who dominates or assists a union by means of "sweetheart" contracts, collusive deals, or other improper, shady, or unlawful transactions between corrupt unions and employers who are either dishonest or have been coerced into violating the rights of their employees.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Vermont is prepared to yield back the remainder of the time under his control, and to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, I did not hear what the majority leader stated.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I understand the Senator from Vermont is going to continue to try to work out an agreement with the chairman of the subcommittee [Mr. KENNEDY], and that at the present time the Senator from Vermont is willing to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. PROUTY. No, Mr. President; I am not willing to withdraw my amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Very well. Does the Senator from Vermont wish to have the vote on his amendment taken now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the request of the Senator from Vermont for unanimous consent that he may modify his amendment.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, at this time I suggest the absence of a quorum; and I ask unanimous consent that the time required for the quorum call not be charged to the time available to either side under the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I shall have to start objecting to such requests. I do not think we should have conferences on the floor all afternoon.

The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN] is prepared, ready, willing, and eager to offer an amendment. The Senators who have been conferring in regard to the amendment which now is pending can continue to negotiate while we are discussing the McClellan amendment.

However, as matters now stand, we are using a great deal of time on private conversations, and we are not making much progress by that course; in fact, by proceeding in that way we vitiate the terms of the unanimous-consent agreement which has been entered.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, if the Senator will modify his unanimous-consent request——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I do not have pending a request for unanimous consent. But I shall be glad to join in arriving at any agreement the Senator from Vermont may propose in regard to the further consideration of his amendment.

I understood that he was unable to reach an agreement with the chairman of the subcommittee.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, the yeas and nays have already been ordered on the question of agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont. Can we not agree to lay his amendment aside temporarily, and at this time to proceed with the consideration of another amendment, and then later to reinstate the amendment of the Senator from Vermont? If so, that will be satisfactory.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, I shall be glad to have that done.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Then, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that it be in order for the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN] to call up his boycott amendment; and that at the conclusion of the consideration of that amendment, the Senate resume its consideration of the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, and that at that time his amendment revert to the status it now enjoys.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, let me ask whether it is understood that the order for the yeas and nays—they have already been ordered on the question of agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont—will at that time continue to apply to his amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MUSKIE in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I call up my amendment identified as "4–17–59—C."

Mr. President, I think we have worked out an agreement with respect to another amendment I have pending, and we might dispose of it first.

I ask unanimous consent that, preceding action on the amendment I have just referred to, I may call up my amendment identified as "4–22–59—F."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed, on page 33, line 4, to strike out "or 203" and insert in lieu thereof ", 203, or 207".

On page 35, between lines 2 and 3, to insert the following new section:

SEC. 208. All officers, agents, representatives, and employees of any labor organization engaged in an industry affecting commerce who handle funds of such organization or of a trust in which such organization is interested shall be bonded for the faithful discharge of their duties in the handling of such funds, and the bond of each such person in effect during any fiscal year of such organization shall be in an amount, (A) in the case of a labor organization, not less than one-tenth of the gross income of such organization for the fiscal year of such organization immediately preceding such fiscal year, or $250,000, whichever is the lesser; or, (B) in the case of a trust in which a labor organization is interested, not less than 25 percent of the amount of such trust, or $250,000, whichever is the lesser.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, this is the amendment on bonding I had submitted. It has been worked out so that I believe it is satisfactory to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY]. It relates to the bonding of officers.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, the amendment is acceptable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield back the time remaining to him?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I do.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield back the time remaining to me on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time on the amendment has been yielded back.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, now I call up my amendment identified as "4–17–59—C."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to add a new section at the end of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 607. (a) Section 8(b)(4) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"(4) to exert or attempt to exert any economic or other coercion against, or offer any inducement to, any person engaged in commerce or in an industry affecting commerce, or to engage in, or induce or encourage any individual employed by any person engaged in commerce or in an industry affecting commerce to engage in, a strike or a refusal in the course of his employment to use, manufacture, process, transport, or otherwise handle or work on any goods, articles, materials, or commodities or to perform any services, where an object thereof is (A) forcing or requiring any employer or self-employed person to join any labor or employer organization; (B) forcing or requiring any person to cease, or to agree to cease, using, selling, handling, transporting, or otherwise dealing in the products of any other producer, processor, or manufacturer, or to cease, or to agree to cease, doing business with any other person, or forcing or requiring any other employer to recognize or bargain with a labor organization as the representative of his employees; (C) forcing or requiring such person to recognize or bargain with a particular labor organization as the representative of his employees if another labor organization has been certified as the representative of such employees under the provisions of section 9; (D) forcing or requiring any employer to assign particular work to employees in a particular labor organization or in a particular trade, craft, or class rather than to employees in another labor organization or in another trade, craft, or class, unless such employer is failing to conform to an order or certification of the Board determining the bargaining representative for employees performing such work: Provided, That nothing contained in this subsection (b) shall be construed to make unlawful a refusal by any person to enter upon the premises of any employer (other than his own employer), if the employees of such employer are engaged in a strike ratified or approved by a representative of such employees whom such employer is required to recognize under this Act: Provided further, That nothing contained in clause (B) of this paragraph (4) shall be construed to make unlawful where not otherwise unlawful any strike against, or refusal to perform services for, any person who has contracted or agreed with an employer to perform for such employer work which he is unable to perform because his employees are engaged in a strike not unlawful under this Act."

(b) Section 303(a) of the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"(a) It shall be unlawful, for the purpose of this section only, in an industry or activity affecting commerce, for any labor organization to engage in any activity or conduct defined as an unfair labor practice in section 8(b)(7) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended."

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I shall try to be brief. I yield myself 5 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, we are all familiar with the problem known as secondary boycott. There have been some abuses in this field, and the amendment seeks to correct them.

Mr. President, I shall state what the amendment would prohibit which is not now prohibited, and how it would fill in the gaps in the Taft-Hartley law as it now operates. The amendment covers the direct coercion of secondary employers to cause them to cease dealing with or doing business with the primary employer. In other words, if there were a strike in a certain plant, and I, as a merchant, handled the products of that plant, under the amendment the union could not use picketing to try to compel me to cease handling the products of the plant where the labor dispute is under way.

Second, the amendment covers the withdrawal of services by one key employee, not merely concerted action. Under the Taft-Hartley law, it is now an unfair labor practice to cause concerted action to be applied against an employer. The amendment would relieve the requirement of concerted action if the individual coerced were a key employee, and the effect would be to shut down the plant or seriously hamper or hinder the operations of the primary employer.

Third, as we know, the Taft-Hartley law excludes railway, agricultural, and other employees. They are not now covered by the law. The amendment would include those employees.

Fourth, the amendment covers the withholding of prospective employees from a secondary employer. I refer to a case in which I may be handling the products of a given company or manufacturer, and I have an arrangement with a union whereby it furnishes employees to me when I call upon the union to furnish them. I refer to a case where I may be under a contract and under an obligation to use the facilities of a hiring hall to get my employees from the hiring hall. The union would say to me, "We will not furnish you any more men, so long as you handle the products of that company." That is another form of secondary boycott which would be prohibited.

The amendment, Mr. President, covers pressure in the form of dissuading customers from dealing with secondary employers. That refers to establishing a picket line around a merchant's store, when the merchant handles the product of a company or of a manufacturing plant in which there is a strike. In other words, that is a form of coercion against an innocent employer, in an effort to compel the employer who has a strike on his hands to come to terms with the union. It is an effort to influence the original employer.

Mr. President, these cases come up repeatedly. There are those who believe that almost any power should be placed in and retained by unions to force their will, by the use of economic power and economic coercion, in almost any situation which may arise.

Mr. President, I have been pleading for this cause ever since the debate on the bill started. I have been trying to have adopted a measure to protect those who are innocent and helpless.

I point out that we have cases of merchants who for 20 years, 10 years, or for a long period of time, may have been handling a particular brand of product. A merchant may have built his business around the product, such as the John Deere plows or some kind of machinery from some other company. The merchant may have built up his trade entirely on that product. The merchant may have a competitor who is handling a competitive product made by another manufacturer, which serves the same function, but which is a different brand and is manufactured by someone else. In one of these plants there may be a strike, and the union may picket the merchant who is handling the product of the struck plant. The union may say to the merchant, "You cannot sell this product. If you do we will picket your place of business. Thus you will not be able to get your supplies, because the Teamsters will not cross the picketline."

In addition, the merchant's customers would be embarrassed. They would be harassed. They would see the picket sign. What would the sign say? It would say "Unfair to labor." How is the merchant unfair to labor? It is simply a case of the merchant not being willing to stop handling a product which he has been handling for 20 years and on which he has built his business. That is a secondary boycott which, it seems to me, ought to be prohibited.

Mr. President, that is the field and the area in which the amendment is designed to operate. Those are the things it is designed to prevent. If Senators believe labor should have the power to impose secondary boycotts; if they believe the innocent ought not have protection but that they should submit, whatever the dispute may be and regardless of who is right or wrong; and if they believe we should permit the power and the force to be applied; then they should vote against the amendment, because I believe the amendment, if agreed to and enforced, would stop some of those practices.

Mr. MUNDT and Mr. CASE of South Dakota addressed the Chair.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield first to my colleague on the committee.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I point out, and I am sure the Senator from Arkansas will agree, that the evidence before our committee, which has gone into secondary boycotts to some extent, indicates that a protective measure of the kind presented is fully as important to the employees as it is to the employers.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Yes. I meant to mention that fact.

The merchant may employ a dozen people, or perhaps more. He may have to close down his business. It might be necessary to put other employees out of work, simply because there is some foreign dispute over which the merchant and his employees have no control on earth. They cannot do anything about the dispute.

Mr. MUNDT. The Senator is exactly correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, how much time have I used?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has used 5 minutes.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield myself 2 more minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is recognized for 2 minutes.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I remind the Senator of the long investigation we had with regard to the Kohler situation, in which there was a secondary boycott. In that instance laboring men, plumbers, installers, and those engaged as artisans and salesmen of the particular product of the plant, though thousands of miles removed and entirely innocent of taking any stand on either side, were forced out of work because of the secondary boycott imposed to meet a situation in Sheyboygan County, Wis. I think it is manifestly unfair to force working men and women out in the street when they have no interest of their own in a situation.

As I understand the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas, it would correct such a situation, which results in a miscarriage of justice both to employers and to employees, who usually are less able to withstand that kind of economic oppression than is management.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I am glad to yield.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I merely wish to observe that I think the secondary boycott is of great concern to the rank and file of people in small towns and communities, sometimes far removed from the ordinary scene of industrial problems, in connection with transportation of goods. The application of the secondary boycott affects farmers, small townspeople, and people in cities of small size, where there is no direct industrial conflict. Because of that fact I think the amendment is extremely important for areas of our country which ordinarily do not think of themselves as being concerned with labor problems. The amendment is important. I hope it will be agreed to.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may make a technical amendment to my amendment, as a modification.

On line 23, page 3, I wish to strike out the figure "(7)" and to insert in lieu thereof the figure "(4)".

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has a right to modify his amendment. The amendment is modified as requested.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

I am not sure the Members of the Senate are aware of how strongly the secondary boycott provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act regulate secondary boycotts, combined with the language which the Senate agreed to last night, prohibiting hot cargo.

Thirty percent of all secondary boycott cases carried to the National Labor Relations Board involve the Teamsters Union. It is my judgment, and I think it is the judgment of the Senator from Tennessee and of the Senator from Arkansas, that last night, in the amendment dealing with the hot cargo, we effectively restrained the Teamsters from engaging in secondary activity which is inimical to the general welfare.

The problem we are faced with now is somewhat different. Under the pending bill if there is a strike in the plant of employer A, and if employer B is doing business with employer A, the union is prohibited from attempting to call employer B's employees out on strike as a means of putting economic pressure on employer B in order to put economic pressure on employer A.

In other words, the Taft-Hartley Act was quite stringent in this field. I will restate the proposition, to make it somewhat more clear, if I may.

What happened in the example which the Senator from Arkansas gave in his speech is now prohibited by the secondary boycott provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act. The Senator gave an example of the Teamsters' Union refusing, because of a picket line, to make deliveries to a secondary employer doing business with a primary employer, against whom there was a strike. That is prohibited today. If the Teamsters refuse to make deliveries, that is prohibited by the Taft-Hartley Act.

The point I make is that in the way the Senator's amendment is drafted, it would prevent, in the garment industry—which has been an extremely competitive industry and in which the union has worked for the past 50 years to try to raise standards of those working in the industry—a union representative from going to an employer and asking the employer, as a part of the good will between the union and the employer, to subcontract his work to those employers who were paying a reasonable wage and not to give his work to employers who were paying substandard wages.

That is the way the garment industry has been able to raise the economic standard of the workers engaged in it. That was the original sweatshop industry in this country.

We are not now talking about the Teamsters. That problem has been dealt with. We are talking about economic relations between employers and employees. The Taft-Hartley secondary-boycott provision prohibits unions from putting economic pressure on employer B, for example, who is doing business with employer A, in order to bring the employees of employer B out on strike.

The amendment of the Senator from Arkansas goes far beyond that, and would prevent any agreement of any kind between the union and employer B that employer B will cease doing business with employer A during the period of the strike.

If the strike is against a sweatshop industry, I think the Senator from Arkansas can see how far reaching his amendment would be. I believe it is in the public interest for employers and unions to agree not to do business with employers who pay substandard wages and maintain substandard working conditions. I believe it is proper for a union to say to employer B, "Please do not subcontract any work to subcontractors who maintain sweatshop conditions." I would not say that the union should have the right to say to the contractor, "If you do not do as we ask, we are going to strike against you." But at least the union should have the right to say to the employer, "Our relations will be far better if you do not deal with employer A," so long as the union does not say, "We will strike if you continue to do business with him."

The Taft-Hartley Act was not regarded as very favorable to labor. It seems to me that act dealt with the problem of unreasonable secondary boycotts. Remember that employer B is doing business with employer A and assisting him in an economic struggle with the union. In most cases employer B is not a real neutral. He is doing business with employer A, who is involved in an economic struggle with the union.

Now it is proposed to prevent the union from using any kind of influence to protect itself during the struggle. We hear a great deal about protecting employer B, but there is no talk about protecting the union from the action of employer B, who is participating with employer A in waging the fight against the union.

The amendment of the Senator from Arkansas would take away some of the present protections in the law against employer B making an arrangement with employer A to do struck work. This would lessen the protection which the union should have.

The amendment would vary the effect of the decision in the Ebasco case and other decisions in which the Supreme Court and other courts have interpreted the Taft-Hartley law. I quote from the most recent decision by the U.S. Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, 1955, 228 Federal (2d) 553, in the case involving the Independent Repair Co.:

> We therefore hold that an employer is not within the protection of paragraph 8(b)(4)(A) when he knowingly does work which would otherwise be done by the striking employees of the primary employer and where this work is paid for by the primary employer pursuant to an arrangement devised and originated by him to enable him to meet his contractual obligations. The result must be the same whether or not the primary employer makes any direct arrangement with the employers providing the services.

In this case we are not talking about a customer who might buy a mattress when there is a strike against employer A. We are talking now about employer B, who makes a mattress for the employer against whom the strike is being conducted.

The effect of the Senator's amendment would be to lessen the protection which the Taft-Hartley Act gives a union against an employer who attempts to make an arrangement with a secondary employer to farm out his work.

This amendment is extremely complicated. I am not sure that Members of the Senate are aware of the impact of the present Taft-Hartley Act. I believe that the most malicious secondary boycotts are those involved in the trucking industry, because of the extraordinary economic power of the Teamsters Union. By the so-called "hot cargo" amendment agreed to last night, we have dealt with the Teamsters. That field involves 30 percent of all secondary boycotts.

The effect of the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas would be to make it impossible for decent employers and employees to protect their standards in vital industries. This is an economic issue. It is a question of the right of unions, so long as they do not strike or seek to put pressure on the employer, to attempt to protect their standards. This question involves wages and hours of workers.

This is not a question of racketeering. It is a question of legitimate activity to protect reasonable wages. Therefore I hope the Senate will reject the amendment.

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. KENNEDY. I am glad to yield for a question.

Mr. SMATHERS. If the amendment which was agreed to last night, offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE] which had to do with 30 percent of the boycotts, was right and sound and needed, why do we not need some additional legislation with respect to the other 70 percent?

Mr. KENNEDY. I am glad to state the reason. The reason is the extraordinary economic power of the Teamsters Union. When we get away from the extraordinary power of the Teamsters Union to tie up a business by refusing to deliver, we get into another field. I do not believe we can solve the problem of the Teamsters in this bill, or in any amendment suggested on the floor. That problem will be with us for some time. I definitely believe that power should be lessened to the extent we can lessen it, and I hope we can do so. Therefore, when power is invoked in connection with a secondary boycott, that is excessive power. But when we talk about the economic relations between employees and employers, I am not ready to say, as a general thesis, that the economic power of the union is greater than that of the employer, or that the economic power of the employer is greater than that of the union. In the case of the Teamsters there is no doubt that the economic power of the Teamsters is greater. In connection with other industries, such as the garment industry, in some cases the economic power of the union is greater, and in other cases the economic power of the employer is greater.

It is not a question of not prohibiting the secondary boycott. Under the Taft-Hartley Act we attempted to prohibit bringing the employees of a secondary employer out on strike, regardless of what relations he may have with the primary employer.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield.

Mr. GORE. The amendment adopted last night is characterized by two additional differences.

First, when we deal with the transportation industry we are dealing with a segment of our economy which goes directly to the security and the economic strength of the entire national economy.

Second, an employer who is a common carrier is the beneficiary of a franchise, or a permit from the Government. As a result of that benefit, his competition is limited. In some cases he is given an exclusive right to be the common carrier over a given highway or a given route. Therefore, the secondary boycott in the transportation field has different aspects, both from the standpoint of the labor union involved and the common carrier involved.

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator has stated the situation exactly.

I have referred to the garment industry as an example. I know the Senator from Florida is interested in this problem. Take the case of the garment industry in New York. A manufacturer subcontracts his work to various cutters. If he subcontracts work to a cutter who pays 60 percent of the union standard wage, that cutter enjoys an economic advantage over other cutters. Therefore, there is pressure on other cutters to reduce their wages.

A union is prohibited from enforcing any agreement with a manufacturer by an economic strike, but I do not believe it should be prevented from saying, "Our economic relations will be better if you subcontract your work to contractors who are paying decent wages."

That is the general problem involved in secondary boycotts. I hope Senators will not allow any strong feeling against the Teamsters Union because of its power, which should be checked, to influence their judgment concerning the pending amendment, because I think it would call for a definite change in the economic relations and balance of the national economy.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I yield myself 5 minutes.

I should like now to call something to the attention of the Senate. I hope Senators will listen to me. I listened very carefully to the speech of my friend from Massachusetts. He has talked about farming out work. There is a provision in my amendment which specifically provides as follows:

> Provided further, That nothing contained in clause (B) of this paragraph (4) shall be construed to make unlawful where not otherwise unlawful any strike against, or refusal to perform services for, any person who has contracted or agreed with an employer to perform for such employer work which he is unable to perform because his employees are engaged in a strike not unlawful under this act.

There is a complete exemption from anything my distinguished friend from Massachusetts has argued. That is contained in my amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield.

Mr. KENNEDY. In the case which is the guiding case in this regard, it is stated:

> The result must be the same whether or not the primary employer makes any direct arrangement with the employer providing the service.

The point I make is that the word "arrangement" is used. Therefore, the language of the Senator's amendment is more circumscribed than the language of the Taft-Hartley Act with regard to struck work, as interpreted by the courts.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I do not know what struck work is, if it is not the stopping of work. I do not know how courts can squirm to reach any other kind of interpretation.

Mr. KENNEDY. We are talking about the economic relationship between employer A and employer B.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Yes. Employer A has a strike and finds he cannot get his orders manufactured because he does not have the employees with which to do the work, because they are on strike. Therefore, he contracts with employer B to do the work. The strikers can apply economic pressure against employer B. That is permitted under the amendment. We have taken care of that, because we did not want to provide that escape.

Last night we did not do anything to keep the Teamsters from refusing to deliver. They can put a picket line around a man's store. There is nothing in the amendment the Senate adopted last night which will keep them from doing that. All we have done by the amendment is to prohibit them from entering into a contract. We have not done anything to keep them from withholding services.

Mr. KENNEDY. Under the present rulings of the court, if the Teamsters refuse to make deliveries as the result of the effort of the union, they are subject to the Taft-Hartley law.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Let me say to my friend that there was a strike at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel in New York involving the employees of a barber shop. They belonged to an independent union. The AFL-CIO decided to take them over. They picketed the barber shop. However, instead of putting pickets around the barber shop, they put them around the outside of the hotel. The Teamsters cut off the supplies of the hotel. The management said, "We cannot stand for that."

Mr. KENNEDY. Was not that problem related also to the fact that the National Labor Relations Board did not assume jurisdiction over the hotel industry?

Mr. McCLELLAN. That may be true. That can happen now. What is to prevent it?

Mr. KENNEDY. They would not be able to do it even if the amendment were adopted, unless New York State was able to assume jurisdiction under the no-man's land provision.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. McCLELLAN. How much time do I have remaining.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 12 minutes remaining.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield 5 minutes to my distinguished friend from Nebraska, the cosponsor of the amendment.

Mr. CURTIS. I thank the distinguished Senator. I rise in support of the amendment to amend the secondary boycott provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act, in order to outlaw effectively secondary boycotts under penalty of fine, imprisonment, or both.

As the Taft-Hartley Act stands today unions have succeeded in finding many holes in the act's secondary boycott provisions. Union racketeering, as the revelations of the McClellan committee have shown, is fostered by the use of secondary boycotts. Employers, who are innocent bystanders, are drawn into struggles between unions and other employers. The secondary boycott is a particularly popular technique with the Teamsters, who have not hesitated to use it in order to force unwilling employers to compel their employees to join the union, which in many instances the employees have rejected.

For almost 2 years now the vicious practice of the secondary boycott has been defended on the floor of the Senate by talking about a small segment which involves the farming out of struck work. In the meantime, many individuals are suffering from secondary boycotts. In the meantime small businesses are being driven out of business. In the meantime, workers are forced into unions by their employers because the employers are compelled to unionize them against their wishes. There can be no defense of such procedures.

I should like to call the Senate's attention to the hearings of the McClellan committee on the secondary boycott. Earlier today I mentioned the secondary boycott involving the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel in New York, where the Teamsters Union refused to let anything come into the hotel or to go out, and picketed the hotel because another concern which had a lease in a part of the hotel had a dispute with the barbers' union. It was a valid dispute. One of the largest hotels in the country, as a result, was forced to its knees by a secondary boycott. If it were lawful for competitors to boycott another business and destroy it, then, of course, it would be lawful for a union to do it. However, the reverse is true.

We do not seek any special or punitive action in this matter. What we ask for is equality before the law.

Senators who refer to the hearings will find the case of the Burt Manufacturing Co. of Akron, Ohio. They have a certified union, the Steelworkers Union. Because the Sheetmetal Workers Union thought they ought to have that shop, the company's products are being boycotted all over the United States. That has been going on for 10 years.

Today we are right back where we were before the smokescreen was thrown up about farming out struck work. That is not the issue here. The question is whether we are for or against the vicious secondary boycott.

I should also like to call to the attention of the Senate the case of the Southwest Motor Freightways in Galveston, Tex., which operates entirely within the State of Texas. Their employees, on a ballot, rejected Dave Beck's and Jimmy Hoffa's Teamsters Union. Yet the hot cargo clause was invoked, and they were given no freight to haul. The people invoking the secondary boycotts do not stop at that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the distinguished minority leader yield time to me on the bill?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I shall be glad to yield the Senator more time, provided I can get time on the bill when I need it. How much time does the Senator want?

Mr. CURTIS. Ten minutes.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I will yield 5 minutes to the Senator.

Mr. CURTIS. There are a number of pages in the hearings which discuss the violations which occurred in connection with Mr. Gilbert, the owner of Southwest Motor Freightways, in Texas. It is rather interesting to note that one of the Texas victims of the secondary boycott said he was grateful for the help which the Texas Rangers gave to him, because they were the only source of help he could get in Texas against this vicious practice.

This is an intolerable situation, as all right thinking people have realized, whatever their personal orientations. We thought that we had put an end to secondary boycotts when we passed the Taft-Hartley Act and wrote into it section 8(b)(4). But the ingenuity of the racketeering labor leaders has made a shambles of section 8(b)(4). Through a variety of clever devices, virtually the total effect of section 8(b)(4) has been avoided, to the detriment of employees and employers, whether or not directly involved in a labor dispute. The only beneficiaries have been racketeering labor union leaders. Accordingly, there is a crying need for amendment of the law in order to stop these devices.

Amendment 4–17–59—C accomplishes the following:

First. It makes it unlawful to coerce or induce a third party employer to cease doing business with another person. Suppose, for example, that a union wants an employer to sign a contract with it under which his employees must belong to the union. Suppose further that the employees do not want the union and have so indicated their desire. If the union, to bring pressure upon the reluctant employer, calls out on strike the employees of a different employer in order to force that employer to stop doing business with the first one, that is presently unlawful under the secondary boycott provisions of existing law. But suppose the union plays it smart. Instead of calling the strike just described, it simply goes to the second employer and says, "Look here; you do not want any trouble with us; stop doing business with the first employer. He is giving us trouble by not signing up with us." There is nothing in present law to bar such direct pressure upon the second employer. Yet that pressure can be very effective. The second employer, who will usually be a small employer—the union will pick on small employers, not big ones who can well stand up to it—does not desire to get involved in difficulties with the union. He may have a contract with it and wants to maintain friendly relations. He can do business with someone else who is not embroiled in union troubles. So he simply looks elsewhere for customers or for his supplies. Meanwhile, the first employer will frequently give in to the union and force his employees to join it or he will just go out of business.

The amendment cures the above defect in existing law by making it just as unlawful to coerce second employers directly as indirectly through their employees. It does this by adding to 8(b)(4) a prohibition against coercion of or inducement to any person engaged in commerce. It continues in effect the prohibition against strikes or the calling of strikes by unions against the second employers. At the same time the amendment specifically provides that it does not render unlawful a strike against the second employer, who has contracted to perform work for the first employer, which the first employer is unable to perform because his employees are lawfully striking against him.

In other words, the contention of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts that the amendment is defective because of the struck-work provision is not well taken.

Second. The amendment closes another major loophole in existing law. Today if secondary boycotts are directed against railroads, farmers, governments, and other classes of employers and employees excluded from the law's coverage, they are not illegal. Take for example the case of an effort by a union to organize a company, whose employees do not want the union. The union, unable to get anywhere with the company, proceeds to picket a railroad which delivers supplies to the company or an agricultural enterprise which buys from or sells to the company, in order to force the railroad or farmer to stop doing business with the company.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Nebraska has again expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield the Senator 5 minutes on the bill.

Mr. CURTIS. I thank the minority leader.

Since railroad employees and farm employees are not "employees" as that term is defined in the law, the secondary-boycott provisions of the law are not violated. Yet innocent parties are hurt in this situation as much as where the picketing is directed at persons who are technically employees within the meaning of the law. The amendment eliminates this inequity by substituting for the words in section 8(b)(4) "employees of any employer" the words "individual employed by any person." Thus, inducing or encouraging strikes by employees of secondary employers, who are railroads, farmers, governments, and so forth, will be illegal the same as the inducement of strikes by employees of any other secondary employer.

Third. Another loophole in existing law is found in the rule laid down by the U.S. Supreme Court in the Rice Milling case that if the secondary boycott merely induces individual action rather than concerted action, it is lawful. This loophole is taken care of also. Suppose, then, that the union's inducement to strike does not encourage united activity by the employees of the secondary employer, but simply individual action by them. That is, each employee is induced separately and at different times to refuse to work. This technique can be just as effective in forcing his employer to cease doing business with the first employer as the technique where all employees act concertedly in refusing to work.

The amendment closes this loophole by dropping the word "concerted" from section 8(b)(4).

Turning now to amendment 4–17–59—D, the amendment which makes it a crime to enter into a hot cargo agreement, I would not think that at this late date, much would have to be said in support of this subject. There is probably no more vicious and harmful provision in collective bargaining agreements than the hot cargo clause. What it does is require an employer to agree that his employees do not have to handle goods which the union labels as "hot." And the union will label as hot the goods of any other employer so long as he will not agree to do what the union wants. If the employer, for example, will not force his employees to join the union which his employees do not want, then the union will declare his goods hot and that means that other employers having hot cargo agreements are precluded from handling such goods.

The Teamsters in particular have hot cargo clauses in their agreements. If they are unable to organize a particular retailer, let us say, they can virtually put him out of business by stopping all deliveries to and from his place of business by invoking the hot cargo clauses they have in their carrier contracts.

The subject of hot cargo contracts has been widely litigated in the courts and before the NLRB and the ICC. Present law is in a state of complete confusion. The Labor Board has ruled that if a union induces employees to strike to force an employer to comply with a hot cargo agreement, that is unlawful. On the other hand, it is not unlawful for the union to force the employer to enter into a hot cargo contract or to force him directly to comply with it once he enters into it. In my opinion, all these union actions are reprehensible and should be outlawed. While I believe that amendment 4–17–59—C includes all these actions within the secondary boycott prohibitions contained in that amendment, although not in so many words, I also believe that the cleaner way to strike at the problem and put a roadblock in front of the racketeering which it engenders is to declare hot cargo agreements criminally illegal. That is precisely what amendment 4–17–59—D does.

On several occasions I have spoken in detail about secondary boycotts. It was the intention of Congress in passing the Taft-Hartley law to outlaw all secondary boycotts. They are carried on today because of loopholes in the law. The amendment of the distinguished Senator from Arkansas closes those loopholes. It gives an opportunity to do what Congress intended to do in the passage of the Taft-Hartley law.

I agree with the late Senator Taft, who said, "There is no such thing as a good secondary boycott." A secondary boycott is the carrying of economic warfare to neutral third persons. It is a practice being carried on by the most vicious of the racketeers. It is indefensible, and Congress ought to close these loopholes.

I urge the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, on this amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, let me inquire whether both sides have either yielded back their remaining time or have consumed all the time available to them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Do both sides yield back their remaining time?

Mr. KENNEDY. I do.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All remaining time has been yielded back.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN], as modified. On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered; and the clerk will call the roll.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I suggested the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Very well; the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The question is on agreeing to the modified amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN]. On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered; and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] are absent on official business.

I also announce that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. BIBLE] is absent because of a death in his family.

I further announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR] is absent because of illness.

On this vote, the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CARLSON] is paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY].

If present and voting, the Senator from Kansas would vote "yea," and the Senator from Minnesota would vote "nay."

On this vote, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] is paired with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. BIBLE].

If present and voting, the Senator from Arkansas would vote "yea," and the Senator from Nevada would vote "nay."

On this vote, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] is paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER].

If present and voting, the Senator from Wisconsin would vote "yea," and the Senator from Louisiana would vote "nay."

Mr. KUCHEL. I announce that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CARLSON] is absent on official business, and is paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY]. If present and voting, the Senator from Kansas would vote "yea," and the Senator from Minnesota would vote "nay."

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] is necessarily absent, and is paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER]. If present and voting, the Senator from Wisconsin would vote "yea," and the Senator from Louisiana would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 41, nays 50, as follows:

YEAS—41

So Mr. McCLELLAN's amendment, as modified, was rejected.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I move that the vote by which the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas was rejected be reconsidered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will now return to the consideration of the Prouty amendment.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment to me, out of my time?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. If I may have the attention of the Senator from Vermont, it is my understanding that the Senator desires to vitiate the order by which the yeas and nays were ordered. Is that a correct understanding?

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I object. We had a unanimous understanding there would be a yea-and-nay vote, and I think we should stand by it.

Mr. PROUTY. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. PROUTY. I have an amendment to the amendment which I proposed this morning, which I am offering on behalf of myself, the Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CASE], the Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL], the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS], and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT]. The Senator from Vermont is a little confused as to the proper procedure. I would appreciate it if the Chair would advise me the course of action to pursue.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROUTY. I am glad to yield.

Mr. JAVITS. As I understand, the situation can be straightened out by another sponsor of the amendment offering the amendment as a substitute amendment. Therefore, I hope the Senator will yield, for that purpose, to one of the cosponsors, so that the amendment may be offered as a substitute. I understand my colleague from New York is agreeable.

Mr. PROUTY. I am very happy to yield for that purpose.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROUTY], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CASE], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER], the Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL], the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT], and myself, I offer a substitute for the amendment.

Mr. MUNDT. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the pending question is on agreeing to the request of the Senator from Vermont to accept the Cooper amendment as a modification of his amendment. The Chair cannot entertain the substitute amendment until the Cooper amendment has been withdrawn.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, we did not hear the ruling.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on agreeing to the request to modify the Prouty amendment by the Cooper amendment.

Mr. DIRKSEN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I thought a unanimous-consent request had been proffered, to do exactly that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unanimous-consent request has not been agreed to by the Senate.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President——

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to modify the amendment which I offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I should like to inquire what effect the granting of the request would have upon the time for discussion, if any?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time for discussion would remain as it is. The time of the Senator from Vermont has expired.

Mr. ALLOTT. I make a further inquiry, Mr. President. What is the time remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time remaining is the time of the Senator from Massachusetts, who has 18 minutes remaining.

Mr. ALLOTT. On which side?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On the opposition side.

Mr. ALLOTT. There is no time remaining on behalf of the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, reserving the right to object——

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, I will reserve my objection for the time being until we can see if this matter cannot be handled in another way, so that the Senate may be informed as to what the amendment means. I do not believe an amendment of this importance should be voted on by the Senate without having proper time for discusison. I should like to inquire if there is a way by which the amendment may be offered so that the Senators may have time for adequate discussion.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. DIRKSEN. It is my understanding that those who are particularly interested in the amendment have agreed upon the language. This is the picketing amendment. It is my understanding the language is agreeable to the chairman of the subcommittee, the Senator from Massachusetts. I think that is the understanding, and on that basis I believe the amendment will be accepted.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, that is slightly different from my understanding. I would say this matter could be disposed of by a voice vote.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHAVEZ. I am against the amendment, Mr. President. I am against the amendment, but I want it to be discussed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from New York.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I must object.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I believe I have the floor for the moment, on a parliamentary inquiry. I will yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. KEATING. In order to satisfy the distinguished Senator from Colorado and other Senators, perhaps the Senator from Illinois could yield 5 minutes under the time for general debate on the bill, for the purpose of explaining the amendment.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I was going to suggest that since the Senator from Massachusetts has 18 minutes remaining he could divide that time, which would allow for an explanation.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I am happy to yield 9 minutes to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, I shall not object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont is recognized for 9 minutes. The pending question is on agreeing to the request of the Senator to modify his amendment.

Mr. McNAMARA. Mr. President——

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, will the Presiding Officer put the unanimous consent request, so that it can be agreed to?

Mr. McNAMARA. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is on agreeing to the unanimous consent request of the Senator from Vermont to modify his amendment in accordance with the Cooper substitute.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. COOPER. I understand that the amendment which I offered is incorporated in the new amendment, which will be offered by the Senator from Vermont for himself, for me, for the Senator from New York, and other Senators. I ask if I may withdraw my amendment, and if it would then be possible for the Senator from New York to offer a new amendment as a substitute?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment may be withdrawn by unanimous consent.

Mr. COOPER. I ask unanimous consent that my amendment modifying the amendment of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROUTY] be withdrawn.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER] is asking unanimous consent that he be permitted to withdraw his amendment. Then the Keating amendment would be a substitute for the Prouty amendment.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I am somewhat curious as to whether all this parliamentary maneuvering is devoted to the purpose that there will not be a yea-and-nay vote on this matter, after we have spent all afternoon discussing it. There are many interested in the subject, and I think we should decide it on a yea-and-nay vote when we make up our minds. We had an understanding with the distinguished majority leader that we would place this amendment in exactly the same status it previously occupied, to accommodate action by the Senate on the McClellan amendment. I do not want us to find ourselves getting all squeegeed out of a yea-and-nay vote, which could happen under the maneuvering which is taking place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The order for the yeas and nays cannot be rescinded without unanimous consent.

Mr. MUNDT. And that order will hold, even on the substitute amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. MUNDT. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I object, for the moment.

Mr. DIRKSEN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. DIRKSEN. To what has the objection been made? Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from Kentucky that he withdraw his amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands objection has been made to the request of the Senator from Kentucky to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, if the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky were withdrawn there would be actually nothing before the Senate, unless a new amendment were proposed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now before the Senate is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, with the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Kentucky may withdraw his amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Vermont may amend his amendment as he chooses to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, has that been agreed to?

Mr. PROUTY. No.

Mr. KEATING. I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts, I understood it would be desirable that I offer my amendment as a substitute amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts withdraw his unanimous-consent request?

Mr. KENNEDY. I do.

Mr. KEATING. Seeking to be cooperative, Mr. President, what is the situation?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Is the Senator going to offer his amendment as a substitute?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from New York.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I offer this original amendment as a substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

Mr. KEATING. I offer the amendment on behalf of the Senators listed in my previous statement, and myself.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. In lieu of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROUTY], the Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING], for himself and other Senators, proposes, on page 59, after line 25, to insert the following:

SEC. . (a) Subsection (b) of section 8 of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is amended by striking out the word "and" at the end of paragraph (5), by striking out the period at the end of paragraph (6) and inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon and the word "and", and by adding a new paragraph as follows:

"(7) to picket or cause to be picketed, or threaten to picket or cause to be picketed, any employer with the object of forcing or requiring an employer to recognize or bargain with a labor organization as the representative of his employees, or forcing or requiring the employees of an employer to accept or select such labor organization as their collective bargaining representative—

"(A) where the employer has recognized in accordance with this Act any other labor organization (not established, maintained, or assisted by any action defined in section 8(a) as an unfair labor practice) and a question concerning representation may not appropriately be raised under section 9(c) of this Act; or

"(B) where within the preceding nine months a valid election under section 9(c) of this Act has been conducted unless such labor organization has been certified as the representative of employees of such employer pursuant to such election or unless such labor organization has been designated or selected as a representative for the purposes of collective bargaining by the majority of the employees in a unit appropriate for such purposes."

(b) Section 10(l) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is amended by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting the following: "and section 8(b)(7): Provided further, That where a charge is filed under section 8(b)(7) it shall be a defense to show that an unfair labor practice within the meaning of section 8(a) has been committed: Provided further, That where there is a failure to seek such appropriate relief the Board shall promptly make public the reasons for such failure."

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. How much time does the Senator from Vermont yield?

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished Senator from New York.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, under this amendment a union would be prohibited from picketing or threatening to picket an employer only where the object of such procedure was to force the employer to bargain or deal with the union, or to force the employees either to join the union or to select or accept it as their collective bargaining representative. Every other kind of picketing would be absolutely unaffected by this amendment.

But even where the union picketed for either of these two objectives, recognition or organization, it would not be in violation of the law, under this amendment, unless the picketing occurred in one of the two following situations:

First. Where the picketed employer had recognized and signed a contract with some other perfectly legitimate union which actually represented a majority of his employees, and, hence, under the Taft-Hartley Act, no election would be held by the Board until such contract had expired.

Second. Where the Board had held an election during the preceding 9 months—in that respect it differs from the provision of the previous amendment, which was 12 months—and the picketing union had lost the election, unless during the 9-month period the picketing union could demonstrate that it actually did represent a majority of the employees.

Whenever picketing occurs under one of these circumstances, this amendment provides that the National Labor Relations Board, as it does in cases of unlawful jurisdictional strikes, may simultaneously, while proceeding against the picketing union through its own administrative processes, seek a temporary restraining order against such union in the Federal district court. However, such order would not be granted if the union could show to the court that the employer had committed an unfair labor practice. That is provided in the very last paragraph.

I thank the Senator for yielding for this explanation.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, obviously if this amendment is adopted it will represent a compromise, but I think a compromise which is fair in all respects to both labor and business. I think it would contribute a great deal more to bringing about labor harmony than has been possible in the past. I think it is in the best American tradition for Members of the Senate to give and take, and finally wind up with an approach which is eminently fair and reasonable, as this seems to me to be.

For that reason I hope very much that none of my colleagues will seek a yea-and-nay vote on this proposal. I think it is in the interest of harmony and in the interest of what is good for the welfare of the country, that we should approach the problem on a more or less friendly basis.

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. PROUTY. I am glad to yield.

Mr. COTTON. I should like to ask the question of either the Senator from Vermont or the Senator from New York.

The statement was made that if there had been an election, picketing on the part of the union losing the election would be unlawful for a period of 9 months, unless in the meantime it demonstrated that it had become the bargaining agent, or represented the majority of the employees.

How would a union demonstrate that to be so without another election? It might claim it, but how could it demonstrate it, and thus make the picketing legal, without another election?

Mr. KEATING. I think one way would be by a signed showing, in writing, that a majority of the employees actually favored the union.

Mr. COTTON. To whom would they present the evidence before they started what would otherwise be illegal picketing? To whom would the demonstration or presentation of the signed document be made?

Mr. KEATING. I suppose it would be presented to the NLRB or a court ultimately.

Mr. COTTON. Unless the amendment indicates to what authority, as a condition precedent to the otherwise illegal picketing, the union would demonstrate that the situation had changed since the election, within a 9-month period, it strikes me that the way would be left open for a union to start picketing, and then claim that the situation had changed. The facts would be fuzzy, and there would be no clean-cut situation during the 9-month period.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. By way of observation, it seems to me that the demonstration would be before the National Labor Relations Board, which would have authority to proceed with the injunctive process in case the facts were not as alleged.

Mr. PROUTY. That would be true in the case of an unfair labor practice.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I do not see how any union could demonstrate that it was the bargaining agent without an election. Certainly if the union obtained a majority of the employees as members, then a certification of the majority could be used to say that it represented a majority of the employees. There is a difference between a union having a majority of the employees as members and being the duly qualified agent. The latter could be demonstrated only by an election.

Mr. COTTON. I am not raising this question in any unfriendly attitude toward the amendment. Let me state what I want to know. Let us suppose an election is held, and the union loses the election. Nine months have not elapsed. Under the proposed amendment would the union go ahead and start picketing, and then must it be dragged before the National Labor Relations Board and satisfy the Board, or must it first satisfy the National Labor Relations Board? The object is fine, but the procedure ought to be more clearly defined.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, this is the same point which I discussed earlier during the debate, and which was the subject of my amendment modifying the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont. I withdrew my modifying amendment because it is incorporated in the substitute amendment now before the Senate. I believe I can answer the Senator's question.

If the employees have voted in an election not to accept the union as their bargaining agent, and later the union claims that it has a majority, it is in the discretion of the NLRB, upon a complaint by the employer, to determine whether or not the union has a majority. If the union does not have a majority it could be prohibited from picketing. If it does have a majority, then the picketing could go on until the employer had recognized the union. The justification for that is that an actual majority has adhered to the union. Under the Taft-Hartley Act they have a right to be recognized.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I wish to address myself to the request that we forego a yea-and-nay vote on the amendment, as has been previously ordered. I realize that legislation is a compromise. Frankly, I am becoming a little tired of compromising away my principles. I am perfectly willing to go along with the amendment, and I will vote for it. I see no reason why the Senate should not give some power to the expression contained in the amendment, which I see as a recognition of the point we have been trying to make today, namely, that blackmail picketing is wrong and bad and is against the working people as well as against the public interest. I believe it will make the expression stronger if Senators will stand up and express themselves for it.

We have established one thing by the amendment. We have established recognition by the Senate that it is wrong, as has been disclosed by the McClellan committee, to engage in blackmail picketing. I am not agreed that we have provided any real relief against it. However, it is up to future Congresses to take remedial action, as the public realizes that what we need is a stronger approach. I say let us vote for what is proposed and let us give strength to it by unanimous approval of the amendment.

Mr. McNAMARA. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan will state it.

Mr. McNAMARA. Do I understand correctly that the yeas and nays on the amendment are not to be taken, or are they still ordered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays are still ordered on the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont. The yeas and nays have not been ordered on the substitute offered by the Senator from New York.

Mr. McNAMARA. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the request sufficiently seconded?

Mr. McNAMARA. Mr. President, I withdraw the request.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote! Vote!

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays. I see no reason why we should not stand up and be counted on the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the request sufficiently seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Do the Senators yield back the remainder of their time?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will the Chair inform the Senate what is the question now before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the substitute amendment offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING].

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has been yielded back.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, will the first vote be on the Keating amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first vote will be on the Keating amendment, in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. KENNEDY. Is there objection to the Keating amendment?

Mr. DIRKSEN. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois will state it.

Mr. KENNEDY. Is it possible to have a yea-and-nay vote on the Prouty amendment as amended by the Keating amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is on agreeing to the substitute offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING]. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY. I ask unanimous consent that the order for yeas and nays on the Keating amendment be rescinded, with the understanding that they will be ordered on the Prouty amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Is it not correct to say that as the situation now stands we would have two yea-and-nay votes on identically the same question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. If one amendment is withdrawn we will still have a yea-and-nay vote on the other amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida will state it.

Mr. HOLLAND. Is it not correct to say that if the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROUTY] accepts the substitute offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING], we would have the one question to vote on, on which a yea-and-nay vote has been ordered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The substitute cannot be accepted without unanimous consent, because the yeas and nays have been ordered on the Prouty amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Vermont may be permitted to accept the amendment of the Senator from New York, and that then the yeas and nays be ordered on the Prouty amendment.

Mr. PROUTY. I am very happy to accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas will state it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The question on which we are about to vote is on the Prouty amendment as modified by the Keating amendment. Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield back the remainder of his time?

Mr. KENNEDY. Yes.

Mr. MUNDT. I should like to have 1 minute on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time on the amendment has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I yield 1 minute on the bill to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. MUNDT. Inasmuch as I have been referred to obliquely by the statement that no one would ask for a yea-and-nay vote on the amendment, I wish to say that I am proud to be responsible for insisting that an amendment of this kind be voted on by a yea-and-nay vote.

The amendment has been described as a good amendment. If it is a good amendment, I do not believe the Senate should do something by stealth. The amendment is an improvement over nothing. As I have seen what has been started by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN] dwindle away until it has become a mere trickle, I wish to have a trickle with a yea-and-nay vote. Therefore I think it is only proper that we have a yea-and-nay vote on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROUTY], as modified. On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] are absent on official business.

I also announce that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. BIBLE] is absent because of a death in his family.

I further announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR] is absent because of illness.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. BIBLE], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] would each vote "yea."

Mr. KUCHEL. I announce that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CARLSON] is absent on official business, and if present and voting, would vote "yea."

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] is necessarily absent, and if present and voting, would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 86, nays 4, as follows:

So Mr. PROUTY's amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I move that the vote by which the amendment was agreed to be reconsidered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McCARTHY in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I call up my amendment which is identified as "4–21–59—H," and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 31, in line 24, after "SEC. 202", it is proposed to insert "(a)"

On page 32, between lines 8 and 9, it is proposed to insert the following:

"(b) No subordinate labor organization shall be placed under trusteeship by a national or international labor organization except for a purpose specified in subsection (a) and on order of the Secretary of Labor, or his designate, as provided hereinafter.

"(c) Any national or international labor organization seeking to place a subordinate labor body under trusteeship shall apply to the Secretary for an order in accordance with the provisions of this section. Such national or international labor organization may apply to the Secretary for a temporary order granting such relief, and the Secretary shall issue same after a hearing ex parte, on proof establishing probable cause for the belief of the existence of conditions within a subordinate labor organization sufficient to place such subordinate body under trusteeship for a purpose allowable under section 202. Such temporary order if issued shall remain in effect no longer than thirty days.

"(d) Upon the granting of a temporary order under subsection (c) the Secretary, within thirty days, shall cause a hearing to be held, upon notice to the officers of the subordinate labor organization, and issue a final order and finding on the application of the national or international labor organization.

(e) At the hearing before the Secretary under subsection (d), the national or international labor organization shall present clear and convincing proof establishing the existence of a condition or conditions which would allow the placing of the subordinate body under trusteeship for a purpose specified in subsection (a).

"(f) Any trusteeship so established under this section shall be valid for a period of one year from the date of the order of the Secretary. Upon the expiration of this period, the trusteeship shall be presumed invalid and its discontinuance decreed by the Secretary unless the national or international labor organization shall show that the continuation of the trusteeship is necessary for a purpose allowable under subsection (a). In such event, the Secretary may issue a further order for the continuation of the trusteeship for a period he deems appropriate, not to exceed one year.

"(g) The Secretary shall designate such rules and regulations as he deems proper, including the power to subpena books and records of any labor organization and to compel the attendance of witnesses at a hearing in order to effectuate the purposes of this section."

On page 33, line 4, strike out "202 or".

On page 33, beginning with line 22, strike out all of subsection (c) down to page 34, line 16.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield briefly to me, so that I may ask a question of the Senator from Massachusetts, in order to save time?

Mr. DODD. I am glad to yield.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I now find that the Senator from Massachustts has temporarily left the Chamber. In his absence I cannot very well ask my question.

Mr. DODD. I assure the Senator from Washington that I shall be glad to yield to him later on, when the Senator from Massachusetts has returned.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I thank the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I hope I may have the attention of my colleagues—not because I think my amendment is more important than any other; but I believe the amendment is important, and I have not offered it lightly. It has to do with one of the great abuses in the labor movement; it relates to what are known as trusteeships.

I have developed the habit of calling such trusteeships labor receiverships; I think that is a more accurate term to use in describing such a procedure, which is common to labor organizations. As I suppose all Senators know, such a trusteeship is so much like a receivership that it also seems to me that the rules with respect to obtaining receiverships ought to apply in the case of labor trusteeships.

Mr. President, what is the situation under the bill as it now is before us? The Kennedy-Ervin bill does improve the situation, I am frank to say; and I am pleased that it does. It provides that the imposition of a trusteeship by a national union on a local union shall be governed by the constitution of the national union. However, that provision really will not accomplish what is necessary if we are to protect local unions from arbitrary abuse.

The provision in regard to the causes for which a trusteeship may be imposed is rendered ambiguous by the inclusion of so unclear a provision as the one which now is set forth in the bill in the following language:

or otherwise carrying out the legitimate objects of such labor organization.

The bill now provides a procedure under which an individual union member may appeal. The point is that the full burden of proof is placed upon such union member, who thus would have to fight the international or the national union; and in that fight the limited, sparse, or—most often—nonexistent power of the individual union member would be pitted against the tremendous prestige and power of the national or the international union.

Mr. President, the philosophy behind my amendment is an old Anglo-American philosophy; it is a part of the deep-seated fundamentals of our law. It has been with us for a long time; and it has been protected and preserved for a good reason. In this case the philosophy is that the burden of proof for so serious a matter as destroying a local union, or local union autonomy—and that is what a trusteeship usually does—should rest upon the national union seeking to impose the trusteeship.

This is what we have done right along. If I, as a lawyer, seek to impose a receivership on a corporation, it is required of me that I go before a judge. Then I make out what we call a prima facie case—a good enough case—to warrant that judge's holding who can thus say: "Yes, I think there is good reason for believing that the assets of this corporation may be dissipated, or that the property may be damaged, and that urgent action is required. I will give you a temporary receivership." Usually the court will say, "You come back in 30 days. The corporation involved will have an opportunity to show why the receivership should not be made permanent."

With respect to a union receivership, or trusteeship, as it is called, no such opportunity is given the local. As things stand now, the international clamps on a trusteeship, a stranger moves in, takes over the assets and control of the local, and for 18 months the trusteeship may go unchallenged.

In the past, as we know from the revelations of the McClellan committee, and as we know from litigation, the imposition of trusteeships was one of the greatest abuses of the Teamsters Union. My recollection is that more than 120 trusteeships were imposed by that union, some of them for more than 20 years. Think of it. For more than 20 years, the local members, the wage earners, were without any say at all with respect to their local unions.

I said earlier, and I now repeat, great credit is due to the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from North Carolina. Their bill provides improvements. Under it there is a requirement that there be an accounting. It is required that the local cannot send delegations to national conventions. There have been other changes. They are improvements. But the basic fault I find with the situation is that which I emphasized a moment or so ago—that it is not within our philosophy of the law to allow a local union, any more than we would any other such body, to have inflicted on it control by an outside body, without the local union or corporate body having an opportunity to say, "Nay, and here is why we say nay."

All I seek by the amendment is to give the members of a local union an opportunity to say to someone, a judge, or other competent authority, "This trusteeship should not be imposed on us. We run our affairs decently. Our affairs are properly handled. There is no hazard to our organization." As conditions now exist, no such opportunity is given. That is the heart and soul of my amendment. I find it difficult to understand the reason for opposing it.

Let me say one or two more things about the amendment. I have asked that there be distributed and placed on the desks of Senators an explanation of the amendment.

To refer to trusteeship proceedings, under the amendment, before imposing a trusteeship a national union must apply to the Secretary of Labor for a temporary 30-day order granting it. The Secretary shall issue such a temporary order if proof establishing probable cause is submitted by the national union at an ex parte hearing.

I say that is all right. Let the national unions proceed ex parte, because there are possible dangers in having a public hearing. The head of an international union might very well feel that the affairs of a local union located in Connecticut, for example, were being badly handled. He could go the the Secretary of Labor ex parte, make his prima facie case and get a 30-day order. That would be all right. That is the first remedy the amendment provides.

Second, within those 30 days, if the Secretary of Labor grants the order, he shall conduct a hearing in which the claims of both the national and the local union will be heard. If the national union can establish clear and convincing proof that the trusteeship is justified, the Secretary may issue an order continuing it for a period of 1 year.

Under the bill before the Senate, the period provided is 18 months, but I think a year is long enough.

We go a little further in this amendment. Upon the expiration of the 1 year, the trusteeship shall be presumed to be invalid unless the Secretary sees fit to extend it for an additional period not longer than 1 year.

That is fair, is it not? I want to give the organizations time enough, if they really need a trusteeship; but I say let us make it a year first, and then let them come back and establish, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Labor, that they need more time. That is not asking too much of a national or an international union that wants to lay its hands on a local.

I have stated the salient and important points of the amendment.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DODD. Yes, of course; I am happy to yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Will the Senator from Connecticut point out what is necessary to be done, under the provisions of the bill, for national organizations to impose a trusteeship?

Mr. DODD. Not a thing; they simply impose it. There is no condition or qualification at all provided in the bill. They would be able to do what they have been doing—merely impose the trusteeship, that is all.

Mr. LAUSCHE. After they have decided to impose a trusteeship and have "taken over," what, if anything, does the national organization have to do that provides safeguards and assures the restoration of control to the members of the local union?

Mr. DODD. I am tempted to say "Nothing."

Mr. LAUSCHE. I think if the Senator said so he would be correct.

Mr. DODD. It is true except in the bill it is required that a financial report must be filed, and that no delegates can be selected or elected to attend a national convention. That is an improvement. However, the overall answer to the question of the Senator from Ohio is "Nothing."

On the other side of the question, if I am a member of a local union, and I am aggrieved, and I know my local never should have had a trusteeship imposed on it, what can I do? Under the bill, it is pretty difficult for me to do anything. If I am a carpenter, for example, I must find a way to reach the Secretary of Labor. I must pay my expenses to come to Washington. I must hire a lawyer. After I get through all that, if I am able to do that much, the Secretary of Labor must go into a United States district court and must fulfill the highest evidentiary standard established in this land. He must establish, by clear and convincing proof—which we as lawyers know is the highest evidentiary standard, that a trusteeship should not have been imposed. I say that is wrong.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Do I correctly understand the position of the Senator from Connecticut to be that when the national organization alleges the local organization is unfit to handle its own affairs, it should be required to prove the allegation before it is permitted to take over?

Mr. DODD. Exactly, with the one condition which my amendment sets forth.

I know, and I am sure the Senator from Ohio knows, that there may be an urgency about imposing a trusteeship, or a receivership as I prefer to refer to these situations. It is provided in the amendment that on application to the Secretary of Labor, the Secretary may grant a temporary order.

The answer to the question is that within 30 days the temporary order either must be dissolved, or it must be made permanent for 1 year.

Mr. LAUSCHE. And within the 30 days proof has to be offered that the grounds upon which the trusteeship has been asked have been established?

Mr. DODD. That is correct. That is the purpose.

I will say to my colleagues, I share, I am sure, the view of all Senators. What are we trying to do? We are trying to make labor actually stronger. I am, at least, and I think other Senators are, also.

We have a great labor movement in this country. We are told it composes 16 million members. I think it is fair to multiply, to get the effect, by at least 3 and perhaps more. If we multiplied by 3, we would be considering in excess of 45 million people, and probably 50 million.

The field of labor affects the lives of all of us. The way the affairs of labor are conducted is important to every one of us. If the labor leaders want to have a strong, healthy, and growing organization, they will not resist these attempts to make labor free and democratic. They ought to be urging us to do these things, rather than opposing them.

Yesterday I offered an amendment to require a labor organization to give written notice 15 days before the annual election of officers. What a simple thing to ask. What a simple thing to ask, yet some union leaders, mad with power, resist it.

I do not refer, of course, to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, who has his intellectual reasons for opposition. I am careful to say I do not refer to the Senator from Massachusetts, but I heard this from outside. And I want the Senator from Massachusetts to know that I have the highest respect and admiration for him and his work.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. DODD. I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. What answer is given by those who say that the national organization should be permitted, in its own judgment, to impose a trusteeship, and should not be required to prove that the charges which it makes are true?

Mr. DODD. I asked my friends in the labor movement, who came to me after I had the amendment placed on the desk and who said, "This is a terrible thing you are doing to us. It will destroy us and make it impossible to operate our unions." I said, "Tell me why, where, and how it will do that." I never heard a good answer. I am trying to think of what their excuses were. I believe they said, in effect, they simply could not operate properly. That is all it amounted to, to my ears. I said to some of them, as I say to my colleagues in this distinguished body, "You had better change your philosophy about your organization. Yours is not a private empire or a private club. It is an organization charged with the greatest public interest, particularly in the kind of society and economy in which we are living."

I said, "I am on your side. I want you to do well. By instinct, by background and by experience I am on your side. But when you talk about retaining power in unreasonable terms I am not on your side."

I have heard it said, "Oh, you are letting the Federal Government intervene between the local and the international, and what a dreadful thing that is." That has not been dreadful in any other phase of our life, of our society, or of our economy. We have found it necessary and essential many times. I think it is necessary and essential in this instance.

I hope that the Members of this body will agree to this amendment, because it is the right thing to do. I shall be glad to hear from those who may say it is wrong. Let us hammer this problem out. If I am mistaken, I will be the first to say so. I have no ax to grind. I want to see this matter handled properly.

It will be argued, probably, "What harm can be done? The union has to account for the money. It cannot elect any delegates to a national convention."

As I have said two or three times tonight, that is good, but it is not good enough. We know what happens when a great international union places its trustee or receiver over a local. We know enough about human nature to know what happens.

When such a man goes into one of the small communities in my State, a town of 20,000 or 30,000 people, we know what happens. I do not want to name one of those towns, because I would hear from home afterward if I did, but they are all good, and alike. The trustee moves in and says to the president of the local "Move out; all you local officers get out. I am taking over. I am taking over your bank account and taking over all your affairs." Everybody in that small town is affected in greater or less degree according to the importance of the local.

After 18 months, I will say to the Senate, whatever shadow of local authority or local autonomy existed at the imposition of the trusteeship will have withered and vanished. The local members are men with families, who work for wages. Those men become frightened. They say, "Well, there has been a change. We like John, but he is out." They begin to bend under the terrible forces. There are social and economic forces, in this case the forces of labor, and they begin to bend their wills. We shall do a terrible thing to people if we allow this to happen.

The whole procedure is wrong. What the amendment suggests is right. No one will suffer from it, but good will come from it.

Mr. President, I am not too familiar with the procedures, since I am a new Senator, but I want to have a yea-and-nay vote on the amendment, so I ask for the yeas and nays. I think this is an important matter.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Washington.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington is recognized.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I thank the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. President, I have a matter of interest, and if I ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question I think we can clear it up, to save some time, rather than making it necessary for me to offer an amendment.

In 1950 there was established a Labor-Management Maritime Committee. The establishment of this committee was urged by the Chairman of the United States Maritime Commission, the Office of the President, and by myself. The chairman of the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries also participated. The membership of the committee consists of labor unions and steamship companies. Simply stated, the objective of the committee is to take every appropriate action to protect and promote an adequate American merchant marine. The committee does not participate in collective bargaining on wages, hours, and conditions of employment. As a practical matter, the committee acts only on issues where there is unanimity among all members, both labor and management. Committee policy, intent, and operation make it crystal clear that it cannot thwart the collective bargaining procedures of labor unions or commit unfair labor practices against employers or unions.

I am not clear as to whether this type of an organization is exempt from the provisions of S. 1555, and more particularly section 102, pages 8 and 9, and section 302, page 26. I do not believe that it is the intent of this bill to cover the officers and staff of a labor-management organization where payments are made by labor unions and companies by joint agreement to establish and maintain such an organization which functions openly and whose objectives are to jointly assist in the solution of problems jointly affecting management and labor in the maritime industry. Unless the junior Senator from Massachusetts can assure me that such a labor-management organization is exempt from the provisions of sections 102 and 302 I will offer at this time such an amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, if the purpose of the organization and its function and operation being carried out under those purposes are as the Senator from Washington has stated them, it is not intended that there should be any prohibition or limitation on the kind of operation which the Senator has described, so long as the objective is jointly and openly to assist in the solution of problems affecting management and industry in the same industry, and there is no attempt, directly or indirectly, to influence any employees to be represented other than through representatives of their own choosing. If that is the method of operation, it is not intended by the bill that they should be prohibited from functioning.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I thank the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from North Carolina.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senator from Pennsylvania yielding time for the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY]?

Mr. CLARK. I am.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I am satisfied that the Senator from Massachusetts and I have been just as much concerned about the plight of local unions placed in trusteeship as is the able junior Senator from Connecticut. I believe that the bill as now drawn furnishes adequate protection for the rank and file of members of unions which are placed in trusteeship.

The Senator from Massachusetts and other members of the McClellan rackets committee were, I think, greatly outraged by the arbitrary action of certain unions in placing in trusteeship their local unions, and, by so doing, depriving them not only of the management of their own fiscal affairs, but the right to select their own delegates and representatives to conventions of the international.

The bill is well designed to put an end to such malpractices in the internal affairs of unions. It now provides that no union officer or executive board may place any local union in trusteeship except for one or more of four specific reasons. Those specific reasons are enumerated on page 32 of the bill. They are as follows: "For the purpose of correcting corruption or financial malpractice, assuring the performance of collective bargaining agreements or other duties of a bargaining representative, restoring democratic procedures, or otherwise carrying out the legitimate objects of such labor organization."

By those specific declarations as to when a trusteeship should be permitted, the bill eliminates all arbitrary trusteeships and the grounds for such trusteeships.

In addition to specifying the particular situations under which a local union may be placed in trusteeship, the bill provides that whenever a local union is placed in trusteeship the officers exercising that power must make a written report to the Secretary of Labor within 30 days, in which they must state in detail the reasons which prompted their action in placing the local in trusteeship.

It necessarily follows that if they do not specify sufficient grounds within one of the four categories in which a trusteeship is permissible, the trusteeship can be dissolved by the Secretary without delay.

In addition to making a report in writing with 30 days setting forth in detail that the officers have placed the local in trusteeship for one of the four specified reasons, they must make an additional report every 6 months to the Secretary of Labor, showing why the organization is kept in receivership. Then it is provided that at any time within the first 18 months period, if anyone can show by clear and convincing evidence that the trusteeship was not imposed in good faith for one of the specific reasons permitted, it must be set aside.

We felt that we should preserve, so far as possible in this aspect of the internal affairs of unions, as much union control as possible, so long as the substantial rights of the local unions and the local union members were not impaired.

So all we do, in practical effect, is to create a presumption of regularity, which presumption, I believe, would arise in any case, because everyone is presumed to act according to the regulations which govern him.

By restricting the number of reasons for trusteeships, and by requiring a report within 30 days to the Secretary of Labor as to the specific reasons why each trusteeship was imposed, and requiring additional reports every 6 months as to why it is continued, we think we have provided sufficient protection for the rank-and-file members of the union.

In addition, there is a provision in the bill which takes care of the main reason why trusteeships are sometimes arbitrarily imposed, namely, to enable international officers to control the selection of delegates to international conventions. The bill contains a specific provision to the effect that the local union in trusteeship may be represented at an international convention only by delegates elected by a secret ballot of the members of the local.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President——

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, may I inquire whether the Senator from Connecticut wishes to use some of his own time?

Mr. DODD. Yes. I wish to take a few minutes.

Mr. CLARK. How much time remains on both sides?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts has 4 minutes, and the Senator from Connecticut has 10 minutes.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I shall dispense with formalities. I have only a few minutes.

The point of the answer of the Senator from North Carolina to my argument—and I think he will agree—is that the international can bring about this result without any check from outside.

There is no one to ask for an accounting. There is no one to check on the reasons. The slick lawyers of the international can write some pretty good reports. The point about a receivership, in the case of corporations, is that it acts under the supervision of some competent authority. That is what I am seeking by this amendment. I have specified the Secretary of Labor. If Senators desire to substitute a Federal judge, I shall be glad to accept such an amendment.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to me?

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I rise to oppose the pending amendment and support the position very ably taken by the Senator from North Carolina in support of the committee's action.

I think it is well known within the committee that I was never wedded to the period of 18 months in the committee version. I was perfectly willing—and still am—to accept a shorter period, perhaps 12 months.

What I wish to point out is that we should look at the trustee section of the bill as it comes to us in the light of the other sections of the bill, and note what the committee has done by way of setting up democratic procedures to protect the rank and file of the local unions. As we provide democratic guarantees in the bill, I believe we should keep at a minimum any interference with the operation of the internal affairs of the union. I do not believe we ought to accept and adopt an amendment which seeks to turn Congress, so to speak, into a sort of a constitutional convention for determining what the bylaws and constitutional provisions of a union shall be.

Let us not forget that under our bill, as we have submitted it to the Senate, there is a guarantee for secrecy in voting, and for democratic rights on the part of the rank and file members of the local union. They are guaranteed the right to elect their delegates to district and national and international conventions. Their delegates will have the authority to determine what amendments, if any, they want to adopt to existing constitutions, including trusteeship provisions. We either mean to say that we give these democratic rights to the unions or we mean to say, "After all, we are going to run your unions for you. We will tell you how to run your trusteeships. You will not be able to do it under your own democratic procedures."

Let us not forget that in the language of the bill the Secretary of Labor is given remarkable surveillance authority over trusteeships. I suggest that what we ought to do is to take the language the committee has offered to the Senate, let it operate and see if it will not bear out what we have in mind, along the line suggested by the able Senator from North Carolina. Let us not set ourselves up as a constitutional convention for the unions of the country in respect to trusteeships.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I yield myself 5 minutes. I rise in opposition to the pending amendment and in support of the position of the committee, particularly of the position taken by the chairman of the subcommittee, the Senator from Massachusetts.

The committee has labored long and hard, not only last year, when I was not a member of the committee, but this year also, when I have been a member, to deal with these intensely complicated problems, of which the proper handling of trusteeships is only one.

The Senator from Connecticut will correct me if I am wrong, but it is my understanding that his amendment was never submitted to the committee for consideration, and no suggestions were made as to the proper handling of this very complicated matter. On the other hand, the committee devoted many hours to the provisions of title II of the pending bill. The Senator from North Carolina and the Senator from Oregon—the latter being a most distinguished member of the committee—have spoken of the procedure which has been set up to handle the trusteeship subject in the bill after very careful and hard work and thought on the subject.

It occurs to me that it is not the proper way to legislate to change on the floor of the Senate, with the cursory consideration which can be given to the pending amendment, the provision which the committee has carefully worked out.

Turning from that principle to the specifics of the particular matter under consideration, I suggest that the pending amendment is unsound, because it will permit a corrupt, inept, incapable local union to defend itself against the imposition of a trusteeship by its parent body, which, in the interest of the integrity of the whole union, needs to move in and remove corruption and inefficiency from the local ranks.

That is particularly true with respect to the Teamsters.

The matter is of particular importance to me because such a situation exists in the city of Philadelphia today. I should dislike very much to see the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut adopted, because it would represent a roadblock in the way of cleaning up corrupt Teamster units in the city of Philadelphia and also throughout the country. I hope that the pending amendment will be defeated and that the committee will be supported.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote! Vote!

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, how much time do I have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut has 8 minutes remaining.

Mr. DODD. How much time does the opposition have?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fourteen minutes.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold that suggestion?

Mr. DODD. I withhold it.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield me some time.

Mr. DODD. I yield 4 minutes to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. KENNEDY. I am prepared to have a quorum call if the Senator will yield all time but 4 or 5 minutes. I am prepared to limit myself to the same time.

Mr. DODD. I should like to have some time for the final argument on the proposition to answer the arguments which have been made against the amendment. I do not know how it is done, but I have heard other Senators ask how much time has expired. I am trying to get the last voice on the subject. I do not know who is actually entitled to it.

Mr. KENNEDY. Together, there is how much time remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eight minutes and fourteen minutes, respectively.

Mr. KENNEDY. I will yield back all of my time except 8 minutes, if the Senator is prepared to do likewise.

Mr. DODD. Why does not the Senator from Massachusetts yield some time to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. KENNEDY. I shall be glad to yield 4 minutes to the Senator from Ohio out of my time.

Mr. DODD. It is very gracious of the Senator from Massachusetts to do such a fair and generous thing. I appreciate it very much. It is typical and characteristic of him.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, there is great strength in the argument which has been made by the Senator from Connecticut in support of his amendment. As I read the provision on trusteeships, a national union, by filing a report with the Secretary of Labor alleging one of the four provisions enumerated as a cause for the creation of a trusteeship, would immediately have the power to step in and run the local union.

In the running of the local union there may be two important aspects. First, the choice of delegates to the convention. That has been eliminated. The second is the emoluments which can come in the hiring of the workers in the local union and the payment which is given to them.

Let us take the instance of Hoffa. He can, by filing, through his lawyer, a declaration with the Secretary of Labor, setting forth one of the four reasons stated, obtain a receivership. With it he obtains complete control. Thereafter he must file a report giving the name of the local, the address of the local, and the reason for the imposition of the trusteeship. Then he continues in control. There is contained in the bill language to the effect that the receivership shall continue unless a complaint, by clear and convincing proof, shows that the trusteeship has not been established in good faith.

Mr. DODD. That is what is called the highest evidentiary standard we have in our law. Does not the Senator agree with me?

Mr. LAUSCHE. I know of no other standard in law which is higher.

Mr. DODD. A very heavy burden would be put on the local union member under the clear and convincing proof doctrine. A craftsman trying to fight the unfair imposition of a trusteeship on a local would be burdened with the hardest evidentiary doctrine in law.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LAUSCHE. I do not have much time.

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield 2 additional minutes to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. ERVIN. I am sure the Senator would not want it to be unclear or unconvincing proof.

Mr. DODD. No, but it ought to be reasonable proof. That is ordinarily the doctrine.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The Senator from North Carolina was a distinguished and able judge. In criminal cases the proof must be beyond a reasonable doubt; in fraud cases, the proof must be clear and convincing; and in the ordinary cases the proof must be by the preponderance of the evidence.

Here we would say to the local union and to the local members: "This receivership shall not be lifted unless you, by clear and convincing proof, show that it was imposed in bad faith."

I am led to the conclusion that if a Hoffa can get a receivership on the simple filing of a declaration with the Secretary of Labor, and the receivership cannot be lifted except by clear and convincing proof, there is something wrong.

Mr. KENNEDY. I am prepared to yield back all but 3 minutes of my time, if the Senator from Connecticut will do likewise.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, do I still have 7 minutes remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut has 8 minutes remaining.

Mr. DODD. I do not know what the practice is in the Senate; but I want to have enough time on the amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator from Connecticut will have it.

Mr. MORSE. Will the Senator yield 1 minute to me, so that I may suggest the possible substitution of one word, which might help the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield 1 minute to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORSE. On page 34, line 5, the language reads: "except upon clear and convincing proof." I think there is some merit in the position taken by the Senator from Connecticut in this matter. I suggest to the chairman of the committee that there be substituted for "clear and convincing proof" the phrase "prima facie evidence that the trusteeship was not established in good faith" or "except by the greater weight of evidence."

Mr. KENNEDY. Is that a term of art?

Mr. MORSE. "By the greater weight of the evidence" is a term of art.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I should like to know whose time is being used for this discussion?

Mr. MORSE. The time of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. DODD. In a similar instance, I remember being swindled out of time in the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. KENNEDY. I ask that the Senator from Oregon have the remaining time to work out a solution of the problem with the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. DODD. Provided I will still have my 5 minutes.

Mr. MORSE. I think we can meet this problem.

Mr. DODD. I will take a minute. I am gratified and encouraged by the suggestion of the distinguished Senator from Oregon. But his proposal will not cure my difficulty. It goes deeper. I do not think I should take the time of the Senate to have a conference. I will be glad to say: Certainly; change the word to "reasonable" or whatever improvement was suggested. That will be better. But it does not go deep enough. It would not solve the difficulty which I am trying to resolve.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote! Vote!

Mr. DODD. I am not prepared to vote, Mr. President. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will have to yield back his time.

Mr. KENNEDY. I will yield back my time.

Mr. DODD. No; I do not want to do that in order to have a quorum call. I will use up my time. I am not trying to delay the Senate. I do not enjoy arguments about these matters. Certain statements have been made to which I think I should retort or make answer. What were those statements? It has been alleged by the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DODD. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may suggest the absence of a quorum, without the time for the quorum call being charged to either side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold the suggestion of the absence of a quorum while I make one other procedural suggestion, namely, that the Senator from Connecticut be allowed an additional 4 minutes on the bill, if he needs it?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I will be glad to yield that much time without such a suggestion.

Mr. DODD. I do not want it to appear that I am asking for time unneccessarily or for reasons of delay. But this is an important issue.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas has asked unanimous consent that there be a quorum call without the time for the quorum call being charged to either side. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Massachusetts to yield me 1 minute on the bill.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield 1 minute on the bill to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORSE. I desire to ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether, if after action is taken on the Dodd amendment, I should offer the following perfecting amendment to the bill itself, would he accept it? I suggest the following changes:

On page 34 of the bill, line 5, strike out the words "clear and convincing", which would leave the requirement of proof we have been discussing read as follows: "Except upon proof that the trusteeship".

From the standpoint of the weight of the evidence, that, of course, is the lowest evidentiary requirement, instead of what the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Connecticut have been pointing out was the highest evidentiary requirement. All we seek is proof.

Second, on line 3 and line 8 of page 4, reduce "eighteen" to "twelve," so it will read 12 months instead of 18 months.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I think the Senate should understand what we have before us. When a trusteeship is imposed, it is presumed valid for 12 months, with the understanding that if anyone can present proof that the trusteeship was not imposed for good reason, it can be set aside.

Second, during the period the trusteeship is in effect, no money can be transferred, no votes can be taken on behalf of the trusee local at an election.

Third, at the end of a year it is presumed invalid.

I think this is a long step forward. If the Senator from Connecticut will accept the proposal, I think we shall have improved the bill substantially. I hope this substantial improvement will be accepted.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I am in favor of that change, but I do not think it goes far enough. I would like to have it go further.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I am willing to yield back the time remaining to me on the amendment, and have a vote taken on it.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut has 7 minutes remaining to him.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, does the Senator from Connecticut want to speak last?

Mr. DODD. Yes.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield back all my remaining time.

Mr. DODD. It is very generous of the Senator from Massachusetts to do that.

Mr. President, perhaps I am a little too interested in this matter. I appreciate that the Senator from Massachusetts has worked diligently and faithfully on this task. I do not overlook that. The other members of the committee have worked hard, also.

I do not want to leave the impression that I am offering an amendment at the last minute. Some question was raised about that by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK]. This amendment did not occur to me, actually, until 5 or 6 days ago. I tried to see the bill. It became available a little late, as we all know. I would have suggested the amendment to the committee had it occurred to me. I would have preferred to handle it that way.

Let me see what the arguments are against the amendment as offered. It is said that delegates cannot be elected any more. When I said delegates cannot be elected any more, I meant that in the situation now existing, under the trusteeship, the trustee selects the delegates. It is true that cannot be done under the Kennedy-Ervin bill. But think of this: The mere presence of a receiver or trustee is of great weight and influence on the membership who are selecting the delegates. I do not think I have to labor that oar very much. Merely having that kind of fellow around the place is not conducive to an expression of free will. The union members know he is there. They know he is going to be there for 18 months. They are thinking of what can be done on job assignments and job referrals. Senators know what I mean. I do not have to spell it out. His influence is there if he does not say a word about the selection of delegates.

It is also said that the Secretary of Labor has surveillance over the trusteeships. That is not so. I do not mean to say it is untruthful to have suggested it, but I mean it is factually not so. The Secretary of Labor does not have anything to do with the imposition of trusteeships. Mr. Hoffa simply imposes them; that is all. I am taking the worst possible example. It may be said that "DODD is picking out Hoffa again." Our country has been alerted to the danger that exists because of Hoffa. There may be a Hoffa tomorrow as there was yesterday and still is today. I do not want to see any more of them. I do not think our country can survive that. Are we going to allow the likes of him to impose a trusteeship on a local and not be answerable to anybody except perhaps some poor individual member of a local union who does not have the resources to challenge him, through the Secretary of Labor, or the Department of Labor, in a U.S. district court? That is what is wrong with the bill, and I am trying to correct it by this amendment.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DODD. I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is it not a fact that if a union member should complain to the Secretary of Labor that the trusteeship had been improperly imposed by Hoffa, Hoffa could appear before the Secretary of Labor, if he wanted to, sit down, and watch the complainant try to prove that Hoffa had done the wrong thing?

Mr. DODD. Of course. We know what Mr. Hoffa can do and what he has done. He can hire the finest legal talent in the country, and he can afford to pay for it. He uses the dues of the local union to defeat the members of the same local in the effort to overcome injustice.

Let us be honest about this matter. There will be more motions and more pleadings and more difficulties than all of us who are lawyers in this body can think of tonight. That is the reality of the situation. Let us not talk about it in technical or foolish terms. That is what will happen.

It has also been said, since the international can be brought before the Secretary of Labor, that would be a cure-all. Really it would not be. This relates to the argument I just made. I have tried to reason this matter out. I have tried to think, "Why am I in favor of this, and why should I try to persuade my colleagues or the American people to be in favor of it?" I think the best reason I can offer for it, putting aside the revelations before the McClellan committee, is that such a process is, in my judgment, at least, actually taking property without due process of law. When a czar like Hoffa can impose a receivership on a local union and decide what will happen for 1 month, 1 day, or any length of time, it is too long, to say nothing of the 18 months.

I want to have the Senate say, "You cannot do that. You have to conduct yourself the way the rest of us conduct ourselves. You have to be subject to some authority, either that of the Secretary of Labor or of a Federal court."

I have said to the Senator from Massachusetts that I would be glad to change the language and put it in such form that a Federal judge or anyone else who is felt to be competent could make the decision. For heaven's sake, let us not let Hoffa make the decision for 1½ million Teamsters for 18 months, 18 days, 18 minutes, or 18 seconds. He should not have that power or authority.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield 1 minute to the Senator from Oregon from the time on the bill.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I cannot understand why the Senator from Connecticut says the Secretary of Labor has no voice in this matter of a trusteeship. I read to Senators from page 33 of the bill, section 204:

> Upon the written complaint of any member or subordinate body of a labor organization alleging that such organization has violated the provisions of section 202 or 203, the Secretary shall investigate the complaint and if the Secretary finds probable cause to believe that such violation has occurred and has not been remedied he shall, without disclosing the identity of the complainant, bring a civil action in any district court of the United States having jurisdiction of the labor organization—

I do not know what more power one would want to give the Secretary.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. DODD. I tried to protect myself in order to have the last word, and I was assured I would have it. Now I have been done out of it. How did that happen?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes to the Senator from Connecticut.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts yielded time to the Senator from Oregon from the time on the bill.

Mr. DODD. I merely wish to say that my able colleague from Oregon is a great lawyer, and I have great respect for him. I respect him in a debate. He is an amazingly competent and extraordinarily articulate man. He has a great mind. I do not relish challenge of his views, but the section to which the Senator has referred does not, in my judgment, cure the difficulties about which I have spoken.

I will not labor the subject any longer, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DODD]. On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] are absent on official business.

I also announce that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. BIBLE] is absent because of a death in his family.

I further announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR] is absent because of illness.

On this vote, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] is paired with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. BIBLE]. If present and voting, the Senator from Arkansas would vote "yea" and the Senator from Nevada would vote "nay."

Mr. KUCHEL. I announce that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CARLSON] is absent on official business, and is paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY]. If present and voting, the Senator from Kansas would vote "yea" and the Senator from Minnesota would vote "nay."

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] is necessarily absent, and if present and voting would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 41, nays 51, as follows:

NOT VOTING—6

So Mr. DODD's amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I should like to have the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts for a moment. Although we have voted on the Dodd amendment, and our proposed modification was not accepted, nevertheless I believe good faith requires that we still offer a perfecting amendment. I should like to suggest to my chairman that, on page 34 of the bill, in line 3, "eighteen months" be changed to "twelve months"; that on line 5 we strike out the words "clear and convincing"; and that on line 8 we change "eighteen months" to "twelve months."

We have previously offered to do that, and I believe we should stand by our offer. If it was good then, it is good now. I suggest that the Senator from Massachusetts ask to amend the bill accordingly.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I accept the amendments suggested by the Senator from Oregon. I hope the Senate will accept them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE].

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I have a series of 6 or 7 amendments, and I shall offer them, to the surprise of everyone in the Senate, I believe, with remarkable rapidity. I wish to say something about the amendments and also something about their origin. They are very important as perfecting amendments.

I send to the desk my first amendment, and I yield myself 5 minutes on it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 38, line 9, after the word "finds" it is proposed to insert the following: "after hearing in accordance with the Administrative Procedure Act."

On page 38, line 12, after the word "removed" insert a comma.

On page 38, line 13, after the word "hearing" insert a comma.

Mr. MORSE. I start out with this amendment because I want to see if I can have an amendment adopted by the Senate which suggests merely the adding of a few commas to a bill. That is all that is involved. The purpose is to provide literary clarity. That is the substance of the first amendment. I will speak to the first amendment and tell the Senate about the origin of the amendments I intend to offer. I have never yet, in my service in the Senate, failed to put all my cards on the table, to use a colloquialism, and I will never fail to do so.

For 15 years the RECORD is replete with the number of times I have stood on the floor and urged to proposed legislation amendments seeking to provide procedural checks on the exercise of discretionary power by the administrators of the laws of Congress.

It happens to be a very deep conviction of mine that essential to a government of law is the necessity at all times to maintain adequate checks upon the discretion of administrative officials.

My chairman knows that in committee on several occasions I said I felt the bill did not provide all the checks it ought to provide on the discretion granted the Secretary of Labor by the bill. I said I thought that whenever he had to render a decision, and whenever he had to make a judgment, which in effect took away a right or a privilege, or which denied an exemption or imposed it on one group and not on other groups, or uniformly on all groups, his decision or judgment ought to be reviewed. I believe there ought to be a check on such discretion.

The Administrative Procedure Act provides adequate checks, and we ought to write them into the bill, as my amendments do, wherever they are not already provided.

That was my position on the bill long before any representatives of labor came to see me. I am sorry that some representatives of employers did not come to me too, because employers have as much interest, and as much at stake, in checking the arbitrary discretionary power of Government officials as do labor leaders or unions, or any other group.

That was my position in committee before any representatives of labor came to me on this matter. I wish the record to show that after I took that position in committee the first representative of labor who came to me was a representative of the Teamsters. I thought the Senate should know that. That does not make these amendments Teamsters amendments. It makes them Morse amendments. I have a long record, as I have said, in favor of checking arbitrary discretion proposed in legislative measures, but I also want the record to show that there is no doubt about the fact that a lawyer representing the Teamsters has made a good many suggestions proceduralwise in regard to amendments to the bill. I wish the RECORD to show also that, in my judgment, I did not agree with the representations of the representatives of labor on an overwhelming majority of the amendments which they suggested to me. It makes no difference to me what the source of an idea is. If the idea or the recommendation proves to be a sound one, it should be adopted on its merits.

Last night, until midnight, some of us met with a lawyer from the Teamsters Union for a final consideration of some of these proposals. We had previously met with lawyers from other unions, not at all connected with the Teamsters Union. I wish to make that statement because the RECORD should show the facts.

I am proud to present these amendments, not because they are sponsored by anyone in the legal profession within the labor movement, but because they are sponsored by me on their merits. After we have completed consideration of the first "comma" amendment, I shall offer a second amendment, which is the first one that deals with the application of the Administrative Procedure Act.

I hope my chairman will follow me very closely, because I believe if he listens to the very brief arguments I will make, he will find himself in a position to accept most of the amendments which I am offering. At least, I hope so.

I yield back the remainder of my time on the first amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield myself 5 minutes. First, I wish to say that the statement of the able Senator from Oregon is in keeping with the way he approaches every public question. The amendments should be viewed as being of importance, and therefore the Senate should consider them carefully. I do not believe that I shall be able to accept all of them, but I shall be glad to give my reasons, whether the Teamsters Union likes them or not.

The effect of the first one is to make the Administrative Procedure Act apply if the Secretary of Labor should deny to a union which has less than 200 members and an income of less than $20,000 the union's application for an exemption. Is that correct?

Mr. MORSE. Yes. Let me take the Senator through the amendment. Let us turn to page 38. I ask that commas be inserted. I overlooked the first part of the amendment. On page 38, line 9, after the word "finds," I would insert "after hearing in accordance with the Administrative Procedure Act."

The language would then read:

(g) If the Secretary, upon application of any member of a local labor organization engaged in an industry affecting commerce, finds, after hearing in accordance with the Administrative Procedure Act, that the constitution and bylaws of such labor organization do not provide an adequate procedure—

Then it provides for the rendering of a decision by the Secretary of Labor.

He will have to make a finding whether the constitution and bylaws of such organization do not provide an adequate procedure. Why should not there be a check on that judgment. It will not be very difficult to provide it. It will require a simple hearing, which will take only a few minutes. But it will remove the fear on the part of any labor organization that it may be subjected to an arbitrary exercise of power on the part of the Secretary of Labor. All I say is: Give the labor organization a hearing. It will not take long. I do not think any Secretary of Labor would hesitate at all to give such a hearing.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. CARROLL. Who will make the decision?

Mr. MORSE. The Secretary of Labor will hold the hearing. He will have to take the testimony and make the record. I suppose the organization will want to give testimony. It will want to say that its constitution and bylaws afford all the protection that is needed.

Mr. CARROLL. Would the decision of the Secretary be reviewable by the courts?

Mr. MORSE. It would be, if the organization wanted to appeal the case under the Administrative Procedure Act.

Mr. CARROLL. So they would have another check and balance.

Mr. MORSE. Certainly; and I am all for it.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, this is not the amendment I thought it was. This amendment merely provides that the Secretary of Labor is to make a finding that if there is no proper procedure in regard to the removal of an officer the Administrative Procedure Act will be in effect, and that act merely provides that due notice shall be given. It does not in any way weaken the bill; it merely provides equitable treatment.

Mr. MORSE. Every time provision is made for the use of the Administrative Procedure Act, the bill is strengthened.

Mr. KENNEDY. I accept the amendment.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Is it not true that the parent of the Administrative Procedure Act in the House was the Honorable FRANCIS E. WALTER, and that the parent in the Senate was the late Honorable Patrick McCarran?

Mr. MORSE. I believe that is true.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. CARROLL. In other words, the amendment simply affords the due process by checks and balances which were created by Congress in 1946 under the Administrative Procedure Act.

Mr. MORSE. I simply want to be consistent with that act. I thank the Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] is agreed to.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I call up my second amendment which is at the desk and is marked "Amendment No. 2."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 43, line 17, at the end of the sentence, it is proposed to insert the following new sentence:

In making determinations under this subsection, the Secretary shall comply with sections 5 and 6 of the Administrative Procedure Act.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask Senators to turn to page 43, line 17, of the bill. At the end of that sentence, I simply add, again, a specific reference to the Administrative Procedure Act as a check upon the decisions which will be rendered by the Secretary of Labor in administering this particular section.

I ask the chairman of the committee if he is willing to accept this amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. Once again, if we may have copies of the amendments, I think we can make our decisions promptly.

Mr. MORSE. I am very sorry. I asked to have copies made available. The explanation of the amendment is that after section (b) page 43, line 17, it simply provides that in making the determinations under this subsection the Secretary shall comply with sections 5 and 6 of the Administrative Procedure Act.

Mr. KENNEDY. I will accept the amendment. Once again, it provides for the application of the Administrative Procedure Act.

I yield back the remainder of my time on the amendment.

Mr. MORSE. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] is agreed to.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I call up my amendment numbered 3.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On Page 43, line 7, after "file" it is proposed to insert: "information required by said titles."

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I think this is a clarifying amendment. It makes clear the type of information which is sought to be filed.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield myself 2 minutes. It seems to me that on page 43, line 7, instead of saying "information required by title I or title II," the Senator should say: "such information."

Mr. MORSE. I accept the modification.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], as modified, is agreed to.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I call up my amendment numbered 4.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 18, line 21, after the word "Secretary," it is proposed to insert the following: "upon application by a labor organization or employer".

On page 18, line 22, after the word "for" to insert the word "such".

On page 19, line 3, after the word "thereby" to insert a comma and add: "Provided further, That the Administrative Procedure Act shall be applicable to such revocations."

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, if the chairman of the subcommittee will bear with me, we might go through the amendment together. On page 18, line 21, after "Secretary," it is proposed to insert "upon application by a labor organization or employer."

Then, because it is related to the following language, I will proceed to the next line on page 18, line 22: After "for", it is proposed to insert "such."

On page 19, line 3, which is really the heart of the amendment, after "thereby" it is proposed to insert a comma and add "Provided further, That the Administrative Procedure Act shall be applicable to such revocation."

I call the attention of the Senate to what is provided in subsection (b):

The Secretary shall have authority to issue, amend, and rescind rules and regulations prescribing the form, time of filing, and publication of reports required to be filed under this Act and such other reasonable rules and regulations (including rules prescribing reports concerning building funds, trusts, or enterprises financed by a labor organization) as he may find necessary to prevent the circumvention or evasion of such reporting requirements.

Again, it is the Secretary's judgment which is called for.

In exercising his power under this section the Secretary shall prescribe by general rule simplified reports for labor organizations or employers for whom he finds that by virtue of their size a detailed report would be unduly burdensome: Provided, That the Secretary may revoke such provision for simplified forms of any labor organization or employer if he determines, after such investigation as he deems proper, that the purposes of this section would be served thereby. The Secretary may exempt from the requirements of section 101, for such definite or indefinite periods as he may determine, any labor organization or class thereof temporarily convened either for the sole purpose of negotiating a labor agreement or for carrying out educational activity.

I suggest, on page 19, line 3, after "thereby," the insertion of a comma and the words: "Provided further, That the Administrative Procedure Act shall be applicable to such revocations."

Suppose a simplified form has been granted. All at once the Secretary says: "I revoke it."

The union replies: "That is unfair to us. There is no good reason to revoke it. We ought to have the benefit of the simplified form."

To use a hypothetical example to illustrate the procedural point, the union may contend, rightly or wrongly, that a particular Secretary of Labor, for some reason, has a bias against the union. They think he is unfair. They think he is prejudiced. They think he is trying to harass the union. I am talking about the fears which sometimes people, with human frailties, develop in this field.

I simply say that the Secretary ought to be perfectly willing to let the Administrative Procedure Act run its course and say why he thinks there should be a revocation. I think that with this provision in the bill, we will not find any unions coming forward and asking to have the Administrative Procedure Act apply so as to make a record against them, which that procedure will permit, unless they have a case. But they are entitled to a check, it seems to me. They are entitled to the opportunity to have a review. They are entitled to the right, even though they may be dead wrong, in thinking that the Secretary of Labor is discriminating against them in his revocation. That is all I am asking.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I should like to accept this amendment, but I do not think I can. The language in the bill was carefully worked out after thorough consultation. I think the Administrative Procedure Act, if applied to page 19, would offer some difficulties for the Secretary. I wonder if it would be possible to have the Senator from Oregon withdraw his amendment.

Mr. MORSE. No; I could not withdraw the amendment, because I really think it will strengthen the bill.

The Senator knows how much I would like to accommodate him. But I could not very well withdraw the amendment, inasmuch as the bill includes a provision which provides for the exercise of judgment or discretion by the Secretary of Labor. That provision would have a very definite effect, inasmuch as the Secretary of Labor could exercise his discretion—although we pray he never would—to the detriment of a group of workers; he could, if he wished to, exercise his discretion unfairly or in a discriminatory manner. Let us not forget that then they would have to remain in a status quo position until that action by the Secretary of Labor was reversed.

Under my proposal, the worker who was affected would be put in such a position that all he would have to do would be to come forward and, under the Administrative Procedure Act, ask the Secretary of Labor to show his reason for the revocation.

What is wrong with such a provision?

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield to me?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. CARROLL. I, too, seek information.

Under such circumstances, how could one say that action would be unfair or discriminatory? Can the Senator from Oregon give us an example?

I am generally in agreement with the Senator from Oregon in regard to what we call trusts involving rights.

Under the circumstances, if the Senator from Oregon will give us an illustration of the situation he has in mind, it may help us form our opinion of his amendment.

Mr. MORSE. I think the language of this part of the bill best illustrates the point; so I shall read the language, and then I shall refer to a hypothetical case.

I refer now to page 18, beginning in line 20, and reading as follows:

> In exercising his power under this section the Secretary shall prescribe by general rule simplified reports for labor organizations or employers for whom he finds that by virtue of their size a detailed report would be unduly burdensome.

Mr. CARROLL. What is the purpose of the report? What is the reason for it?

Mr. MORSE. This part of the bill provides either for the much longer reports, which call for much more detailed information; or, in the case of a small union, the bill calls for a much simplified report, which calls for less information.

The Secretary of Labor is to be given that discretion. Let us assume that the Secretary exercised it to the point of saying to unions X, Y, and Z, "File the short report"; and let us assume that they then filed the short report.

Mr. CARROLL. Is the simplified report provided for the purpose of informing the members? What is the purpose of the report?

Mr. MORSE. The purpose is, first, to keep the Secretary informed as to whether the union is operating in a manner inconsistent with the purposes of the act; and also, in the instances in which the reports are available to the members, to have the reports on file, so the union members can obtain them.

So let us assume that unions X, Y, and Z were granted permission, under this discretionary power on the part of the Secretary of Labor, to file the simplified report.

Then the bill provides:

> Provided, That the Secretary may revoke such provision for simplified forms of any labor organization or employer if he determines, after such investigation as he deems proper, that the purposes of this section would be served thereby.

Let us assume that the Secretary of Labor granted those unions authority to file the simplified report, on the ground that the longer report would be burdensome. Let us assume that the Secretary of Labor decided, under this discretionary power, to give them that privilege and that advantage. And then let us assume that at a later time he said to them, "I revoke it."

Let us assume that then the affected unions asked the Secretary, "Why? We would like to show that it is still burdensome to us to file the long report, and that you have no reasonable ground for revoking the privilege you have given us to file the simplified report. We do not think you should have the discretion first to blow hot, and then to blow cold—to change your mind from month to month. If you had a good ground for revoking the privilege, that would be different. But presumably the Congress provided for the filing of the simplified report because it was the intention of Congress that if unions found the longer report burdensome, you would grant them the privilege of filing the simplified report. So we do not think you have a good ground for revoking that privilege. We think you are penalizing us unfairly, improperly"—for any of the reasons they might conjure up.

Of course, one of the reasons for the Administrative Procedure Act is really to provide a forum in which emotional attitudes will not prevail, but in which evidence presented under the proper procedure will prevail.

Mr. CARROLL. Let us assume that the Secretary of Labor did do that very thing. Who would review his action?

Mr. MORSE. That would be done in accordance with whatever is provided for under the Administrative Procedure Act.

Mr. CARROLL. Let us assume that the matter went to the Circuit Court of Appeals. What would be the issue? The issue would be whether the Secretary of Labor had properly exercised his discretion in connection with that matter—which is one which, if I may say so to the Senator from Oregon, does not suggest due process, because such discretion would have been conferred on the Secretary of Labor by the Congress. So the issue or the question would be as to the manner in which he had exercised the discretion.

Let me say that I offer this suggestion in all sincerity. I support the Senator from Oregon 100 percent on the matter of due process. But in such a case the act would be a ministerial act.

Mr. MORSE. But it must be exercised reasonably, not arbitrarily. I think the union would have a hard time proving their case; but if they really had a case, they should have an opportunity to prove that the discretion was not exercised reasonably, but, instead, was exercised prejudicially or punitively or in a biased manner.

What would be wrong with allowing them an opportunity to present their case, if they had one?

Mr. CARROLL. But certainly the problem here has to do with the essence of the question of whether they should make a long report or a short report—a complicated report or a simplified report. In my opinion, this matter is not one for judicial review.

Mr. MORSE. But let us not forget that we in the Congress would say, according to this provision of the bill, "You are entitled to file a simplified report, if the filing of a longer report would be burdensome to you."

Mr. CARROLL. But this matter does not involve a question of due process; it relates to a question of administration.

Mr. MORSE. I am sure the Senator from Colorado does not mean that he does not favor providing for a procedural check in any case unless due process is involved.

Mr. CARROLL. But due process is not involved in the exercise of discretionary authority by an administrative officer, unless constitutional rights are involved.

I support the distinguished Senator from Oregon 100 percent on matters of proper review. But I submit to him that in this instance, this proposal would carry that point a little too far.

Mr. President, I submit this point to him, for his consideration.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I shall conclude my remarks by saying that when in this bill the Congress grants a union the right to file a short or simplified report in cases in which the longer report would be unduly burdensome, we mean to grant that privilege as a matter of right that should be granted in practice, and we mean that that privilege can be revoked only when cause is shown, only when it can be shown that there was justification for revoking it. Certainly such cause could not be simply the whim of the Secretary of Labor. Instead, there would have to be some good, demonstrable reason. When the unions affected charged that he did not have such a reason, they should have an opportunity to have his decision reviewed.

Mr. President, I submit my amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield back all time on the amendment remaining under my control.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I yield back all time remaining under my control.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All remaining time on the amendment has been yielded back.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I call up my next amendment, which is No. 5.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 23, in line 21, it is proposed to strike out line 21, line 22, and line 23, and in lieu thereof insert "in the district court or other court of the United States where the violation occurred or at the option of the parties in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia."

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask the Senate to turn to page 23 of the bill. It will be noted that my amendment proposes that on page 23, lines 21, 22, and 23 be stricken out and the following words be substituted: "in the district court or other court of the United States where the violation occurred or, in the event of inconvenience to the parties, then in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia."

The amendment covers this type of problem: Unions in my State are 3,200 miles or more from the District of Columbia. When violations occur there, I think it is only reasonable that the first requirement ought to be that the case be tried there, and that the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia should not be selected unless there is some doubt as to where the violation occurred. I can imagine how that could happen in a good many cases. When there is doubt about it, the Secretary ought to be able to bring the case in the District of Columbia; or, when it is perfectly obvious that the Secretary knows it is for the convenience of the parties, the case should be brought in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia.

I think it is pretty important in this democracy of ours, the cost of litigation being what it is and the cost of travel being what it is, that it be provided in the bill that a case should be tried in the district where the violation took place, rather than say, "We will bring it to the United States District Court for the District of Columbia."

I submit my amendment.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I should like to see if I understand the point which the very able Senator from Oregon is making. Is the Senator from Oregon saying that under the present wording of this clause, the Department of Justice would have the decision as to whether the case would be tried in the district where the violation occurred or in the District of Columbia itself?

Mr. MORSE. That is what I am saying. Let us look at the syntax of the sentence:

> Any such action against a labor organization may be brought in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia—

That is where it can be brought—> or in the district court or other court of the United States where the violation occurred.

In other words, what I am proposing to do is to rephrase the sentence and say, "In the first instance, you bring it in the district where the violation occurred. If, in the convenience of the parties, the District of Columbia court is the most desirable, bring it there." But if a violation took place in Portland, Oreg., where there is a U.S. court sitting in the Federal courthouse, the litigants should be permitted to say, "That is where we want to have justice rendered to us."

I think that is reasonable, and there should be language in the bill to indicate that is the procedure to be followed.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I think this is an acceptable amendment. I am prepared to accept it, and yield back my time.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado.

Mr. CARROLL. I think the Senator from Oregon in this case is perfectly correct. I make one qualification for the RECORD. In the event of a conspiracy, I think we should show the intent of the National Legislature that when a crime is committed in a State the case should be heard, insofar as possible, in that State. If the conspiracy extends to other districts, then we ought to lodge discretion in the Attorney General.

Did the Senator from Oregon hear my comment on that subject?

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield myself 2 minutes. I am not sure that the debate may not have distorted the actual meaning of the amendment proposal. The Senator from Colorado stated that his understanding of the amendment was that——

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, if I may interrupt the Senator from Massachusetts, the Senator from Oregon was busy conferring and did not hear what was stated.

Mr. MORSE. I beg the Senator's pardon. He knows what was happening.

Mr. CARROLL. If I may repeat what I said, I agree completely with the Senator from Oregon that if a violation occurs within the area of a Federal judicial district, the case ought to be tried there, rather than in the District of Columbia. I make one reservation. Let us assume the crime constitutes a conspiracy and is spread over several districts. I should like to hear the comment of the Senator from Oregon on that point.

Mr. MORSE. I think it is clear, under the amendment, that the case could be tried in the U.S. district court in the District of Columbia.

Mr. CARROLL. Or wherever it is believed the conspiracy can best be proved.

Mr. MORSE. Yes. I think the language "convenience of the parties" in my amendment covers that.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I am prepared to accept the amendment and yield back my time.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I yield back my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time on the amendment has been yielded back.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] on page 23, beginning on line 21.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I call up my amendment No. 6.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Oregon will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed, on page 8, line 16, to strike out the period and insert the following:

> Provided, That in the event of a denial of an exemption of this section the provisions of the Administrative Procedure Act shall become applicable.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I desire to invite the attention of the Senate for a moment to page 8 of the bill, in regard to the matter of exemptions of unions in accordance with size and receipts. Starting on page 8, line 6, the bill reads:

> The Secretary may exempt from the requirements of subsection (b) for such definite or indefinite periods as he may determine any labor organization or class thereof having fewer than two hundred members and having gross annual receipts of less than $20,000, including all sums paid over as dues or per capita tax to a parent or affiliated labor organization (excluding payments received by trustees under section 302(c) (5) or (6) of the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, as amended), if he finds that the exemption of such labor organization or class thereof would not interfere with the attainment of the objectives of this Act.

I propose, at the end of the sentence on line 16, to strike out the period and add the following language:

> Provided, That in the event of a denial of an exemption of this section, the provisions of the Administrative Procedure Act shall become applicable.

Let me advise Senators of the problem which, as I understand, is of concern to some labor groups. I suppose it is of particular concern to the Teamsters, but I am satisfied they are not alone. They feel that unless they have a right, under the Administrative Procedure Act, to show that they ought to be entitled to an exemption, they might be confronted at some time with an administrative officer who might be prejudiced against them and deny them exemptions.

What we are saying, as a Congress, I respectfully submit, is that Congress is instructing the Secretary of Labor that, as a matter of policy, we believe any labor organization or class thereof having fewer than 200 members and having gross annual receipts of less than $20,000 should be exempt.

That is the policy Congress is laying down. But we are not making a blanket exemption, because there may be some unions with less than 200 members or with less than $20,000 of receipts to which we ought to apply the full force of the act. Therefore, the Secretary of Labor ought to have the right to say, "I do not grant the exemption." But if he does not grant the exemption, the labor organization, upon application, ought to be heard on the exercise of that judgment under the procedures of the Administrative Procedure Act, because such a judgment would have a tremendous effect upon the union involved, whether it was X, Y, or Z.

All I am seeking to have inserted is a safeguard, so that a group will not have the right to say, "We are not going to get a square deal. We are getting a raw deal. We are not getting equal treatment. We are being discriminated against."

I also want to say to those who have any question about this amendment, keep in mind the position in which we are putting the Secretary of Labor.

I desire to stress the desirability of this type of an amendment from the standpoint of protecting the Secretary of Labor. I think the Secretary of Labor is entitled to the procedural safeguard which I have provided in the amendment. The Secretary can say, "Very well; come in under the processes of the Administrative Procedure Act. I will be glad to spread on the record the reason why I think you should not be exempt, since it would interfere with the objectives Congress set forth in the act."

I think if we put such a safeguard in the bill, no union would be resorting to the procedures of the Administrative Procedure Act, unless it had an extremely good case; because, until the union obtained a reversal of the decision of the Secretary of Labor, it would have to be considered as nonexempt.

We would be in no way giving any advantage by agreeing to my amendment, unless and until under the operation of the Administrative Procedure Act there were a decision to reverse the Secretary of Labor.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. CARROLL. I say to the Senator from Massachusetts that in my judgment the Senator from Oregon is perfectly correct. I believe this involves due process. It involves a notice of hearing and a notice of a trial. It could involve arbitrary and capricious action against 200 people and therefore those people have a right to a hearing. They are entitled to come under the Administrative Procedure Act.

I differentiate between this amendment and the earlier one offered by the Senator from Oregon which involved a mere ministerial question. This is a basic thing. This has a constitutional base in due process. Therefore, it should be reviewable upon arbitrary and capricious action of the Secretary.

Mr. MORSE. I understand the Senator's distinction. I think the Senator is clearly right in this instance. I would go a little further, even, in connection with a so-called ministerial act, when the exercise of the ministerial act has an effect upon and can have detrimental effect upon the people subject to the act.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I wonder if the Senator from Oregon would consider a modification of the wording of his amendment.

Mr. MORSE. I always try to be reasonable.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I think the modification would make the language more applicable. As I understand, the wording of the pending amendment, in part, is, "in the event of a denial of an exemption" the provisions of the Administrative Procedure Act shall be applicable.

Mr. MORSE. The Senator is correct.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Would the Senator consider adding, after the word "denial," a few words, to make it read: "In the event of a denial of an application for an exemption"?

In its present form the language would seem to require the carrying out of the Administrative Procedure Act whenever the Secretary of Labor denies an exemption. Should not the words "an application for" be included?

Mr. MORSE. I do not want to involve anyone else, but I should like to say there is an individual on the floor, upon whose advice the Senator from Illinois relies as a beneficiary a good many times, as it is true I do upon some of my assistants. That is the language we had in the amendment when we drafted it last night, but in the process of having the amendment copied the words which the Senator from Illinois has just used were by mistake omitted.

I accept the language, and also wish to state that language was used in the original form of the amendment.

When my staff copied the amendment, they did not write that particular language in the amendment. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will take note of the fact that by oversight or inadvertence those words were left out of my amendment. The amendment should read "denial of an application for exemption."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has a right to modify his own amendment.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I thank the Senator from Oregon for the compliment paid to my administrative assistant, and I wish to say I heartily join him in the commendation.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, it pains me to separate myself from three distinguished colleagues for whom I have a high regard. But, once again, although the agreement reached in the committee was not one in which I concurred completely, but, nevertheless, it was finally agreed to. In my opinion, it would be a mistake to undo this part of the bill, because there are a good many other Senators on the committee who committed themselves to other provisions as a part of a general agreement to support the Kennedy-Ervin bill.

I am willing to go quite far, even in spite of that, with respect to matters of great importance.

Let us consider a situation involving a paper local. The Secretary has made a general rule about exempting unions with fewer than 200 members or $20,000 in income. Let us assume the paper local makes a complaint. The Secretary's information perhaps is sparse. The Secretary may simply decide he wants these financial reports. And I believe he would trammel no one's rights by demanding one without going through a complicated procedure.

I thought the point the Senator from Colorado made 2 or 3 minutes ago was good, and it seems to me this case is parallel. It seems to me that no one's basic, personal rights would be denied by the Secretary, if the Secretary said he wanted financial information from the union.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield.

Mr. CARROLL. The Senator from Massachusetts is a great author and a great statesman.

Mr. KENNEDY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. CARROLL. But I cannot support the Senator on his agreement with the committee where constitutional rights are involved. That is what we are talking about. This is a question of due process.

Mr. KENNEDY. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. CARROLL. In a moment. This is a question of due process. We are talking about taking away the rights of people. We cannot do that in the committee, and we cannot do it in the Congress.

Let us talk about the paper locals. I will say, and I am very serious. If the Secretary of Labor wants a report of a paper union he will get a report, because the only thing which is reviewable under the Administrative Procedure Act is an arbitrary and capricious abuse of discretion. Questions of fact are never reviewable.

I hope Senators will believe me when I say that the Secretary of Labor will have full power to meet this objective. It would only be with regard to an abuse of power that there could ever be an appeal to the court of appeals.

I have tried to be very cautious about this matter. This is a question of due process under the Administrative Procedure Act, which can be used to protect the constitutional rights of people who are being discriminated against.

We do not need to worry about paper unions. The Secretary of Labor can take care of such unions and their reports under the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORSE. If the Senator will permit, I should like to mention two things.

First, in complete defense of my chairman, I want to say that the Senator from Massachusetts labored long and hard on this particular section, and this was the solution the chairman worked out.

However, in fairness also to the Senator from Oregon, I think the Senator from Massachusetts will testify that time and time again I raised questions about whether too much power was being given the Secretary of Labor, and stated that each reserved the right, when the bill reached the floor of the Senate, to offer amendments to carry out some of the proposals made in the committee but which did not prevail in the committee.

As to the substantive matter which the Senator from Massachusetts has raised, I want to refer to the paper local union case. I should like to have the Secretary of Labor armed with the Administrative Procedure Act in that instance, so that if any paper local had such bad judgment as to appeal to the Administrative Procedure Act from the Secretary's exercise of judgment in denying the exemption, the Secretary would have the processes of the Administrative Procedure Act to make clear on the record the type of a labor organization with which he was dealing. That was what I meant a few moments ago when I said amendments like this would strengthen the Secretary of Labor under the bill; they would not weaken him. It is on that basis that I press my amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator from Oregon and the Senator from Colorado that originally I favored a blanket exception for unions with a membership fewer than 200. We finally arrived at this language.

I must say to my distinguished colleague from Colorado that I do not believe this provision involves any question of constitutional rights. The fact of the matter is that all unions are covered by the reporting provisions of the bill. Nevertheless, in order to protect some small unions from being overburdened with paper work, the Secretary is given the right to accord to them the privilege of being exempt.

When the Secretary, after having given them that privilege, decides to revoke it, he takes away no right, he merely suspends a privilege which he has granted.

I believe the language of the Administrative Procedure Act requires substantial evidence in the record as a whole. I do not believe that a Secretary of Labor who has made a judgment in the case of granting an exemption should be required, when he removes the exemption to provide at that time substantial reasons for removing it.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield.

Mr. CARROLL. Let me say to the Senator from Massachusetts that I have no conviction upon this subject, except that which I have acquired from listening to the argument of the Senator from Oregon. It is my impression that the Senator from Oregon said that, in a sense, the Secretary of Labor could proscribe certain unions. Will the Senator from Oregon repeat his statement?

Mr. MORSE. The point which the Senator makes bears on the very argument I wish to make to my friend from Massachusetts. Under the bill as it is now worded, it is proposed to give to the Secretary of Labor, discretion to exempt or not to exempt. I think it is clearly implied that his discretion must be reasonably exercised. It cannot be discriminatory. It must be based on substantial evidence.

Why in the world should he object to having his decision reviewed under the Administrative Procedure Act? Such a provision would strengthen his hand. After we get a few decisions under the application of the Administrative Procedure Act, unions will be rather wary about asking for a review unless they have a good case to show that the Secretary did not have adequate evidence upon which to base his decision.

Let me make one further point. Once we place this section in the bill, we modify the policy that all unions shall be required to file full reports. That no longer would be the case. All unions, unless the membership was less than 200, and their income less than $20,000, would be required to report. With respect to the smaller unions, the Secretary of Labor would be given the right to exempt them if he thought such reporting would be burdensome upon them or if he thought it would be too expensive for them to file full reports.

It is proposed to give the Secretary the power of decision, the power of choice. There would be a very definite effect on a union, based upon whether it received the benefit of the Secretary's judgment, or did not receive the benefit of his favor. What we are saying is that we want some procedure to protect the union in the situation where a Secretary of Labor can be shown, under the Administrative Procedure Act, to be exercising a capricious discretion, and not a reasonable one.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield.

Mr. CARROLL. Let me say to the Senator from Oregon that my position is quite clear now with regard to ministerial acts. Will the Senator from Oregon distinguished this amendment from the amendment which I opposed a short time ago? Why is it different? Explain how this amendment deals with arbitrary and capricious actions on the part of the Secretary of Labor; and the harm that could come to the people of the Nation?

Mr. MORSE. I think the language on page 8 shows the distinction.

Mr. CARROLL. I should like to have the Senator from Massachusetts listen very carefully.

Mr. MORSE. On page 8 of the bill we find the following language:

> (d) The Secretary may exempt from the requirements of subsection (b) for such definite or indefinite periods as he may determine any labor organization or class thereof having fewer than 200 members and having gross annual receipts of less than $20,000—

And so forth. If he finds that the exemption of such labor organization or class thereof would not interfere with the attainment of the objectives of the act, he may grant it.

That is a statement of policy. It is a statement that we favor the exemption of unions with fewer than 200 members, and receipts of $20,000 or less, if the Secretary finds that such exemption would not interfere with the attainment of the objectives of the act.

Mr. CARROLL. Exemption from what?

Mr. MORSE. Exemptions from filing all the reports required elsewhere in the bill. That is costly. It would cost thousands of dollars to file all the reports required under the terms of the bill. I am in favor of such filing. I am also in favor of doing justice to the small union which cannot afford the expense of such filing. We might require the small unions to file much less in the way of reports, and still have a pretty good idea of how they are operating.

It is proposed to give the Secretary the right to decide whether they shall file or not. Then they may or may not receive an exemption. We are asking for an Administrative Procedure Act process if the Secretary proceeds to revoke an exemption without good cause for revoking it. That is all we are asking for.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, I wish to be perfectly frank with the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Oregon. I misconceived the original argument of the Senator from Oregon. After listening very carefully, I now conclude that this action is placed in the category of a ministerial act, with respect to which the Secretary of Labor can say, "I will exempt this union." However, he is left a certain amount of discretion. I was thinking in terms of some individual in the labor union movement, who might be seriously injured.

Mr. MORSE. He would be if the Secretary were to use abusive discretion.

Mr. CARROLL. I do not see the point about the abusive discretion.

Mr. MORSE. He might use abusive discretion.

Mr. CARROLL. This amendment is almost like the one we previously rejected.

Mr. MORSE. I do not believe we should have rejected it, but I think there is a difference between the two.

What I am trying to protect the unions from is a Secretary of Labor who might abuse his discretion. That is one of the reasons for the Administrative Procedure Act, to provide a review of discretionary decisions.

Mr. CARROLL. The only way he could abuse his discretion would be by requesting them to file a report. When he grants an exemption, that is a ministerial act. When he asks unions to file reports, that is a ministerial act. I do not believe that such an act is reviewable under the Administrative Procedure Act.

I wish to qualify what I previously said, because I was under the impression that we were dealing with a denial of due process.

Mr. MORSE. Let us look at the consequences. The revocation may cost thousands of dollars. Suppose a competitive union receives an exemption, and is not required to pay out the thousands of dollars. Suppose the unions are involved in a jurisdictional dispute. I am speaking hypothetically. Let us assume that in a jurisdictional war between two unions the Secretary of Labor is trying to help X union against Y union. Why should not Y union have the right to show that there was no justification, on the basis of an exercise of reasonable discretion, for levying a fine, in effect, of several thousand dollars upon one union, by making it comply with the filing requirement.

Mr. CARROLL. I think such a situation would be limited to a very small group. Therefore I think the financial problem is not so serious. I can understand that there might be some arbitrary and capricious act, but I do not believe it would be reviewable in a court.

As I now reexamine the whole situation, I conclude that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] is not only a great statesman and an author, but a great lawyer.

Mr. MORSE. I will say to my friend from Colorado that I always assume that under our system of justice the least among us is entitled to the same protection as the greatest. The fact that this provision deals with a very small number of men does not change the fact that we should protect them from the kind of arbitrary discretion from which the Administrative Procedure Act was designed to protect all Americans.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield 1 minute to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I wish to stand with my chairman on this matter. I am sure the distinguished Senator from Oregon will remember that in the subcommittee we argued this particular amendment at great length. We finally voted to strike it from the bill as reported to the full committee. During the full committee hearings the paragraph was put back into the bill. I hold to the idea that we should not exempt any unions, because most of the trouble we found has been in the smaller unions, as the Senator is well aware. This morning an effort was made to remove this provision from the bill. I was not on the floor, and therefore did not get a chance to vote on it. If the Senator is interested, we could make a motion to reconsider the vote on that proposal and have a vote on it. However, it is in the bill. I believe we talked about it more than about any other paragraph in the bill. I should dislike very much to see it disturbed at this late hour.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I am prepared to yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. MORSE. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I call up my last amendment marked "A."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 54 it is proposed to strike out all after the comma in line 1 and the word "laws" in line 2 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "to enact and enforce general criminal laws with respect to robbery, bribery, extortion, embezzlement, grand larceny, burglary, arson, violation of narcotics laws, murder, rape, assault with intent to kill, or assault with intent to inflict grievous bodily injury, or conspiracy to commit any of such crimes."

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I am prepared to accept the amendment, and I yield back my time.

Mr. MORSE. This problem was first raised with me by lawyers for the AFL–CIO. I then went into the merits of it, and I thought it was meritorious. I therefore offer the amendment. I am willing to yield back the remainder of my time, and I ask unanimous consent that a statement explaining the amendment be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR MORSE

The purpose of this amendment is simply to conform section 507 of the bill, relating to the authority of the States to continue to enact and enforce their general criminal laws to the intention of the committee as expressed in the report. As stated in the report, the intention of the committee in including section 507 of the bill was to make clear that the bill's provisions making embezzlement of union funds a Federal crime and referring to numerous other offenses which are crimes under the laws of the various States should not affect the authority of the States to continue to enact and enforce general criminal laws dealing with the crimes referred to in these provisions. The committee pointed out in its report:

"This section is designed to make clear that section 109(a), making embezzlement of union funds a Federal crime, and the references to certain crimes in section 305 of the bill are not intended to bar the States from continuing to enact and enforce, in the exercise of their general police powers, criminal statutes dealing with the particular crimes mentioned in the bill. The bill is not intended in any way to impair or diminish State authority to enact and enforce such general criminal statutes.

"Other sections of this bill refer specifically to the respective responsibilities of State and Federal Governments with regard to the subject matter covered by the bill. Nothing in this section is to be construed as altering these divisions of governmental responsibility as therein defined."

The amendment is designed, as I said, simply to make the effect of section 507 clear beyond peradventure of any doubt by listing in this section the specific crimes referred to in sections 109 and 305, so that the States may continue to enact and enforce general criminal statutes dealing with these crimes. Without the amendment it might be possible to argue that any State statute dealing with matters specifically covered in the bill—such as the provisions limiting the tours of office of union officers—would be valid if enacted as a criminal statute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

Mr. EASTLAND. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be not read, but be printed in the RECORD at this point. I will explain it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment, offered by Mr. EASTLAND, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, is as follows:

On page 30, after line 5, insert a new section as follows:

"SEC. 113. (a) That section 9 of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof new subsections as follows:

"'(i) No investigation shall be made by the Board of any question affecting commerce concerning the representation of employees, raised by a labor organization under subsection (c) of this section, and no complaint shall be issued pursuant to a charge made by a labor organization under subsection (b) of section 10, unless there is on file with the Board an affidavit executed contemporaneously or within the preceding twelve-month period by such labor organization and any national or international labor organization of which it is an affiliate or constituent unit declaring that the constitution or bylaws of such labor organization and of any national or international labor organization of which it is an affiliate or constituent unit—

"'(1) provide, that no authorized strike shall be called except upon approval of a majority of the employees in the affected unit voting by a secret ballot in accordance with the following:

"'(A) No strike ballot shall be taken until there shall have elapsed (i) a period of twenty days during which the labor organization shall have made all reasonable efforts to settle the dispute by means of collective bargaining, and (ii) an additional period of twenty days to enable the parties to the dispute to explain fully their respective positions to the employees involved in the dispute and to the public;

"'(B) Any such strike ballots shall be conducted by an election committee consisting of one member selected by the labor organization, one member selected by the employer, and a third member selected by such members. If the employer fails to select a member within five days after having been requested by the labor organization in writing to do so, such member shall be selected by the National Labor Relations Board. If the member selected by the employer or the Board and the member selected by the labor organization are unable to agree within five days upon the selection of the third member, such third member shall be selected by the National Labor Relations Board;

"'(C) The election committee shall promptly prepare and distribute to all employees in the bargaining unit involved in the labor dispute suitable ballots with appropriate instructions and envelopes to enable such employees to execute the ballots, without identification of the voter; such completed ballots to be deposited in ballot boxes accessible only to the election committee as a body; so that in case the eligibility of a voter is in dispute, the signature of such voter will appear on the outer envelope solely for the purpose of identifying his ballot until his eligibility shall be determined;

"'(D) The election committee shall process and count the ballots in such manner that the identity of the individual casting a particular ballot will be unknown to the committee or to any other person, and after the votes have been tabulated shall certify the results of the elections to the parties of the dispute; and

"'(E) If a majority of the employees voting in such election vote to authorize a strike, such strike may be ordered or authorized by the labor organization, but only after the expiration of a period of twenty days during which such labor organization shall have again made all reasonable efforts to settle the dispute by collective bargaining and not later than eighty days following the date upon which such strike was authorized, without further compliance with the requirements of this paragraph (1).

"'(j) Upon the filing of a petition in writing signed by not less than 10 per centum of all of the employees of a bargaining unit or a petition signed by not less than two of the members of the election committee described in subsection (i)(1)(B) of this section, alleging that a strike has been called in contravention of the provisions of subsection (i)(1) of this section, the Board shall then proceed under the investigatory powers granted in this Act to consider this matter, and if the Board determines the allegations to be true, the Board will issue an order declaring that such strike was called without proper authority and instructing the bargaining unit involved to immediately comply with the provisions contained in subsection (i)(1) of this section. Any labor organization which, within five days, fails to comply with any order issued by the Board in accordance with the provisions of this subsection shall, during the period of noncompliance, be ineligible for certification by the Board as an exclusive representative of any group of employees for collective bargaining purposes, and no investigation shall be made by the Board of any question affecting commerce concerning the representation of employees, raised by such labor organization under subsection (c) of this section during the period of noncompliance, nor shall any complaint be issued pursuant to a charge made by such labor organization under subsection (b) of section 10 during the period of noncompliance.

"'(k) This section shall not be construed to repeal, modify, or affect section 8(d) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, or to require that the sixty-day and thirty-day periods specified in said section 8(d) shall be in addition to the periods set forth in this section, except that such strike may not commence until the expiration of the period described in section 8(d)(4) or in subsection (i)(1)(E) herein, whichever is the later: Provided, That nothing contained in this section shall be construed to make lawful a strike conducted in violation of a no-strike clause in a collective-bargaining contract: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to authorize a lockout during the period during which a labor organization may not strike pursuant to the provisions of this section.'

"(b) No labor organization which, during any taxable year which begins after the date of enactment hereof, fails to comply with any order of the National Labor Relations Board issued under subsection (j) of section 9 of the National Labor Relations Act, within the time limits prescribed by such subsection (j), as the case may be, shall be entitled to exemption from Federal income tax under section 501(a) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 for such taxable year.

"(c) The tax payable under the Federal income tax laws for any taxable year by a labor organization which has lost its Federal income tax exemption under paragraph (a) for such year shall be reduced by an amount which bears the same ratio to the amount otherwise payable as the number of days in such taxable year for which there was not any failure by such labor organization to comply with any order issued by the National Labor Relations Board under subsection (j) of section 9 of the National Labor Relations Act bears to the total number of days in such taxable year."

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, this is a very simple amendment. The union bosses have boasted all over the United States that they believe in democracy. They believe in democracy for everyone except those in their own domain of influence. Before they could call a strike, the amendment would give the workers, the men who are primarily involved, the right to a secret ballot in order to determine whether there should be a strike. I shall speak briefly on the amendment.

Before a secret strike ballot is taken, the amendment sets forth certain procedures which must be followed. There would have to be a waiting period of 20 days, during which the labor organization must make all reasonable efforts to settle the dispute by means of collective bargaining.

If agreement cannot be reached, an additional period of 20 days is provided to enable the parties to the dispute to explain fully their respective positions to the employees involved and to the public. In the event a strike election becomes necessary, the amendment sets up the machinery for an election committee, to be composed of one member selected by the labor organization, one member selected by the employer, and a third member mutually agreeable to the two selected members.

If the employer fails to select such a member, provision is made for the National Labor Relations Board so to do. If the two selected members cannot agree upon a third, the National Labor Relations Board is empowered to do so.

The election committee is charged with the duty of preparing and distributing to all the employees in the bargaining unit involved suitable ballots with appropriate instructions, and such completed ballots, without identification of the voter, will be deposited in ballot boxes under the charge of the election committee. Where the eligibility of a voter is in dispute, the signature of such voter will appear on the outer envelope solely for the purpose of identifying his ballot until his eligibility shall have been determined. All ballots shall be processed in such a manner that the identity of an individual casting a particular ballot will be unknown to the committee or any other person.

When the votes have been tabulated and certified, if a majority of the employees vote to authorize a strike, the strike may be ordered or authorized by the labor organization, but only after the expiration of a period of 20 days. During the 20-day period the labor organization shall have again made all reasonable efforts to settle the dispute by collective bargaining. If a strike is authorized, it must follow within 80 days from the date upon which it was authorized.

Mr. President, the amendment is a charter of liberty and freedom for union members everywhere from coercion, dictation, and intimidation in making a free and independent choice on the gravest issue that confronts this country. The man who is primarily interested in a strike is the worker whose livelihood and whose welfare are involved.

Why should not the worker have a chance to make the decision as to whether there shall be a strike. The leader who orders the strike and who has made the strike decision and goes to the collective bargaining meeting with the strike decision already made, holding a pistol at the head of management and at the head of the workers, does not lose any of his salary. He does not lose any of the benefits he enjoys. It is the man who labors whose welfare and rights are put in jeopardy, who is concerned. We say we believe in democracy in this country. The unions say they believe in the workers controlling the affairs of the union. Yet when it comes to a strike, which is a right labor has to enforce its demands, why should not that decision be made by the man who is primarily involved?

Mr. President, I will tell the Senate another reason why it is very essential that the amendment be adopted. There is an arrogant Communist named Harry Bridges, who stated on television that in case we aided Chiang Kai-shek in the Far East, he would shut off supplies to the Armed Forces of the United States.

In other words, an arrogant Communist could veto the foreign policy of our country by calling a strike. I say that the rank and file of the members of his union are patriotic American citizens and that they should have the right to say whether a strike should be called and whether their boys should be denied the guns and planes and tanks to defend their country.

Mr. Bridges has just made a trip abroad on which he met Communist agents in Europe and behind the Iron Curtain, and when there was outlined the Communist policy to destroy the United States by Communists within the country in case of trouble with the Soviet Union.

Another organization concerning which committees of Congress have taken considerable testimony is the American Communications Association. That organization has been under investigation. It has been expelled by the CIO because of its Communist domination.

The president of Local 146 of the Commercial Telegraphers Union, a technician for the Western Union Telegraph Co., testified to the ease with which saboteurs could incapacitate the company's Atlantic cables. In case of a strike, they could shut off communications in the Pentagon Building in Washington, D.C.

Will any Senator contend that the members of that union should not have the right to say whether they will strike against their country and cut off communications in the Pentagon Building?

The United Electrical, Radio, and Machine Workers of America is a Communist-controlled union. That union has established bargaining rights with the largest electrical corporations in the industry, companies manufacturing the most sensitive apparatus required for our most strategic defense weapons. It represents 200,000 workers in this key industry. Will any Senator say that a union which represents employees who manufacture the most sensitive weapons used by our country, and whose boys may have to fight for their country, should not have the right to say if they will go out on strike?

What is the reason for this? We talk about democracy, but the bill does not give democracy to the workingman. I say let him vote; let him make the decision.

The amendment provides that, first, there must be 20 days of collective bargaining, and that after that period of time, if the members want to call a strike, the management shall explain its position to the workers, and the union shall explain its position to the workers. The cases of both sides can be laid before them; then it will be up to the workers to decide whether they want to strike. What can be fairer than that? There must be a 20-day cooling-off period.

The International Union of Mine, Mill, and Smelter Workers attempted by a strike during the Korean war to cut off copper supplies which were essential to the Armed Forces of the United States. Should not the workers who are members of that union have the right to say whether, by their secret ballot, free from intimidation and free from coercion, there should be a strike? I think that is a fundamental charter of the rights of labor. If a union member does not have the right to determine the policies of the union with respect to strikes, he is a slave, and we have slavery, then, within the ranks of organized labor.

The leaders of the unions have entirely too much power. All we say is: Let the man who works for the union, the man who is primarily involved, the man whose salary and welfare are involved, make the decision, and not the leaders. The leaders do not miss their pay checks, they do not miss their benefits. Not at all. It is the man who works in the ranks who loses the benefits. Why should he not be the one to make the decision whether there shall be a strike? Why do we not consider the best interests of the workingman?

Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time and suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Mississippi wishes to ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, on my amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I oppose the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi. As I understand, it provides, first, that before a strike can be ordered, a committee composed of representatives of labor and representatives of the employer shall conduct the strike vote.

This matter came before the Senate last year on an amendment offered by the then Senator from Connecticut, Mr. Purtell. There was so little support for the amendment that it was defeated on a voice vote. The reason for its defeat on a voice vote is the very reason why this amendment was not included in the Taft-Hartley Act.

From 1944 to the end of 1946, under the Smith-Connally Act, strike ballots, comparable to the kind suggested by the Senator from Mississippi, were in effect. The experience showed that it cost more than $2 million to conduct a strike ballot in 1946—1 year—and that more than 90 percent of all the votes cast did not support the strike. This was in a time of war, I point out. The ballot was worded: "I am in favor of stopping all war production by voting in favor of a strike." In other words, the amendment was worded in such a way that the burden would be very heavy upon the striker before he would ever agree to call a strike. Nevertheless, under those conditions, even under the pressure of wartime, which certainly should have mitigated against careless consideration, 90 percent of all the ballots voted were against a strike.

Senator Taft felt that such a provision made it more difficult to reach an accommodation. Unions, in order to win strikes, have always held back the very last vote until they could be certain of the outcome. Then they go to the employer and say, "We are not able to make any new concessions. Our members are ready to strike."

So instead of making for a happier relationship between labor and management, it made the relationship worse. That is the reason why the Secretary of Labor, Mr. Mitchell, has opposed this provision. I read from his testimony of last year before the committee:

> Secretary MITCHELL. From the point of view of management, I would think that management would not like to see a strike vote legislated, because a management negotiator will be confronted by a union negotiator saying to him, "Look, I have no discretion in this matter. I cannot make any compromise in our demands, because the Federal Government has taken a strike vote, and my membership by a majority vote says I have to get what I could by asking for it right now."

Therefore Secretary Mitchell opposed the provision.

Figures were presented to show that such a provision would cost $7 million, based on the situation in 1946.

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, what is wrong with this proposal? The employee's interests are primarily involved in a strike. Why should not he be permitted to make the decision? What is wrong with allowing that to be done?

Mr. KENNEDY. Because, based on my experience of 13 years on the Labor Committees, I find that very rarely do unions begin strikes contrary to the wishes of the employees.

After a strike has proceeded for some time, it may be there will be some differences of opinion about when the employees should return to work. But they are free to return to work whenever they want to.

But from 1944 on, according to our experience, very few strikes were called without the support of the employees. Otherwise, the union officers would not long remain in office.

Mr. EASTLAND. But this amendment is exactly what we had in the Smith-Connally Act during the war.

Mr. KENNEDY. That is correct.

Mr. EASTLAND. It worked very well then. It prevented strikes; and it would be a strong weapon now against inflation in this country.

Mr. KENNEDY. My reading of the experience under the Smith-Connally Act is entirely different. Ninety percent of the times when the question of whether to strike was put to the employees, they voted to strike—even during the war. If this provision was so effective in controlling strikes, in 1947, when the Taft-Hartley Act was written—and it was written largely as a result of the strikes which occurred in 1946—why was not this provision included in the Taft-Hartley Act? It was not included because Senator Taft was not convinced of the usefulness of such a provision.

In other words, I believe it would be a mistake to include this provision in a bill dealing with labor reform.

Mr. President, I am prepared to yield back the remainder of the time under my control on the amendment.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President——

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, as a matter of fact, when a strike is lawfully conducted, it is a collective arrangement by means of which those who are on strike exercise their most potent economic weapon—namely, their collective refusal to work, except under terms which are satisfactory to them. Is not that correct?

Mr. KENNEDY. Yes; the Senator from North Carolina is correct.

Mr. ERVIN. Under this amendment, as I construe it, there would be at least 60 days, or perhaps more, before they could exercise what is undoubtedly their right to act in concert, to act together, in exercising this economic weapon—namely, collectively to refuse to work, except under conditions satisfactory to them. This amendment would substantially impair that undoubted right.

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator from North Carolina is correct.

Mr. President, in view of the facts which have been brought out by the Senator from North Carolina, I hope the amendment will be rejected.

I yield back the remainder of the time under my control on the amendment.

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of the time under my control on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All remaining time on the amendment has been yielded back.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I should like to say a few words.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from South Dakota 3 minutes on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota is recognized for 3 minutes on the bill.

Mr. MUNDT. I thank the Senator from Montana.

Mr. President, much has been said about the Smith-Connally Act experience during the war.

I wish to point out, as I did on the floor of the Senate on April 20, that we cannot compare the wartime experience with a peacetime situation, because section 7 of the Smith-Connally Act provided, under its statutory provisions, power for the National War Labor Board to conduct a hearing on the merits of the dispute; and, further, it gave the Board the power to decide the dispute and to provide by order for the wages and hours involved.

So during the war a union could "get a free ride," because it knew that under section 4 the Board had that power, and could exercise it, so that the strike would not take place. So the union could get the benefit of the pressure and the enthusiasm of a strike vote, but without having the strike take place.

So, Mr. President, the statistics as to the number of strikes which occurred at that time are not a proper indication of what would happen in peacetime.

Therefore, I believe that, under the provisions of this amendment, democracy in unionism would be more directly practiced than under any other labor proposal now before us.

Let me point out the significance and the importance of that. A study made by the Department of Labor in 1954 disclosed that of 112 international union constitutions to that date, only 63 contained provisions requiring a strike vote in the locals. That means that 49 international unions, representing nearly 6 million members, can now call strikes without giving the members of the unions the right to make their democratic decision on the question of whether to go on strike.

If we are interested in democratic unionism—and I trust that we are—what is wrong with permitting the union members to vote, under an orderly procedure, on the question of whether they desire to strike or do not desire to strike.

The Eastland amendment provides for a cooling off period, and gives a constructive answer to the millions of American working families who, when a strike issue is before them, desire to make their decision and assert their preference and to vote either for or against going on strike. So I think adoption of this amendment would be a constructive step under democratic unionism; and I trust that the Eastland amendment will be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND]. All remaining time on this amendment has been yielded back.

On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered; and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER] are absent on official business.

I also announce that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. BIBLE] is absent because of a death in his family.

I further announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR] is absent because of illness.

On this vote, the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON] is paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER]. If present and voting, the Senator from Texas would vote "nay" and the Senator from Iowa would vote "yea."

On this vote, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. BIBLE] is paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT]. If present and voting, the Senator from Nevada would vote "nay" and the Senator from Arkansas would vote "yea."

On this vote, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] is paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CARLSON]. If present and voting, the Senator from Minnesota would vote "nay" and the Senator from Kansas would vote "yea."

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER] would vote "nay."

Mr. KUCHEL. I announce that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CARLSON] is absent on official business, and is paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY]. If present and voting, the Senator from Kansas would vote "yea," and the Senator from Minnesota would vote "nay."

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] is necessarily absent, and if present and voting would vote "nay."

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CASE] and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER] are detained on official business.

On this vote, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER] is paired with the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON]. If present and voting, the Senator from Iowa would vote "yea," and the Senator from Texas would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 60, as follows:

So Mr. EASTLAND's amendment was rejected.

Mr. McCARTHY and Mr. MUNDT addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I offer an amendment which I ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 20, in line 18, after the word "Act", it is proposed to strike out the following:

Provided, That upon acquittal such person may be reimbursed by his principal for expenditures necessarily incurred in his defense.

And in lieu thereof to insert "unless such payments or advances for defense have been duly authorized by the governing body of the labor union or by the employer, as the case may be."

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I offer this amendment on my own behalf and also on behalf of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE].

The issue is very clear, and the amendment will take only a few minutes to explain.

The bill provides:

No labor organization or employer shall directly or indirectly pay the fine, or pay or advance the costs of defense, of any officer, agent, employee, or representative indicted for or convicted of any violation of any provision of this Act.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, may we have order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARTLETT in the chair). The Senate will be in order.

The Senator from Minnesota may proceed.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, the bill further provides:

Provided, That upon acquittal such person may be reimbursed by his principal for expenditures necessarily incurred in his defense.

The amendment which I have offered provides that if the union, through its proper authority, decides it will pay the cost of the defense, it may do so. This would not apply, however, to any fine which might be imposed by the court.

It seems to me this is a reasonable amendment. The bill, even before it was amended, was an extremely complicated measure. I think there is no question that some union officers will get in trouble under the bill, even though they have the best of intentions. Most likely, these will be the heads of unions which do not have highly skilled legal counsel. In addition, there may be some unions which will decide to test the act in court.

It seems to me the officers of the union should be permitted, through the action of the union, to have the cost of defense reimbursed by the union.

There is a further consideration, of course. This does involve a kind of backhanded acceptance that a man is guilty until he is proved innocent, since the bill provides that if the man is convicted, he must pay the cost himself, but if he is acquitted, then the union can pay the cost. Insofar as I can discover, with the help of the Legislation Reference Service, there is no precedent for such law in any Federal statute today.

If we wish to establish the precedent in this act, I suppose we may do so. If we hesitate to do it, and if we think the act should be tested in the courts, and that the men who are indicted should be given reasonable financial support, then I think my amendment should be agreed to.

I hesitate to support a measure which makes it difficult for a man to raise the money which may be necessary for his defense in a court of the United States.

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold his request?

Mr. McCARTHY. I withhold the request.

Mr. KENNEDY. As I understand the amendment proposed by the Senator, it provides that if an officer of a union comes into conflict with the act and is brought to trial, if the union, by proper action constitutionally, desires to do so it may appropriate money for his attorney's fee.

Mr. McCARTHY. The Senator is correct.

Mr. KENNEDY. However, under the pending bill, the man would have to pay for his own attorney's fee, but if he were acquitted the union could pay for the cost.

There are two problems involved in this matter. In one case there is no doubt that a good many of the racketeers are able to dominate the unions in such a way that they can get money under almost any guise in order to defend themselves. On the other hand, it is possible that an honest union officer could get into some difficulty, with a complicated act. It is probably true that most corporations pay the costs, if an officer of the corporation gets in some difficulty with the law. Under the Senator's amendment, the payment would be possible only if the man came into conflict with the act?

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes.

Mr. KENNEDY. Would the Senator accept a modification? In other words, I would accept the Senator's amendment if it were modified to state that a man who is convicted shall repay, to the extent possible, the cost of his defense.

Mr. McCARTHY. My amendment is limited to the cost of the defense, and does not apply to the fine. The man would have to pay his own fine.

Mr. KENNEDY. I understand.

Mr. McCARTHY. It seems to me what the Senator proposes is not particularly helpful. The Senator favors giving the man a loan for his defense, but I think in most cases the union should pay the cost of the defense. With the passage of this bill it will be much more difficult for the heads of unions to get the necessary funds. It seems to me the amendment is trimmed about as closely as it should be trimmed, since we have eliminated any right or opportunity for the union to pay the fine and restricted it only to the cost of defense. I think this is an extremely limited proposal.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, there seems to be some question about the language of the amendment, as to whether or not the cost of the fine would also be included.

Mr. McCARTHY. No. The words "for defense" have been added to the amendment in line 5.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota yield?

Mr. McCARTHY. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. It seems to me that the Senator from Minnesota is to be complimented upon offering a very thoughtful and meritorious amendment, which would improve and add some additional degree of justice to this meritorious measure.

Let me say to the Senator from Minnesota that I once served as president of the Cuyahoga County Bar Association in my home city of Cleveland, Ohio. That bar association, composed of lawyers of Cleveland and suburbs, is the second largest county bar association in the United States. I know something about matters of this sort. I believe this amendment should be adopted. I hope it will be accepted by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts. I think it would perform an act of simple justice.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, there seems to be some ambiguity about the language of the amendment. As it now reads, in line 5, it is as follows: "unless such payments or advances for defense have been duly authorized," and so forth. Would the Senator be agreeable to substituting the words "for the costs of defense" for the words "for defense"?

Mr. McCARTHY. The language "for defense" was in the amendment as it was read.

Mr. KENNEDY. Evidently there is a little ambiguity, but in order to eliminate any uncertainty, I suggest that modification.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am glad to accept it.

Mr. KENNEDY. In that case I will accept the amendment.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield me 3 minutes? I wish to speak in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ALLOTT. I invite the attention of the Senator from Minnesota to the fact that his amendment would open wide the door to abuses which have been all too prevalent for years.

To be specific about this situation, one Eugene C. James, of Chicago, treasurer of the International Laundry Workers Union, embezzled more than $165,000 from his own union, of which he was treasurer. He stole more than $165,000 in the course of 2 years.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. ALLOTT. I yield.

Mr. McCARTHY. Is it the Senator's opinion that if the bill is passed, it will be much more difficult to embezzle?

Mr. ALLOTT. Let me finish the story. Then the Senator will understand why I oppose the amendment.

This case came before the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], who is present in the Chamber, and I am sure he will verify the facts. After James was brought before the special committee for the investigation of welfare and pension funds, he went home to Chicago. Even after he had taken the fifth amendment for 2 days, we proved that he had stolen $165,000.

He went home, and somehow or other got his union workers to raise a slush fund of $40,000 for his defense. During the past 6 months, by making some compromise payment to the union upon a supposed debt, he has been reinstated as treasurer of the union.

So I must oppose the Senator's amendment. I think this is a classic example of what would happen if the amendment were adopted.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARTHY. I yield.

Mr. DODD. Does the Senator from Minnesota believe that an unfaithful officer of a corporation should be able to call upon the treasury of the corporation to defend him against charges of embezzlement?

Mr. McCARTHY. He may call upon it, but if he is to get the money the directors of the corporation must approve.

Mr. DODD. Does the Senator think it is morally right for an embezzler from a corporation to have corporate funds used to defend him against a charge of embezzlement?

Mr. McCARTHY. My friend is convicting the man before he has been tried.

Mr. DODD. No, I am not.

Mr. McCARTHY. In each case, an alleged embezzler is brought to trial. He is not an embezzler until he has been proved guilty.

Mr. DODD. No; but the point is that he has been accused.

Mr. McCARTHY. That is correct.

Mr. DODD. But should the stockholders be called upon to pay the expenses of his defense?

Mr. McCARTHY. I think under certain circumstances the officers of a corporation might approve of paying the cost of his defense.

Mr. DODD. What circumstances?

Mr. McCARTHY. The officers will be held accountable.

Mr. DODD. What circumstances?

Mr. McCARTHY. Each case is decided on its own merits. What we are concerned with is a general principle of law and procedure.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARTHY. I yield.

Mr. MONRONEY. Section 109 of the bill reads as follows:

SEC. 109. (a) Any person who embezzles, steals, or unlawfully and willfully abstracts or converts to his own use or the use of another any of the moneys, funds, securities, property, or other assets of a labor organization of which he is an officer or by whom he is employed directly or indirectly shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than five years, or both.

Do I correctly understand my distinguished colleague and friend to say that the man who embezzles union funds, and who is convicted, should be enabled to put the tab on the poor union members whose funds he has embezzled, in case he can receive a majority vote at a special meeting to provide defense funds? This is a new theory of defending embezzlers in positions of trust.

Mr. McCARTHY. This involves a question of defense. He has not yet been convicted.

Mr. MONRONEY. As I read my distinguished colleagues' amendment, if he were convicted, the costs of his defense could be charged to the dues-paying members, if the union bosses could get a few officers together at a special meeting; and an additional cost of $50,000 might be incurred, besides the loss because of the defalcation or embezzlement of the union funds.

Mr. McCARTHY. The Senator has little confidence in the operation of the proposed law. There will probably be hundreds of cases in which people are likely, by accident, to violate this law, if enacted. So we should give some thought to clarifying the situation. We say, "You can go into court and take your chances, with no defense from the union. If you are convicted you are out. If you are acquitted we will pay the bill."

Mr. MONRONEY. If the president were to embezzle the funds of a bank and were convicted, the Senator would not expect the stockholders to pay for the defense of the embezzling president, would he?

Mr. McCARTHY. Is there anything in the law which would prevent them from doing it?

Mr. MOSS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARTHY. I yield.

Mr. MOSS. Is it not true that we are talking about an individual who has been accused of a crime, whereas the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma is talking about an individual who has already been convicted of crime? An individual who is accused of crime is presumed to be innocent, under our law, until he is proved guilty. That is the point. When he is accused he is entitled to legal counsel, to determine whether or not there is proof that can convict him of the crime. That is fundamental in our whole legal system. An individual who is accused is entitled to counsel. At that point he may turn to the organization he represents to have legal counsel provided for him.

Mr. McCARTHY. I agree with the Senator. We are making it difficult for a man to obtain the funds he may need for his own defense.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for the purpose of asking for the yeas and nays on his amendment?

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes; I yield for that purpose.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask for the yeas and nays upon the McCarthy amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARTHY. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. About a year ago, when Jimmy Hoffa was on trial here in the District of Columbia, he brought to Washington teamster goons from all over the country. They assembled in a hotel in Washington, and the hotel bill of those who assembled here as witnesses in his defense ran into thousands of dollars, according to the records of the McClellan committee. The Senator's amendment would legalize the payment of that expense out of the funds of the workers, in the case of the Teamsters' Union.

Mr. McCARTHY. I would hope that the amendment would not be argued on the basis of what Jimmy Hoffa might do with it. There are some very fundamental considerations involved. I am sure Jimmy Hoffa would get enough money to defend himself under any circumstances.

Mr. CURTIS. Would the Senator's amendment legalize such a payment?

Mr. McCARTHY. I would assume that it would not eliminate the possibility of his taking advantage of it. I do not believe, however, that Jimmy Hoffa would not find it necessary to take advantage of the amendment in order to get the money he needs. I am concerned about the officers of small unions who get into trouble by accident. They should get some money for their defense. The issue is clear. If the Senator from Nebraska believes the danger is so great that Hoffa will take advantage of the amendment, he should vote against it. If he thinks that Jimmy Hoffa will run wild with the amendment, he should vote against it.

Mr. CURTIS. Jimmy Hoffa is already running wild. The amendment apparently would legalize it.

Mr. McCARTHY. Not any more than now. If the Senator believes that the weaker, smaller unions do not need this protection, he should vote against the amendment.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARTHY. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. Before we vote on the issue, it is desirable to clear up the colloquy with the Senator from Utah. An erroneous impression has been created in one respect. The amendment, as I read it, provides that whether a person wins, loses, or draws, so to speak, the union pays the counsel fees. In other words, if there is a crook in the union, he gets his counsel fees paid out of the pockets of the very union members whom he has defrauded.

Mr. McCARTHY. Not unless the union agrees to it.

Mr. KEATING. Of course. If he gets the governing board to agree to it, he gets his counsel fees paid.

Mr. McCARTHY. In the same manner that an officer of a corporation, if he gets the approval of the board, has his fees paid.

Mr. KEATING. The bill as originally drawn provided, in accordance with the normal practices of Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence, that if the person were acquitted he would get a refund. Under the Senator's amendment, as I understand it, whether or not he is acquitted, if he can get the governing board of the union to approve it, he would get his fees paid by the union, out of the very pockets of the people he had defrauded.

Mr. McCARTHY. The Senator talks about a refund. What refund does he refer to? A refund from whom?

Mr. KEATING. He would be paid the legal expenses by the union, if he could get the governing board to pass a resolution.

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes, if he could get the board to pass a resolution authorizing the payment.

Mr. KEATING. The Senator must assume that that would be the case. Under the bill, if he were acquitted, he would have his legal fees paid to him.

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes.

Mr. KEATING. But here we are dealing with a case of conviction.

Mr. McCARTHY. I understand that.

Mr. KEATING. I am not sure that the Senator from Utah understood it.

Mr. MOSS. How can a man who has been accused of a crime wait until the trial is over to employ an attorney to properly represent him at the trial? He cannot wait until the trial is over and then say, "I will go back and get the money to pay the counsel fees." He must retain an attorney at the time he is accused.

Mr. KEATING. That is the problem of anyone who is accused of crime, whether he is a union officer or anyone else. Either he must pay a lawyer to defend him, or he is provided with defense counsel by the court without cost, if he cannot afford to pay counsel fees.

Mr. MOSS. That is true with respect to a corporation official who is accused of a crime. If he can get the board of directors to approve it, he gets his legal fee paid, so that he may hire someone to represent him.

Mr. KEATING. If a corporation official got the board of directors to approve his defense in a crooked deal, the corporation officials would have a stockholders' suit on their hands for personal liability.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, do I understand correctly that the McClellan bill of rights amendment provides the right to bring suit on the payment of a fee to defend a union official?

Mr. McCARTHY. My amendment would put it on the same basis which now prevails with respect to corporation officials.

Mr. DODD. I thought the McClellan bill of rights was a pretty good thing, but I am wondering now. Let me ask the Senator a question. I believe it is expected in our society that an unfaithful officer, whether he be a private citizen or an officer of a corporation or of a labor union, or a member of a partnership, or any other man who is charged with crime must defend himself. Why should we make an exception in this case?

Mr. McCARTHY. An exception has been made with respect to corporations.

Mr. DODD. No. I do not believe so. I believe that most corporations insist that the individual must defend himself. My point is that an officer charged with infidelity in business is required to defend himself. It may be a hardship on individuals, but that has been our rule. Why should we change it now? I do not know of any other situation where, as a matter of law, when a person is accused of infidelity to his responsibilities, the financial resources of the corporation or association are provided to defend such person.

Mr. McCARTHY. A corporation can do it.

Mr. DODD. I do not believe that is correct. I think that most corporate officers defend themselves. Most stockholders require that they do it. I believe there is a philosophical basis for so doing. I do not know why we should make an exception in the case of a labor organization.

Mr. McCARTHY. In the first place, the Senator is in error on that point. The situation with respect to union resources is different from that of a corporation.

Mr. KENNEDY. I shall be glad to yield back all but 2 minutes of my time, which I promised to yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. MUNDT. I thank the Senator. I should like to call to the attention of the Senate, by way of documentary evidence, what would be legalized and legitimatized by the adoption of the McCarthy amendment. There is the case of Joey Glimco, of Teamsters Local 777, who embezzled $124,000 of union funds. Under the McCarthy amendment it would be legitimate to get his legal fees from the very union from which he embezzled the money.

If the Senate wishes a classic case as to what would happen if the McCarthy amendment were adopted, I call attention to the case of Jimmy James, of the Laundry Workers Union in Chicago, who embezzled $990,000 from the union and then employed a lawyer for $15,000 to defend him on the charge of not paying his income tax. His defense was that, since he had embezzled the money, it was nontaxable income. [Laughter.] The union paid the cost of the lawyer.

If we start enacting legislation of this kind, it seems to me we will have to stop having night sessions, or we will be accused of having moon madness.

Then there was Gerald Conley, of the Teamsters Union, from whom he embezzled $61,000. Shall we authorize the payment of his legal fees from the Teamsters from whom he embezzled the money? We should on a yea-and-nay vote unanimously reject this kind of amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield 1 minute to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, it is entirely possible that, if the amendment is adopted, it will be used as a defense for an unlawful expenditure already made.

Mr. MUNDT. If the amendment is adopted, Jimmy Hoffa will throw his hat so high in the air, it will outsputnik sputnik.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield myself 20 seconds. I had informed the Senator from Minnesota that this amendment would be acceptable. However, the members of the committee who participated in drafting the language of the bill are concerned about maintaining the amendment in the bill. Therefore, I must reluctantly withdraw my offer to accept the amendment. I understand there will be a yea-and-nay vote anyway.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

All time on the amendment has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment, as modified, offered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. McCARTHY]. On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] are absent on official business.

I also announce that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. BIBLE] is absent because of a death in his family.

I further announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR] is absent because of illness.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. BIBLE] would each vote "nay."

Mr. KUCHEL. I announce that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CARLSON] is absent on official business, and if present and voting would vote "nay."

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] is necessarily absent, and if present and voting, would vote "nay."

So Mr. McCARTHY's amendment, as modified, was rejected.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I move that the vote by which the amendment was rejected be reconsidered.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, I move to lay on the table the motion to reconsider.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and a number of my colleagues, the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. CHURCH], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE] the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER], the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS], and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN] I submit the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 3, after line 17, it is proposed to strike out all down to and including line 24 on page 6, as amended, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

TITLE I—BILL OF RIGHTS OF MEMBERS OF LABOR ORGANIZATIONS

SEC. 101. (a) (1) EQUAL RIGHTS.—Every member of a labor organization engaged in an industry affecting commerce shall have equal rights and privileges within such organization to nominate candidates, to vote in union elections or referendums, to attend membership meetings and to participate in the deliberations and voting upon the business of such meetings, subject to reasonable rules and regulations in such organization's constitution and bylaws.

(2) FREEDOM OF SPEECH AND ASSEMBLY.—Every member of any such labor organization shall have the right to meet and assemble freely with other members and to express any views, arguments, or opinions, and to express at union meetings his views, upon candidates in a union election or upon any business properly before the union meeting, subject to the organization's established and reasonable rules pertaining to the conduct of meetings: Provided, That the foregoing is limited so that nothing herein shall be construed to impair the right of a labor organization to adopt and enforce reasonable rules as to the responsibility of every member toward the organization as an institution and to refrain from conduct that would interfere with its performance of its legal or contractual obligations.

(3) FREEDOM FROM ARBITRARY FINANCIAL EXACTIONS.—(A) The rates of dues and initiation fees payable by members of any such labor organization in effect on the effective date of this subsection shall not be changed, and no new or additional dues or initiation fees shall be imposed and no special or general assessment shall be levied upon such members, except (i) by a majority vote by secret ballot of the members in good standing present at a general or special meeting, after reasonable notice of the intention to vote upon such question, or (ii) by majority vote of the members in good standing voting in a referendum conducted by secret ballot through the mails, or (iii) in the case of a national or international labor organization, other than a federation of national and international organizations, by majority vote at a regular convention or a special convention held after not less than 30 days' written notice to the principal office of each local or constituent labor organization entitled to such notice.

(4) PROTECTION OF THE RIGHT TO SUE.—No such labor organization shall limit the right of any member or officer thereof to institute an action in any court, or in a proceeding before any administrative agency, irrespective of whether or not the labor organization or its officers are named as defendents or respondents in such action or proceeding, or the right of any member or officer of such labor organization to appear as a witness in any judicial, administrative, or legislative proceeding, or to petition any legislature or to communicate with any legislator: Provided, That any such member or officer may be required to exhaust reasonable hearing procedures (but not to exceed a six-month lapse of time) within such organization, before instituting legal or administrative proceedings against such organizations or any officer thereof: And provided further, That no employer or employer association shall directly or indirectly finance, encourage, or participate in, except as a party, any such action, proceeding, appearance or petition.

(5) SAFEGUARDS AGAINST IMPROPER DISCIPLINARY ACTION.—No member of any such labor organization may be fined, suspended, expelled, or otherwise disciplined except for nonpayment of dues by such organization or by any officer thereof unless such member has been (A) served with written specific charges; (B) given a reasonable time to prepare his defense; (C) afforded a full and fair hearing.

(6) Any provision of the constitution and bylaws or other governing charter of any labor organization engaged in an industry affecting commerce which is inconsistent with the provisions of this section shall be of no force or effect.

SEC. 102. Any person whose rights secured by the provisions of this title have been infringed may bring an action in a district court of the United States for such relief as may be appropriate. Any such action against a labor organization shall be brought in the United States district court for the district where the alleged violation occurred, or where the headquarters of such labor organization is located.

"SEC. 103. Nothing contained in this title shall limit the rights and remedies of any member of a labor organization under any State or Federal law or before any court or other tribunal.

TITLE II—REPORTING BY LABOR ORGANIZATIONS

SEC. 201. (a) Every labor organization shall file with the Secretary copies of its constitution, bylaws, and any other basic documents having similar effect, together with a report, signed by its president or other chief executive officer and by its secretary or other chief records officer, containing the following information:

(1) The name of the labor organization its mailing address, and any other address at which it maintains headquarters or a principal place of business or at which it keeps the records referred to in this title;

(2) The names and titles of its officers;

(3) The initiation fee or fees required from new or transferred members by the reporting labor organization;

(4) The regular dues or fees required to remain members of the reporting labor organization; and

(5) Detailed statements, or references to specific provisions of documents filed under this subsection which contain such statements, showing the provision made and procedures followed with respect to each of the following: (i) qualifications for or restrictions on membership, (ii) levying of assessments, (iii) participation in insurance or other benefit plans, (iv) authorization for disbursement of union funds, (v) audit of union financial transactions, (vi) the calling of regular and special meetings, (vii) the selection of officers and stewards and of any representatives to other bodies composed of labor organizations' representatives, with a specific statement of the manner in which each officer referred to in clause (2) was elected, appointed, or otherwise selected, (viii) discipline or removal of officers or agents for breaches of their trust, and (ix) imposition of fines, suspensions, and expulsions of members, including the grounds for such action and any provision made for notice, hearing, judgment on the evidence, and appeal procedures.

Any change in the information required by this subsection shall be reported to the Secretary at the time the reporting labor organization files with the Secretary the annual financial report required by subsection (b).

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President——

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MONRONEY in the chair). The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, this question has been voted on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Has the Senator from California yielded time to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, on a point of order no time needs to be yielded.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, if there is any question involved, I yield such time as my colleague needs to make his point of order.

Mr. BRIDGES. I do not think time need to be yielded for a point of order.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I object to the yielding of time. I may want some.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, as acting minority leader, I will yield the Senator such time as he may need.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I will yield time on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona has yielded time on the bill. It is not subject to the unanimous-consent agreement. The Senator from New Hampshire is recognized for such time as he may need to make his point of order.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry, so that we may be governed in the future on unanimous-consent concessions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MUNDT. Are we to understand that if a unanimous-consent agreement is entered into, the Chair can arbitrarily cut off a Member of the Senate from making a parliamentary inquiry or making a point of order unless the sponsor of an amendment is generous enough to yield some time to him for that purpose? If so, we had better revise the way unanimous-consent agreements are made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the unanimous-consent agreement, the time reserved on the bill was put under the control of the majority and minority leaders. If Members of the Senate on one side or the other desire to be yielded any of the controlled time, it can be yielded by those in control of the time.

Mr. MUNDT. Do I correctly understand it is the ruling of the Chair that on a parliamentary inquiry or a point of order a Senator is precluded from raising it unless one or the other of the Senators in control of the time makes time available to the Senator making the point or raising the parliamentary inquiry?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. When the time has been fixed under a unanimous-consent agreement, the Chair is bound to hold that the time comes under the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. MUNDT. I am not quarreling with the ruling of the Chair, but I put myself on notice to the majority leader that I am not going to grant unanimous consent to limit debate when the Chair can deny freedom of speech to a Senator, and I suggest that hereafter we revise unanimous-consent requests to meet this contingency, or I now file permanent objection to any other unanimous-consent agreements.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is within his rights to reserve his objection to unanimous-consent requests.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I ask the Chair to cite the rule which requires that time must be taken out of time scheduled for debate when a Senator raises a point of order or makes a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. At the request of the Senator from Arkansas, the clerk will read the unanimous-consent agreement which contains the Parliamentarian's reference to an allocation of time being required to discuss a point of order.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT

Ordered, That effective on the adoption of this order, during the further consideration of the bill S. 1555, the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959, debate on any amendment, and any amendment thereto, or motion, or appeal, except a motion to lay on the table, shall be limited to 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the mover of any such amendment or motion and the majority leader: Provided, That in the event the majority leader is in favor of any such amendment or motion, the time in opposition thereto shall be controlled by the minority leader or some Senator designated by him: Provided further, That no amendment that is not germane to the provisions of the said bill shall be received except those amendments now pending at the desk.

Ordered further, That on the question of the final passage of the said bill debate shall be limited to 3 hours, to be equally divided and controlled, respectively, by the majority and minority leaders: Provided, That the said leaders, or either of them, may, from the time under their control on the passage of the said bill, allot additional time to any Senator during the consideration of any amendment, motion, or appeal.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The parliamentary situation is that the distinguished Senator from California was recognized for 30 minutes for the presentation of the amendment he submitted. The Senator sought to yield time to the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] to discuss the point of order the Senator wishes to raise. Objection was made to that, and then time was yielded from the time on the bill by the acting minority leader, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER], who yielded time to the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire.

The Parliamentarian advises the present occupant of the chair that had the Senator who was recognized, the Senator from California, yielded back his time, or had he time remaining after presentation of his amendment, then the point of order could properly be raised and could properly be discussed. The Senator from California cannot be taken off the floor in order that another Senator may make a point of order.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, I raise a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. ALLOTT. The point of order is that under rule XX, paragraph 1 of the Rules of the Senate, it is stated:

A question of order may be raised at any stage of the proceedings, except when the Senate is dividing, and, unless submitted to the Senate, shall be decided by the Presiding Officer without debate, subject to an appeal to the Senate.

Then the rule goes on to provide what shall happen when an appeal is taken.

I raise the point of order that two Members of the Senate, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN], have been deprived of the floor without the right to make a point of order under rule XX of the Rules of the Senate.

Mr. President, I will add that a point of order is in order even when a Member is speaking; otherwise, it would not be possible to stop improper procedure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A point of order can be made when a Senator concludes his speech.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator who was recognized did endeavor to yield time, for the point of order to be made.

Mr. BUTLER. I appeal to the Presiding Officer——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection was heard, and then time was yielded by the Senator in control of the time for the minority side. The Senator from New Hampshire has the floor to discuss his point of order, and the Chair thinks he should proceed with that discussion.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, I raise another point of order. Both points of order, by the Senator from Arkansas——

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, who has the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire has the floor under the time yielded to him by the acting minority leader. The Senator is prepared to discuss his point of order.

The Chair will say again, in connection with the rule cited, that no Senator can be taken off the floor after having received recognition until he has concluded, unless he is proceeding out of order. There was no point of order made that the Senator was proceeding out of order. The point was that the amendment was not in order.

The Senator from New Hampshire has the floor. The business of the Senate will be expedited if the Senate will permit the distinguished Senator to proceed with his presentation of the point of order.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. KUCHEL. Am I correct in my understanding that the Senator from New Hampshire has the floor for the single and sole purpose of raising a point of order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

The Senator from New Hampshire has the floor under time yielded to him by the Senator from California.

Mr. KUCHEL. I thank the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. And then under time on the bill yielded by the acting minority leader.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Which time is the Senator using? [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

The Senator from New Hampshire may proceed.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, the evening before last an amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN] was adopted. The amendment was agreed to by a one-vote margin. Then there was a tie vote when a motion to reconsider was made and a motion made to lay the motion on the table. The tie was broken by the vote cast by the Vice President, and the motion to table was agreed to.

Under the rules of the Senate, when a vote is taken on an amendment and a motion is made to reconsider, which motion is tabled, the same amendment cannot be offered again.

The point of order which I am raising is that the amendment which is offered by the Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL], for himself and other Senators—which I am rather shocked to see offered—in effect calls for action again on the so-called McClellan amendment, and is therefore a violation of the rules. If it is not, then I should like to have stated specifically how the amendment offered by the Senator from California, for himself and other Senators, differs, point by point, from the amendment offered and agreed to, on which there was a motion to reconsider, which was tabled, which was the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will advise the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire that an examination of the amendment of the Senator from California shows there is a vast difference and a vast change from the amendment which was adopted by the Senate the night before last, which was presented by the Senator from Arkansas.

Under Senate practice, when an amendment inserting matter in a bill has been agreed to, a motion is in order to strike out contiguous matter preceding such amendment, the language of the amendment itself, and the language of the bill immediately following such amendment, and in lieu thereof to insert certain other language. If such motion were agreed to, it would eliminate from the bill the language of the amendment previously agreed to. Therefore, the Chair holds that the amendment of the Senator from California and his colleagues would insert new matter, would strike out other matter, and is properly before the Senate.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, because in my opinion it is in spirit a violation of the intent of the Senate rules, I appeal from the ruling of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The ruling of the Chair has been appealed from.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No second is necessary. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

The Senator from New Hampshire is now recognized for 30 minutes for a discussion of the ruling of the Chair, and his position in opposition to it.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire is recognized for 30 minutes, and may yield such time as he desires.

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, a point of order. An appeal from the ruling of the Chair is not subject to debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire has the floor.

The Senator has yielded time to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota is recognized.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The inquiry is this: Is the amendment offered by the Senator from California available in printed form for the Members of the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is available in printed form for the Members of the Senate.

Mr. MUNDT. No.

Mr. CAPEHART. Where is it?

Mr. BUTLER. No. Where is it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not available in print, but it is available in written form.

Mr. BUTLER. Sanskrit?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, I wish to make an observation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order. The Chair cannot hear the Senator from South Dakota.

The business of the Senate will be expedited if Members will kindly take their seats and preserve order.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, I wish to make an observation.

We are called upon to pass upon an appeal from a decision which involves a comparison of the language of a new amendment, which is a long amendment and which has just been read, and which, if available, is available in very limited numbers, with the language of an amendment previously adopted. Each Member of the Senate, on the yea-and-nay vote, will have to register whether in his opinion the amendment really offers new matter, so that it avoids the rule of double consideration of amendment which has been adopted and as to which a motion to reconsider was laid upon the table. It is practically an impossible situation, because obviously there are not enough copies available for every Member to make a comparison and determine whether or not the matter has been previously acted upon and decided.

Mr. SCOTT and Mr. KUCHEL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire has the floor. To whom does he yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I have just asked for a copy of the amendment and have not received it. I should like to have a copy of the amendment in order to act intelligently upon this question. I have asked one of the pages for a copy, and I was advised that it was not available.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. MUNDT. After the Senator from Pennsylvania has concluded reading his copy, I should like to see it also.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will Senators seeking permission from the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire to yield please address the Chair so that the Senator from New Hampshire may yield in proper order?

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, looking at the clock I see that it is now 10:30 p.m. We started this morning at 10 o'clock a.m. We have been in session for 12½ hours. Among the membership of the Senate are two Senators upon whom it is a terrible imposition to have to remain this late.

I have an amendment to offer, with respect to which I think every Senator has notice. I hope it will be interesting enough to be debated. That will require another hour. I feel that to be called upon first to pass upon an appeal from a ruling of the Chair on a matter about which we know nothing, respecting an amendment which has not been printed, about which most Senators have no knowledge, so that Senators do not know what the Chair has ruled upon, is intolerable. How could we possibly pass intelligently on such a ruling at this late hour without having had the opportunity to see what we are passing upon?

Even if the ruling of the Chair should be upheld, and we should proceed with the discussion of the amendment of the Senator from California, it is debatable. In addition, it is subject to amendment. We have had no opportunity to read it, no opportunity to see whether it should be amended. I think it is an outrageous procedure.

I say to the majority leader that I think he is imposing on the membership of the Senate, both on this side and on the other side, by insisting on the Senate remaining in session under these conditions. [Applause.]

I have supported the majority leader, and I expect to continue to support him when he is reasonable; but when he asks the Senate to remain in session for 12½ hours, and then undertake the solution of questions of this type without warning, without notice, without opportunity to be heard, or to see what we are passing upon, I say that that is not reasonable. [Applause.]

Mr. President, I am not foreclosing what I shall do when voting upon the ruling of the Chair. It may well be that the ruling is correct. If so, and if I think it is at the time I vote, I shall vote to uphold it. If I do not think it is, I shall vote not to uphold it.

But that is not the question at all. We are asked to vote here unintelligently, unknowingly, without any information, without any opportunity to obtain information, and in a situation in which the very lives of some Senators are being endangered. I say that is the most unreasonable procedure we could possibly have, and I, for one, will not sit here and remain silent, in a situation which I think calls out to high heaven for its irresponsibility and unreasonableness.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina and Mr. KUCHEL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield; and, if so, to whom?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield 1 minute to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President every Member of the Senate knows that we are in this situation today because the Senate did not study the amendment properly. If the Senate had, probably the Senators would have caught what was in the amendment referred to.

We are called upon at this late hour to consider an amendment consisting of three typewritten pages. I do not know what is in it, and I doubt whether any other Senator knows what is in it, except possibly the few who drafted the amendment.

That being so, I think it would be advisable for the Senate to adjourn tonight, in order to give us time to study this question and enable us to vote intelligently on it at the next meeting of the Senate.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point a statement which I have prepared in connection with the pending bill.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR JOHNSTON OF SOUTH CAROLINA

Earlier this week I voted against the McClellan amendment to the labor reform bill. I based my opposition to this amendment primarily on the issue of States rights. I, likewise, felt that legislation going too far in penalizing labor would have no chance to pass the Congress and I sincerely want to see labor reform legislation enacted this year. Gangsterism in labor unions and corrupt operation of unions must be halted but we cannot achieve this objective by enacting legislation that will destroy the right of trial by jury and give dictatorial powers to the Secretary of Labor that we do not even give to the Attorney General.

In my opinion, the McClellan amendment contains injunctive procedures which if approved in the labor field will open the door for such procedures in the field of civil rights. The McClellan amendment grants the Secretary of Labor power to obtain through the Federal courts injunctions to restrain anyone violating or threatening to violate the provisions of the bill. It is my opinion that the McClellan amendment contains powers far beyond any civil rights legislation yet proposed and it similarly does not contain a jury trial requirement in cases brought under the act. This amendment effectively enforces integration in social activities of unions and, in my opinion, is the first step to a broad Federal FEPC program which will become a menace to management and industry as a whole as well as to labor.

This entire amendment contains every evil which I have fought against in the Judiciary Committee in the field of civil rights legislation. If the McClellan amendment passes, in my opinion, it will open the door for civil rights legislation more severe than has ever been proposed in the U.S. Senate. The McClellan amendment to this labor bill is much stronger than the so-called Douglas civil rights bill. This bill gives the Secretary of Labor power to force integration of thousands of union locals and certainly would set an example or a pattern for the Attorney General to follow in school cases throughout the Nation.

No one in the U.S. Senate is more anxious to see the enactment of fair legislation to restrain corrupt labor leaders from taking advantage of honest working people and to eliminate racketeering of all kinds from labor unions.

But I will never vote for legislation to do this if this same legislation will set the stage to destroy our school systems in the South and place a direct threat against our local and State school officials and, in my opinion, that is what the McClellan amendment does.

I cannot fight in the Judiciary Committee to kill such legislation in civil rights matters and vote for such matters in the field of labor on the floor of the Senate. This is inconsistency. We fought to kill similar harsh civil rights legislation 2 years ago and won most of that fight partly because of support from labor which feared that such powers would spread into the field of labor.

Now the threat is against labor and we had better not grant such dictatorial power to the Federal Government because it will spread into the civil rights field and threaten every single person, labor or otherwise, in this country.

One must be consistent in the battle for States rights. I cannot be for States rights in civil rights matters alone and be against States rights in labor matters. One must be consistent, for once the dam is broken there is no end to the problem.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I move——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland will take his seat.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Hampshire yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the majority leader?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield for 2 minutes to the majority leader.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, first I wish to answer the charges which have been made about no notice having been given to Members of the Senate. Some Members may not have observed the notice, but if they will read the RECORD, if they were present when the notice was given, they will know that it was the agreement of the leadership that the Senate would remain in session until late in the evening, perhaps as late as 11 o'clock this evening.

That agreement was reached because many Members had speaking engagements on Saturday, and desired to be out of the city. It was hoped that the Senate could complete consideration of the bill this evening; and, until the latest demonstration, I believe most Senators intimately connected with the measure felt that that was possible.

I have no disposition to insist that a vote be taken on final passage of the bill this evening, or that the Senate remain in session any longer than a majority of the Senate desires to have it remain in session.

I spent a few hours during the past week attempting to accommodate the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] who had a speaking engagement in his State, and who insisted that we attempt to complete action on a certain measure so that he could keep his speaking engagement. I do not think I have ever dealt with a person more impatient or one more insistent than he was upon that occasion.

The Senator from Florida was very much interested in the passage of the Hawaii statehood bill. He had been very active in connection with that bill, and I desired that he have an opportunity to vote on it before he returned to his State. So at his insistence, and with the understanding and tolerance of the distinguished minority leader, we pressed for a vote, and obtained a vote, so that the Senator from Florida could be accommodated.

One Senator told me that it was necessary for him to be in his State tomorrow, and that he would like to remain here as late as 1 o'clock, if necessary, to try to vote on the bill this evening.

I am perfectly willing, if it is the wish of the majority of the Senate, to adjourn tonight, and return here tomorrow. I expect to be here. That would inconvenience several Members who have speaking engagements, but if that is the wish of the majority, I have no desire to impose on any Senator.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. BUTLER. Why must we come back tomorrow? What is the urgency of this particular bill? We should have a day or two to study the proposal which has been placed before the Senate. This is the most important part of the bill. This is the heart of the bill; and yet the majority leader wants us to consider it from 11 o'clock tonight until—what time tomorrow? When does the majority leader wish to have the Senate convene tomorrow?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I would be glad to have the Senate convene at noon tomorrow.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the amendment be printed? Will Senators have it?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes; it will be printed.

Mr. BUTLER. What is the hurry about it?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. There is no hurry about it. The Senator is in a hurry. I am not in a hurry.

Mr. BUTLER. Let us do this thing right.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I will do it right. Much more time will be consumed in consideration of the Kuchel proposal than was consumed in connection with the original bill-of-rights amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. That is why the time for consideration should be longer.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Action on the original bill-of-rights amendment was somewhat expedited.

Mr. BUTLER. That is perfectly correct. But we should have time to consider this proposal.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, if the Senator from New Hampshire will yield to me, I shall appreciate it.

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. In view of the demonstrations, in view of the lateness of the hour, and in view of the apparent desire of many Members not to vote on the appeal from the decision, and in order to show any Members who may desire to suspend now, that I am perfectly willing to suspend, I should like to move that the Senate adjourn until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

Mr. HOLLAND, Mr. KUCHEL, Mr. BUSH, Mr. BUTLER, and other Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield? If so, to whom does he yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I appreciate the courtesy and graciousness of the Senator from New Hampshire in yielding to me, and I certainly appreciate the graciousness and courtesy of the Senator from Texas for his willingness to adjourn the Senate until tomorrow, instead of keeping us here after this late hour, under these conditions.

I am certainly glad to express again my gratitude for the kindness of the distinguished majority leader on the occasion which he has mentioned. I am sure I could recite to the Senate a good many occasions on which the Senator from Florida showed kindness to the Senator from Texas. However, I thought that was proper, and I am glad I was able to show those kindnesses. I do not regret any of them or apologize for any of them. I am delighted that the Senator has come back to reason and is now proposing to make a motion to adjourn until tomorrow. I hope he will promptly make such a motion.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The Senator from Texas has never been away from reason. I call attention to the announcement I made on Thursday, April 23, immediately after the Senate met. I said:

> I anticipate that unless action on the pending labor bill is concluded soon, we shall have evening sessions for the remainder of the week, lasting until late in the evening, possibly as late as 11 or 11:30 o'clock.

I said that because several Senators had told me that they needed to be away on Saturday. I was attempting to accommodate them just as I had accommodated the Senator from Florida a few weeks prior thereto, by asking several of our colleagues to stay, so that the Senator could get away the next day.

I should now like to make a motion to adjourn, unless the Senator from New Hampshire wishes us to stay in session a little longer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield for that purpose?

Mr. BRIDGES. I do not yield for that purpose at this time. I yield 1 minute to the Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL].

Mr. KUCHEL. I shall have to talk very rapidly. First of all I hope that those who have joined with me in offering the amendment to the bill need not apologize to our colleagues. We were under the assumption that tonight would see a vote on the passage of the bill. What are Senators to do if they cannot find access to a machine which will grind out amendments? This is not the first time this procedure has been resorted to. In complete good faith—if I need to say it—we have submitted a proposal which we thought would clean up what we adopted the other night.

If my colleague will let me do so, I should like to have the amendment printed, as well as the one which has just been read, so that they may be on the desks of our colleagues. In that way we could, in good form, proceed to dispose of the amendments tomorrow.

Mr. BRIDGES. I will yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I should like to have the attention of the majority leader, to ask the majority leader if he would not modify his motion so that the Senate will meet at noon on Monday next.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I hope the Senator will not press his request because we have a supplemental appropriation bill to consider. It is of an emergency nature. We have held it behind the pending bill for more than 3 days now. I have announced that we would have a Saturday session. Senators have made their plans accordingly. I said we would have a Saturday session unless we completed action on the bill today. I have obtained the consent of those in charge of the bill and of the minority leadership to a Saturday session. I obtained that consent earlier in the week.

Mr. BUSH. I believe the Senator will agree with me that the impression has gotten around among Senators that we would continue in session today until we finished consideration of the bill. Consequently, commitments have been made for the weekend. They are commitments of an important nature, not frivolous ones, at least those that I know of. I believe that under the circumstances it would be proper and fair to adjourn until Monday. I therefore ask the majority leader to modify his motion accordingly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The parliamentary situation is that the Senator from New Hampshire has refused to yield for the purpose of making a motion to adjourn. The Senator from New Hampshire has the floor.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield 1 minute to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORSE. I should like the attention of the Senator from Texas for a moment. I should like to say to my majority leader that it is perfectly obvious what the pleasure of the majority of the Senate is at this moment. I may read it wrong, but I believe the majority of the Senate feels that, in view of the work which has been done this week and the hours which have been kept this week, and the fact that many of us need a weekend to get some work done, the reasonable program for us to follow now is to recess until Monday at 10 or 11 o'clock, and to proceed on Monday morning.

I believe it would be a good idea to have that amount of time also for a little relaxation on the part of Senators. We know what is happening here. Tensions have become high. I should like to plead with my majority leader that he modify his motion to recess until Monday at 10 o'clock. I would be willing to predict, if the majority leader did that, it would be to his parliamentary advantage for the rest of the session.

Mr. BRIDGES. As I see it, the amendment which has been offered is nothing but a subterfuge to get away from the McClellan amendment which was adopted and on which a motion to reconsider was tabled.

I am amazed that it should be offered. I thought we had acted in good faith. So far as I am concerned, I have stated the reasons for my position, and certainly the reasons of many of the Senators who feel the same way. I stand on the appeal from the ruling of the Chair. I am willing to yield now for the purpose of making a motion to adjourn.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. BUTLER. I move that the Senate recess until Monday at noon.

Mr. HOLLAND. I hope the distinguished Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair wishes to know whether the Senator from New Hampshire yielded to the Senator from Maryland for the purpose of making a motion to recess.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would like, in the interest of orderly procedure, to read from Senate Procedure at page 267, because so many questions have arisen and so many points of order have been made. The Chair will read as follows:

INTERRUPTION OF SENATOR WHO HAS THE FLOOR IS NOT ALLOWED, EXCEPT BY HIS CONSENT

Permission to interrupt a Senator who is in possession of the floor must be acquired through the Chair, by addressing him and inquiring if the Senator will yield.[185]

A Senator in debate should address the Presiding Officer first, and not the individual Member of the Senate.[186]

A Senator in possession of the floor, or who has been recognized does not have to yield or may not be interrupted against his will in the middle of a speech or without his consent,[187] unless he is called to order under rule XIX; [188] no other Senator has a right to question him or to make remarks against his will during the course of his speech; [189] and it is the duty of the Chair to enforce the rule on his own initiative.[190]

Under rule XXXV, relative to a session with closed doors, a Senator may move to close the doors of the Senate for a discussion of business which may, in his opinion, require secrecy, over the objection of the Senator in possession of the floor.[191]

A Senator who has the floor may not be interrupted or taken off the floor without his consent for the purpose of (1) taking an appeal from a ruling by the Chair; [192] (2) suggesting the absence of a quorum; [193] (3) introducing a bill; [194] (4) presenting a conference report; [195] (5) transacting business; [196] (6) submitting a committee report; [197] (7) making a motion for an executive session; [198] (8) acting on a message from the President or the House of Representatives; [199] (9) introducing a matter of morning business; [200] (10) making a parliamentary inquiry; [201] (11) raising a question of personal privilege; [202] (12) presenting a petition to the Senate; [203] (13) considering a privileged matter; [204] (14) making a point of order; [205] (15) introducing a resolution or other matter; [206] (16) making a motion to lay a pending motion on the table; [207] (17) or laying a veto message before the Senate.[208]

The Senator from New Hampshire has the floor.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. MUNDT. I think that was a very informative and useful presentation the Presiding Officer has made.

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, may we have order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. MUNDT. I might suggest that a sequel could be added in the RECORD, because on Monday, or whenever it is the intention of the majority leader that we meet, we will have to vote on this important point of order. As one Member of the Senate, I have watched the so-called clincher motion year after year. A motion to reconsider a vote is made and then a motion is made to lay that motion on the table. That usually spells finis to the matter. Now we find it was all an idle gesture.

If I understand the tentative ruling of the Chair, it now means that all that is accomplished after a motion is made to reconsider and a motion is made to lay that motion on the table is that, instead of substituting language for that particular amendment, it is necessary to knock out a sentence or two before the amendment and a sentence or two after the amendment, and then it is possible to continue ad infinitum, ad nauseam. If that is correct, it is correct; I do not know.

But I think it would be useful to the Senate if, by unanimous consent, the Presiding Officer of the Senate followed the announcement he made about Members addressing the Senate directly without addressing the Chair, by including at this point in the RECORD, so that we can study it between now and Monday, background documents and precedents which tend to substantiate and buttress the ruling of the Chair. Then we can vote intelligently on this question when it comes before us on Monday. Certainly, as one Senator, I must find that this is a device for getting around what I thought was a clincher motion.

I wonder if the Chair, with the assistance of the Parliamentarians, will undertake to place in the RECORD at this point something which will dilate further upon the reasons for the Chair's ruling.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The footnotes which the Chair has cited will take care of the justification and the precedents on the order of business. The ruling of the Chair, made with the advice of the Parliamentarian, is subject to the will of the Senate, as the Senator from South Dakota well knows.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] has held the floor for several minutes for the purpose of discussing why the Senate should overturn the ruling of the Chair. That can be done in an expeditious way, if the Senate wishes to work its will.

Mr. MUNDT. That is very true; but, speaking for myself before voting on whether to overturn the ruling of the Chair, I should like to have in the RECORD some of the precedents and previous decisions dealing with this point. This is certainly not the first time this question has arisen in the Senate. If, indeed, this is an escape hatch from the clincher motion, it is something of which we should all be made aware. If it can be done with respect to this item, it can be followed next week on another motion, and the week after that on another motion. It seems to me we run the risk of following a dilatory tactic which I had assumed the clincher motion was designed to eliminate.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. If the Senate wishes to remain in session, I am willing to have it proceed to consider the appeal from the ruling of the Chair and the amendment offered by the Senator from California. But if Senators are tired and want to go home, I am prepared to carry out the plan which the minority leader and majority leader agreed upon early in the week, which was to have the Senate stay in session as late as 11 or 11:30 tonight and then to have a Saturday session, unless action on the bill was completed.

If the Senator from New Hampshire will yield for this purpose, I am prepared to move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I believe the Senator from New Hampshire had yielded to me.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Then I am not responsible for keeping the Senate in session. I have been prepared to move that the Senate adjourn. If the Senator from New Hampshire will yield for that purpose, I am prepared to move that the Senate adjourn.

I anticipate this action for what it is. I think some Senators do not want to vote on the motion which has been made. I am prepared to have the Senate vote on it tomorrow after an hour's debate. But I do not want it said that the leadership is keeping the Senate in session if the Senator from New Hampshire will not yield for a motion to adjourn.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, would it be possible for me to get a response from the Chair as to whether we can be provided with a documentation of the Chair's ruling before we vote on the question at the next session?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair advises the Senator from South Dakota that the decision of the Chair that the amendment included new matter and, in its consideration, would strike out contiguous matter previously passed on is the ruling of the Chair. The Senate has the right to overturn that ruling by a majority vote. Whether to attempt to collect the precedents which would apply to the question whether the changes proposed by the amendment affect an amendment previously adopted, or embrace a considerable amount of new matter, is a matter of discretion and determination on the part of the Chair or by individual Members of the Senate. To plow through years of precedents and to make a study of the yellowed pages of past amendments would require far more time than the majority leader is willing to provide for any adjournment or recess of the Senate.

For these reasons, the Chair advises the Senator from South Dakota that he may make any challenge he wishes to the ruling of the Chair; but the ruling of the Chair, unless it is disagreed to by the Senate, will stand.

Mr. BRIDGES. I myself would like to vote on the appeal from the ruling of the Chair tonight; but I am perfectly willing to yield to the majority leader, if we can have the Senate adjourn until Monday—at any time on Monday—for I think we would be in no better position to vote tomorrow than we are tonight.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. In order to vote intelligently upon the appeal to the membership, it is necessary to compare the amendment offered by the Senator from California with the language of the amendment which was voted upon and adopted, and reconsideration denied. I think it is a confession on the part of each one of us that we would be voting without intelligence, if we tried to vote without having both documents before us for comparison.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I do not agree with the statement of the distinguished Senator from Ohio. This is a procedural matter. The Chair, representing the entire Senate, has rendered a decision. We do not have to know what the amendment before us is or how it differs from the original McClellan amendment. What we are testing is the honesty and character of the occupant of the Chair, no matter who he may be.

SEVERAL SENATORS. No, no.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I voted for the McClellan amendment in good faith. I am proud of the vote I cast. I do not feel now that simply because three or four Senators have got together and all of a sudden want to modify the amendment, I should change my opinion. I do not want to change my opinion. I know that I voted correctly because of the telegrams I have received which have been complaining about my vote. [Laughter.] I for one have not changed my mind.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from New Hampshire has expired.

TRANSACTION OF ADDITIONAL ROUTINE BUSINESS

By unanimous consent, the following routine business was transacted:

PETITIONS

Petitions, etc., were presented, and referred, as indicated:

THE WITHHOLDING TAX AND INFLATION—PETITION

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I present, for appropriate reference, a paper in the nature of a petition, signed by O. J. Lokken, of Walcott, N. Dak., relating to the withholding tax and inflation. I ask unanimous consent that the petition be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A NON-PROFESSIONAL DIAGNOSIS

I sat in a barbershop waiting my turn. Pearl Harbor was history and Congress was wrestling with the problem of obtaining increased revenues to finance the ensuing fracas. Up spoke another man who was also waiting his turn in the shop: "Let them levy all the taxes they please. They can not collect from me. I spend as fast as I make it." But Congress was wise to him and levied a withholding tax. The man who boasted that he spent the money as fast as he made it, found that he did not get it to spend. The tax was deducted from his pay check before he got the check.

But the spender merely bided his time. VJ day came and with it a lessening of the importance of sacrifice which is the essence of patriotism. And now came a clamor for take-home-pay which, when granted, nullified the withholding provision. To get the same take-home-pay as he had before the enactment of the withholding provision he would have to be granted an increase in pay to offset the amount withheld. As the amount withheld was to pay a tax, the effect would be either to cancel the tax or pass it on to some other taxpayer. The latter was the result. But the one on to whom the tax was passed in the form of higher wages paid or higher prices paid for goods, was in no mood or position to absorb the taxes passed on to him. He passed them on to somebody else and he, in turn, to somebody else. And the flood of inflation which had been growing since the cheapening of the dollar by the New Deal became an avalanche no man can stop. What destruction will follow in its wake no one knows. The outlook is, indeed, a dreary one.

RESOLUTIONS OF ORGANIZATIONS OF NORTH DAKOTA

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I present, for appropriate reference, resolutions adopted by organizations in the State of North Dakota. I ask unanimous consent that the resolutions be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were received, appropriately referred, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

"RESOLUTION OF SHEYENNE VALLEY ELECTRIC COOPERATIVE, INC., FINLEY, N. DAK.

"Whereas our rural electrification cooperative has conformed to the area coverage mandate of the Rural Electrification Act; and

"Whereas our area is sparsely settled, having a density of 1.1 member per mile of line; and

"Whereas the Federal Government, through the Rural Electrification Administration, made available funds at 2 percent interest, recognizing the necessity for ample finances at a reasonable rate; and

"Whereas without such consideration from the Rural Electrification Administration as set forth in the original act, our cooperative cannot continue serving its members at the present energy rates; and

"Whereas any change in the interest rates as it applies to future funds for rural electrification expansion would, in our opinion, become extremely injurious to our rural electrification cooperative; and

"Whereas the present controversial interest subject is being engendered by those who are not concerned with balancing the Nation's budget, but by those who are determined one way or another to eliminate the rural electrification cooperatives as a competitor in the electric energy market: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the board of directors of the Sheyenne Valley Electric Cooperative at this meeting dated March 30, 1959, respectfully urge all 98 U.S. Senators to vigorously oppose any proposition or plan designed to increase the interest rates to the rural electrification cooperatives and/or any plan designed to subject the cooperatives to private finance, which would mean increased money costs.

"SHEYENNE VALLEY ELECTRIC CO-OP.,
"JULIUS ANDERSON, President."

To the Committee on Armed Services:

"RESOLUTION ON ATOMIC TESTING

"Whereas after years of censorship the Government has recently admitted the evils of nuclear weapons testing; and

"Whereas the radioactive particles are falling to earth much faster than anticipated, thus polluting the Nation's milk supply and feed crops; and

"Whereas 9,000 scientists have testified as to the dangerous effects of atomic radiation on human beings and animals in the form of strontium 90 and carbon 14; and

"Whereas there is as yet no protection against all the perils, known and unknown, of atomic fallout; and

"Whereas no government has the moral right to expose its citizens to the cancer potential in strontium 90 or the mutations, defective offspring and birth monsters resulting from carbon 14 in radioactive fallout:

"Therefore we, the members of the Golden Grain Local of the Farmers Union of Bergen, N. Dak., in meeting Saturday evening, April 4, 1959, do hereby strongly urge our Congressmen to do all in their power to put an immediate ban on further A- and H-bomb explosions.

"FRANCIS HOLTE,
"President.
"MRS. WALDEMAR ZABACK,
"Secretary-Treasurer.
"WILLIAM MOXNESS,
"Legislative Director."

To the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy:

"RESOLUTION OF SHEYENNE VALLEY ELECTRIC COOPERATIVE, INC., FINLEY, N. DAK.

"Whereas the expansion of our economy to meet our growing population is dependent upon an abundance of low cost electric energy, and

"Whereas the early maximum development and production of small atomic energy reactor plants, together with large atomic energy reactor plants, will bring about an additional source of cheap energy, and

"Whereas America as a Nation, must compete for that No. 1 position in world leadership through an ever growing economy, and

"Whereas other countries are seeking to reach that No. 1 position through the development and mass production of these reactor plants, and

"Whereas several nations are now already even with and, in some instances, ahead of our country even though America was first to develop the use of the atom: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the board of directors of the Sheyenne Valley Electric Cooperative at this meeting dated March 30, 1959, respectfully urge all 98 United States Senators to support Senate bill 683; and be it further

"Resolved, That all 98 U.S. Senators use their influence and prestige to encourage mass development of atomic energy for peaceful purposes.

"SHEYENNE VALLEY ELECTRIC CO-OP.,
"JULIUS ANDERSON, President."

GTA DAILY RADIO ROUNDUP

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I present, for appropriate reference, the GTA Daily Radio Roundup, prepared by the GTA Public Relations Department, St. Paul, Minn., of Tuesday, April 21, 1959. I ask unanimous consent that the Roundup be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the Roundup was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

There is an investigation afoot in Washington that may reveal some rather sordid dealings in surplus farm commodities. It comes on the heels of Representative JAMIE WHITTEN's demand for a raking over of Secretary of Agriculture Benson's administration of the farm agency.

A Government Operations Subcommittee of the House of Representatives has launched a long-range probe because stories have been leaking out from various sources that big windfall profits are being made by food processors on such things as sales of surplus dried milk.

The way one newspaper describes it—the Springfield (Mo.) Leader and Press—"Some sharp dealers are cashing in at the expense of both farmers and taxpayers."

House investigators, the newspaper reveals, "have turned up the fact that private traders have been reaping a lucrative harvest in purchasing surplus farm products from the Commodity Credit Corporation and immediately disposing of them to the International Cooperative Administration."

The ICA, incidentally, was established after World War II to help handle aid and foodstuffs overseas.

In one case cited by James R. Naughton, counsel for the House Governmental Operations Subcommittee, "Private traders bought 5 billion pounds of dried milk from the CCC for 9.9 cents a pound and immediately sold that same dried milk to the ICA for 11.9 cents a pound."

That was a neat $100,000 profit on a single deal that involved little more than signing the checks and the contracts.

The milk case was cited by Naughton as just one example. But are there more like it? And how many?

The recent dried milk deal reminds many farmers of a similar fantastic episode several years ago. At that time Agriculture Secretary Benson had been hinting at reducing dairy supports. Several days before the price support cut, a number of big cheese and dairy processors unloaded millions of pounds on Uncle Sam at the prevailing price. A few days later, after the price support was cut, they bought back the same cheese at the new and lower price. The cheese never left the warehouses.

Later, when the deal came out in the open, the Federal Government sued and made partial recovery. National Dairy Products Co. alone was compelled to repay more than $400 million.

"The saddest part of this sad situation," comments the Missouri newspaper, is that in all cases, "the costs are charged to the farm program."

So now Congress is probing Secretary Benson's administration of the surplus program to find out what's been happening since the big cheese deal came off several years ago.

And certainly, the public, including farmers, is entitled to know if it is not getting the best possible return on dollars invested in food and fiber stocks. We'll keep you posted on results of this new investigation through this radio program, sponsored by the farmers who own and operate GTA the co-op way.

RESOLUTION OF THE ORDER SONS OF ITALY IN AMERICA

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, recently the Order Sons of Italy in America adopted a resolution expressing their views on immigration. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution may be printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas thousands of Americans, in accordance with the terms and provisions of existing laws on immigration dealing with fourth preference cases, have filed appropriate petitions for their brothers, sisters, sons, or daughters residing in foreign nations, and

Whereas fourth preference visas can be issued only when deficiencies occur in the first, second or third preference which are allotted 100 percent of the quota, a rare and unlikely occurrence in counties with low quota numbers such as Italy (5645), and

Whereas the accumulated backlog over a 10-year period now numbers approximately 80,000 petitions, causing an uneasy international situation with national repercussions in many countries, including the United States, and

Whereas Public Law 85–316 permits the reuniting of certain relatives under the conditions as therein stated: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the executive committee of the Supreme Council, Order Sons of Italy in America, at Toronto, Canada, this 4th day of April, A.D. 1959, That we respectfully request the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States to amend the provisions of existing law or adopt new legislation, which shall include fourth preference quota cases in the same classification as first, second, and third preference quota cases, thus permitting these applicants to enter the United States at an early date and reestablish family units which have been separated for long periods of time through no fault of their own; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to: The President of the United States; the President of the U.S. Senate; the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States; the Secretary of State of the United States; the chairmen of the Immigration Committees in the Congress of the United States; the majority and minority leaders in both Houses of Congress; the Director of the Immigration Bureau; each of the grand venerables throughout the United States with instructions that the Senate legislatures of the several States be contacted and urged to adopt similar resolutions to be forwarded as herein stated.

LABOR-MANAGEMENT REPORTING AND DISCLOSURE ACT OF 1959—AMENDMENTS

Mr. KUCHEL (for himself, Mr. ANDERSON, Mr. CLARK, Mr. CHURCH, Mr. NEUBERGER, Mr. GORE, Mr. COOPER, Mr. JAVITS, and Mr. AIKEN) submitted an amendment, intended to be proposed by them, jointly, to the bill (S. 1555) to provide for the reporting and disclosure of certain financial transactions and administrative practices of labor organizations and employers, to prevent abuses in the administration of trusteeships by labor organizations, to provide standards with respect to the election of officers of labor organizations, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. THURMOND submitted an amendment, intended to be proposed by him, to Senate bill 1555, supra, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. MOSS submitted an amendment, intended to be proposed by him, to Senate bill 1555, supra, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. SMATHERS submitted an amendment, intended to be proposed by him, to Senate bill 1555, supra, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

COST OF PAYING UNGRADED CIVILIAN EMPLOYEES IN NAVY DEPARTMENT

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Mr. President, the Comptroller General of the United States on April 15, 1959, filed with the Congress a report showing that it costs the Navy Department $2 million a year to pay its ungraded civilian employees by the week instead of conforming with the standard Federal biweekly pay period.

I hope the Appropriations Committees and the Armed Services Committees of the House and Senate will take cognizance of this report by the Comptroller General and act to eliminate this nonessential $2 million annual expenditure.

I ask unanimous consent that the attached statement by me on this subject be included in the body of the RECORD as part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR BYRD OF VIRGINIA

I am advised that it costs the Navy Department $2 million a year to pay its ungraded civilian employees by the week instead of conforming with the standard Federal biweekly pay period.

This nonessential Federal expenditure for payroll paper-pushing was reported to the Joint Committee on Reduction of Nonessential Federal Expenditures by the Comptroller General of the United States.

The report was in response to a standing request for notification of unnecessary expenses incident to Federal payrolls developed in the course of the Comptroller General's audits.

In his letter covering the report Comptroller General Joseph Campbell said:

"Contrary to the practice followed by most other departments of the Government, the Navy is incurring unnecessary annual costs estimated to be $2 million to pay on a weekly basis their civilian employees occupying ungraded positions."

The report said "preparing weekly payrolls for more than 200,000 civilian employees * * * considerably increases the cost of payroll preparation and creates an unnecessary burden on payroll departments."

The Comptroller General cited a 1955 report initiated by the Navy itself to show that shifting to a biweekly pay period "would result in considerable savings in manpower, materials, and electronic data processing machine time."

The Navy attempted to justify its practice with the contentions that it is the prevailing practice of private industry in certain areas to pay blue-collar workers by the week; and that to "change to a biweekly pay system would have a profound effect upon our employees' morale."

The Navy's contentions did not impress the Comptroller General. He said other departments and agencies of the Government pay on a biweekly basis; and that the Army and Air Force Departments, employing workers on similar work in the same areas, made the change with no significant difficulty.

The Navy challenged the Comptroller General's estimates of savings, but the Comptroller General cited again the Navy's own study, along with recommendations by "several large naval installations" as the basis for his $2 million figure.

There are some people in the Federal Government who would regard $2 million as less than "chicken feed." I leave the importance of such savings to the judgment of most of the American taxpayers who checked in with their internal revenue collectors April 15.

I congratulate the Comptroller General on his vigilance, and I hope the Navy and all other elements of the Federal Government may find increasing reason to consider the morale of taxpayers who are called upon to meet Federal payrolls and all the rest of $80 billion annual expenditure budgets.

ADJOURNMENT TO 11 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn until 11 o'clock tomorrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 10 o'clock and 59 minutes p.m.) the Senate adjourned until tomorrow, Saturday, April 25, 1959, at 11 o'clock a.m.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

The Moscow Fair—U.S. Exhibit on the Role of Religion in American Life

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. DODD
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, April 24, 1959

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, on April 10, I wrote to George V. Allen, Director of the U.S. Information Agency, and urged that an exhibit depicting the role of religion in American life be included in the forthcoming American exhibit at the Moscow Fair.

I have since received from Mr. Allen assurances that such an exhibit will be included.

I wrote further to Mr. Allen and suggested that the National Conference of Christians and Jews be assigned the task of planning the exhibit, in order that we may be assured that this religious exhibit will be truly representative of America's great religious groups.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD my correspondence with Mr. Allen; an editorial from the New Haven Register of April 19, 1959; and an editorial from the Bridgeport Post of April 20, 1959.

There being no objection, the correspondence and the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. GEORGE V. ALLEN,
Director, U.S. Information Agency,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. ALLEN: It has been brought to my attention by visitors to the Brussels Fair that there was not a single display of a religious nature in the American exhibit.

It is incomprehensible to me that an American exhibit designed to portray the various aspects of American life should neglect one of its principal elements, the role of religion.

Millions of visitors from all over the world went through the American exhibit. We missed a wonderful opportunity to demonstrate to these people the importance of religion in the development of our history, and its great influence on contemporary American affairs.

Many of the early colonists of our continent came here in quest of religious freedom. Many of our first settlements were essentially religious settlements.

Throughout our history our great state documents, such as the Declaration of Independence, Washington's Farewell Address, and Lincoln's Second Inaugural, have been expressions of basic moral principles.

Therefore, I consider it inexcusable that any exhibit purporting to be representative of American life should fail to depict its most important aspect.

The next exposition of this kind will be at the Moscow Fair. Our mistakes at the Brussels Fair must not be repeated. The State Department should see to it that the American display at the Moscow Fair contains a religious exhibit indicative of the fundamental place of religion in American society.

With best wishes.

Sincerely yours,

THOMAS J. DODD.

APRIL 20, 1959.

The Honorable GEORGE V. ALLEN,
Director, U.S. Information Agency,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. ALLEN: On April 10, 1959, I wrote to you urging that an exhibit of a religious nature be included in the forthcoming American exposition in Moscow.

I suggested this because our religions have played such an important role in American history, and their influence on contemporary affairs is so great, that no exhibition which purports to be representative of American life would be complete without a religious demonstration.

I realize that many difficulties will be encountered in preparing an exhibit that seeks to do justice to America's many religious denominations, and their historical contribution to our Nation.

Therefore, I recommend that the National Conference of Christians and Jews be given jurisdiction over planning the contents of this proposed exhibit.

I think this would assure a devout tone, an historical accuracy, and a proper balance that would be agreeable to our Nation's various religious groups.

Sincerely yours,

THOMAS J. DODD.

[From the New Haven Register, Apr. 19, 1959]

A RELIGIOUS NOTE IN OUR MOSCOW SHOW?

Connecticut's Senator DODD has urged the State Department to make plans for a religious exhibit at the Moscow Fair this year. Such a display, stressing the fundamental place of religion in American society, would—he feels—have an important role in defining the origins and the roots of the sort of freedom for which the United States stands.

This is a stimulating proposal.

Certainly one of the fundamental differences between our views and those of the Communist leaders springs from the Kremlin's denial of God, its denial of religion, and its attempted substitution of a totalitarian party ethic for the established beliefs of so many people in so many parts of the world that are now under its control.

"It is incomprehensible to me that an American exhibit designed to portray the various aspects of American life should neglect one of its principal elements, the role of religion," says Senator DODD. And he points out that such an element was neglected in the U.S. show at last year's Brussels World Fair.

"Many of the early colonists of our continent came here in quest of religious freedom. Many of our first settlements were essentially religious settlements. Throughout our history our great State documents, such as the Declaration of Independence, Washington's Farewell Address, and Lincoln's Second Inaugural, have been expressions of basic moral principles.

"Therefore I consider it inexcusable that any exhibit purporting to be representative of American life should fail to depict its most important aspect."

The Dodd proposal is one that the State Department and the American people should weigh most seriously. The religious freedoms which we enjoy and the individual rights which we uphold often promote a sort of bland avoidance of all religious statement in this country. Among peoples abroad, though, the religious diversity which we take for granted and the religious faith which we rarely trouble to defend may be far more impressive than any demonstration of technological progress or political objective. They are a priceless part of our heritage, a fundamental base for our liberty—and a part of our daily living which should not be ignored as we attempt to tell Russia's people of the values we cherish.

[From the Bridgeport Post, April 20, 1959]

AN IDEA, SHARP AND TIMELY

The State Department has received a suggestion from Senator THOMAS J. DODD which should obtain warm and immediate approval. When we take part in the big Moscow fair this summer, in an effort to show Soviet citizens how Americans really live, the Senator says we should include a religious exhibit, to indicate religion's fundamental place in U.S. society.

A picture of an American community would hardly be complete without showing its schools and its churches. Senator DODD in a letter to George V. Allen, U.S. Information Agency Director, recalled that there was not a single display of a religious nature in the U.S. exhibit at Brussels. Our mistakes there, he advised, should not be repeated.

Millions from all over the world went through the U.S. exhibit. Mr. DODD holds that "we missed a wonderful opportunity to demonstrate to these people the importance of religion in the development of our history, and its great influence on contemporary American affairs."

Many of the colonists of our continent came here to seek religious freedom and many of the early settlements were essentially religious. Throughout our history our great State documents have been expressions of basic moral principles.

How better to impress the Soviet citizens with the story of life as it really is in this country? Let us show them that among our freedoms, which they are denied, is the freedom of conscience, of the right to worship God as one pleases or believes is right.

An excellent suggestion and one that will give the Red propagandists something else to attack. And the Soviet people, knowing well that the Kremlin line is phony, will see and believe, and be encouraged.

Tullidge Clinic Dedication

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. A. WILLIS ROBERTSON
OF VIRGINIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, April 24, 1959

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an address to be delivered by me at the Tullidge Clinic Dedication, at Ararat, Va., on April 25, 1959.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TULLIDGE CLINIC DEDICATION

(Address by Senator A. WILLIS ROBERTSON at Tullidge Clinic dedication at Ararat, Patrick County, Va., Apr. 25, 1959)

The happy privilege of joining with Patrick County friends in the dedication of a new clinic reminds me of the fact that my first visit to Patrick was with a young doctor from Franklin County who later located at Stuart for the practice of his profession—Dr. George T. Divers. The time was June 1912; the occasion was the marriage of Dr. Divers to Miss Evelyn Martin, the charming and talented daughter of Dr. R. S. Martin, one of the most beloved men who ever lived in this county.

The remarkable development during the intervening years of Franklin County, where I lived as a boy, and the adjoining mountain counties of Henry and Patrick, has been a source of pride and great satisfaction to me. As a State senator I was fully aware of how our mountain counties were handicapped by the lack of good roads and hence, in the State senate the establishment of a State highway system was my major goal. Four of those who served on the commission to lay out a highway system and who sponsored the legislation to adopt it, are still living—Col. Sinclair Brown, of Salem, Hon. C. O'Conor Goolrick, of Fredericksburg, the senior United States Senator from Virginia, Mr. BYRD, and myself.

During my service in the Congress I have supported the programs to bring electricity and telephones to our farmers, the promotion of scientific farming through Federal and State research and the preservation of fertile topsoil through modern conservation practices. The end result has been to greatly increase the production of the average farmer in Patrick, as well as elsewhere in the State, while good roads have not only facilitated the marketing of farm crops but also have contributed to the improvement of local schools and churches.

In giving credit to technological developments that have improved the economic status of the people of Patrick County let us not lose sight of the fact that today, as in the days of the birth of our Nation the most important product of any community is the quality of its men and women. It takes more than material prosperity to produce character and good citizenship, and Patrick County has met that test. I welcome this opportunity to pay tribute to the example of the ideal family physician set Virginia doctors by the late Dr. R. S. Martin of Stuart and to the political and civic leadership furnished by families like the Hookers, Georges, Joyces, Clarks, and Thompsons (to mention just a few of those I have been privileged to know) and to say nothing of the county's gift to North Carolina of the wizard of tobacco manufacturers, R. J. Reynolds, and his brother who was the grandfather of Richard S. Reynolds, who now heads the greater aluminum empire which has its headquarters in Richmond.

In both the State legislature and in the United States Congress I have appreciated and enjoyed my friendship with the fine and able men who have represented Patrick, including your present Representative in the House, the Honorable WILLIAM M. TUCK.

The high quality of citizenship which has characterized the people of Patrick is due in no small degree to the fact that many of the early settlers were Scotch-Irish who came to Virginia in search of religious and political freedom and who have handed down to succeeding generations a belief in the virtues of representative democracy and self-government so eloquently expressed by Patrick Henry.

You will, of course, recall that Patrick County was formed from a part of Henry County in 1791, only a year after the States had ratified the first 10 amendments to our Constitution which we know as the Bill of Rights.

Those amendments, which Virginia and several other States had insisted upon as a condition to their acceptance of the Federal Constitution, were designed to protect for all time such basic rights as freedom of religion, freedom of speech and freedom of the press, the 10th amendment clearly stating the theory which too many persons have ignored or forgotten today—that basic human rights can best be protected when the power of the central Government is limited.

In the Virginia convention, called to ratify the Federal Constitution, Patrick Henry was a leader of the faction which demanded assurance of protection from the possibility of despotic power. He said that Congress, having the power of taxation and the authority to raise an army and a navy, would have "the sword in one hand, and the purse in the other," and he asked: "Shall we be safe without either? * * * Where and when did freedom exist, when the sword and purse were given up from the people? Unless a miracle in human affairs shall interpose, no Nation ever did or ever can retain its liberty after the loss of the sword and the purse."

In the same convention Patrick Henry spoke with prophetic vision when he pointed out that Congress would have the power of involving the Southern States in all the horrors which would result from a total emancipation of their slaves, and predicted that the Northern States, uninterested in the consequences of such an act, and with a controlling majority of votes, probably would be inclined to do this.

Our fathers knew those horrors in the War of 1861–65 and the bitter reconstruction period which followed.

In the Virginia convention George Mason, the author of the Bill of Rights, also pointed out that the power to levy direct taxes given to the central Government was calculated to annihilate totally the State governments.

That has not yet happened but the administration of State governments has been made increasingly difficult by financial pressures resulting from an ever-increasing Federal tax burden required to service a mounting national debt and to carry on programs undertaken by the Federal Government in areas never dreamed of by the Founding Fathers. New spending schemes are introduced with a pious reference to promoting the general welfare but nothing would better promote the general welfare than an economy program, accompanied by a reduction of Federal taxes.

Destruction of State governments may indeed be threatened in the future if the Congress continues to approve legislation authorizing Federal activities which displace those traditionally carried on by the States and localities and if the courts continue to assert, in effect, that there is no practical limit to the bounds of Federal authority.

Believing that the political wisdom of the Founding Fathers has never since been equaled I have been proud, throughout my political life, to call myself a Jeffersonian Democrat, interpreting as best I could, in terms of 20th century conditions, the political philosophy of men like Patrick Henry, James Madison and Thomas Jefferson.

The splendid and much appreciated support I have always received in Patrick indicates your approval of the firm stand I always have taken in behalf of States rights and efficiency and economy in Government. It should be needless, therefore, for me to assure you that as long as I have the privilege and honor of representing you in the U.S. Senate I shall stoutly resist the current trend to override the rights of the sovereign States and to engage in national projects of a socialistic character.

I am happy to say that the construction of a clinic with private funds at a time when many are advocating socialized medicine is in full keeping with Jeffersonian Democracy. I warmly commend the fine spirit of unselfish cooperation of the people of this community whose personal contributions have enabled Dr. Archer Tullidge to make a success of this undertaking.

The decision of Dr. Tullidge to dedicate this clinic to the memory of his deceased brother, George, is in keeping with his own decision to locate in a rural area where there was need for the services of a family physician rather than in a city where the financial rewards for his fine medical training would have been greater.

It has been my privilege to know the family of Dr. Tullidge for many years. It is a fine Christian family, of Scotch-Irish origin, long prominent in the church, civic, and business affairs of Staunton and Augusta County. Mr. and Mrs. George Tullidge, Jr., raised three fine sons, the oldest of whom was George Bowler Tullidge III. He was a sergeant of the 507th Parachute Infantry, 82d Airborne Division, who at the age of 20 years gave his life in the invasion of France, June 8, 1944. Scarcely more than a month before his death Sgt. George Tullidge wrote Tommy, the brother next in age to him, a letter from which I quote the following:

"Mother writes and tells me how big a boy you are getting to be. It seems like a mighty long time since I have seen you boys, and I guess it will be a while longer; probably I will have a hard time even recognizing you. I just know and pray that you will turn out to be the kind of boys that Mother and Dad are teaching you to be. Just take a word of advice from somebody who has had a small look around anyway. Maybe I am not so old, but these 2 years in the Army have shown and taught me lots of things about life that I never dreamed of before. I won't go into a long discussion but just remember when you are out with boys and girls what is wrong and what is right. Please don't let them get you and Arch off on the wrong foot because they will if you are not careful. There are lots of things in life bigger and finer than some immediate pleasures; and some few seeming small things at present can break up the finer ones for you later. * * *

"Another thing that has helped me a lot is my firm belief in the Lord. Oftentimes when I feel depressed and blue it does me an awful lot of good to read my Bible and a little book that Mother sent me. A good belief in Christianity (very broad term) gives a fellow something to grasp when the going gets tough, and it does at times. * * * Best wishes and may God bless you always. Your best pal, George."

It should be a source of inspiration to the people of this community to have a local health center dedicated to the memory of a patriotic boy who gave his life for the perpetuity of our freedom and democratic institutions and to know that the new clinic will be operated by a physician who shares the faith of an older brother who, because of his implicit faith in God and the justness of his cause, could smile when he heard the rustle of angels' wings and say to the Grim Reaper, "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?"

In the eighth chapter of Genesis it is recorded that after being tossed 40 days and 40 nights by the great flood, the ark of Noah came to rest upon the mountains of Ararat. By the same token may those buffeted by illness and disease find this a new Ararat of rest and solace; a tangible evidence of the fact that God still rules the world in a spirit of love.

Speech of Hon. A. Willis Robertson at Meeting of Tidewater Group of Building, Savings, and Loan Associations, Norfolk, Va.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY FLOOD BYRD

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, April 24, 1959

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a very able speech made by my distinguished colleague, Senator A. WILLIS ROBERTSON, chairman of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee, at the annual meeting of the Tidewater Group of Building, Savings, and Loan Associations at Norfolk, Va., on April 22, 1959.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMARKS OF SENATOR A. WILLIS ROBERTSON AT THE ANNUAL MEETING OF THE TIDEWATER GROUP OF BUILDING, SAVINGS, AND LOAN ASSOCIATIONS, NORFOLK, VA., APRIL 22, 1959

Former President Herbert Hoover, telling in his memoirs of the reasons for the establishment in 1932 of the Home Loan Bank System, said: "The poignant American drama revolving around the loss of the old homestead had a million repetitions straight from life, not because of the designing villain but because of a fault in our financial system."

A happy ending to that old melodrama has been written in the history of the savings and loan industry which was founded for the dual purpose of promoting home ownership and encouraging individual thrift.

Some of us can recall the time when the average first mortgage on a home ran for a period of 5 years or less with no assurance of renewal and when it had to be supplemented by second mortgages at exorbitant interest rates. This meant that too often the borrower, who was prepared to pay carrying charges, could not meet an unexpected demand for principal payments and his home ownership was forfeited. And these individual tragedies became national calamities in times of financial stress when foreclosures pyramided until demand was generated for Federal controls that threatened to wipe out our private enterprise system.

The early savings and loan associations attempted to deal with the problem by larger first mortgages, running for longer periods, which were self-amortizing. But the associations themselves were subject to failure in a period of recession. It was to meet this need that there was created the Federal Home Loan Bank System, to give the savings and loan associations the kind of backing which the Federal Reserve System had given to commercial banks.

The success of the home loan system is indicated by the fact that the 11 banks, now owned completely by members with the original Government investment retired, had in 1958 a capital of more than $800 million and assets well over $2 billion.

Public acceptance of this method of saving and financing home building is indicated also by the steady growth of the member associations. In 1951, when I had the pleasure of addressing the annual convention of the U.S. Savings and Loan League, meeting at Miami Beach, I referred to savings and loan association assets of $17 billion, but the 1958 total for those assets was close to $54 billion and represented a gain of almost $7 billion from 1957 to 1958. In 1951 I spoke also of an annual total loan rate of around $5 billion, but the 1958 rate was just under $12 billion. Meanwhile, savings accounts in these associations had grown by 1958 to a total of nearly $48 billion and exceeded by a small amount the total holdings of individuals in Government savings bonds.

Because I believe in thrift and because I believe that one of the bulwarks of our democracy is individual home ownership, I would have been happy to come here on this occasion just to commend the members of this group on their past success and to wish them well for the future.

It is a double pleasure, however, to be privileged to congratulate a great Virginia newspaper, the Virginian-Pilot, on the public service it has performed in promoting the cause of thrift.

Everyone in this room is aware of the fact that our capitalistic society is founded on the principle of thrift. It is through savings that capital can be provided for business expansion on the basis of a stable dollar and, of course, the incentive to save would be greatly reduced if citizens did not have the privilege of accumulating assets which they can pass on to their heirs.

Largely because the right is guaranteed under our Constitution to acquire, use and to dispose of property we have become the richest and most powerful nation in the world. Some lose sight of the fact that property rights and human rights are root and branch of the same personal freedom tree.

Another factor in the success of our private enterprise system is the privilege of freely communicating ideas through the press and the newer media of radio and television. As Thomas Jefferson wisely said: "The liberty of speaking and writing guards our other liberties."

So I am happy to join with you in commending the Virginian-Pilot on the exercise of that right in the public interest.

While my ability to lift the veil of the future is no better than yours, I welcome this opportunity to bring to you the best information I have been able to obtain from financial agencies of the Government concerning current economic trends and to make some comment on the significance of those trends.

We are recovering from what has generally been called a recession, marked by a declining volume of business and a level of unemployment which has caused considerable alarm, but facts which I obtained from Government agencies just before coming here present a rather encouraging picture of current business recovery.

In the fourth quarter of 1958 our gross national product surpassed its prerecession level in terms of dollar volume and during the first quarter of this year it rose above the previous high in terms of adjusted value. Industrial production in February was 144 percent of the 1947–49 average and only 2 points under its 1957 high. By this measure, recovery from the recession could be considered completed.

Also, while the pace of recovery has slowed somewhat in the last few months, there are numerous signs of a strong and broadly based expansionary movement. Personal income is rising steadily, furnishing a basis for continued strength in consumer expenditures, which dropped only slightly during the recession. Automobile sales, which showed a weakness in 1958, are up this year. Housing construction, which expanded sharply throughout the last three quarters of 1958, continues at a high level. The decline in business inventories which occurred last year has been reversed and business spending for plant and equipment has again started to rise.

On the whole, recovery in output compares favorably with experience in comparable phases of the two preceding postwar recoveries. There has been some lag in recovery of employment compared with previous experiences, but unemployment in March was 800,000 less than a year earlier, with much of the remaining unemployment concentrated in large cities producing hard goods, such as Detroit, or in spots like the coalmining areas which have special industry problems.

The existence of unemployed manpower and excess plant capacity may be a cause for concern, but it also can be taken as an indication of our potential for further growth, rising prosperity, and an improved standard of living.

One of the most debated issues today is whether an adequate and sustainable rate of economic growth and price stability can be achieved simultaneously. Some argue that creeping inflation provides the environment most conducive to substainable growth, while others argue that such growth is possible only under conditions of price stability within the framework of a free market system.

I am frankly on the side of those who feel that a little inflation is a dangerous thing and that more inflation can be disastrous.

With general demand expanding, including the demand for investment, it is essential for stability that the volume of saving in the economy be sufficient to finance investment demands. If the supply of saving falls short, there will be pressure to meet these demands through expansion of bank credit, but too much expansion of bank credit would result in excessive expansion of the money supply and lead to inflation.

There has been debate in and out of Congress about controls which are used to avert this type of imbalance. The monetary authorities, by raising reserve requirements, can create a tightness in credit markets with a resultant rise in interest rates and those higher interest rates serve as a brake on credit demands and also as an added incentive to savers to increase their savings, thus helping to bring back into balance the flow of savings and the demand for funds.

Critics of the way these controls have been used complain that higher interest rates increase the cost of Government for servicing our national debt—which is true. They also say that the Government could keep interest rates down by open market purchasing of Government bonds and that this would be helpful to all borrowers, including local government units engaged in public works and businessmen planning expansion. They ignore the fact, however, that such a process of artificially supporting a low interest bond market increases bank funds which become the basis for credit expansion several times the volume of the original transaction and that this is highly inflationary.

Those who say there has been too much emphasis on tight money and rising interest rates should not ignore the fact that steps taken by monetary authorities in 1957–1958 to ease credit conditions resulted in the sharpest rise in the money supply of any of the postwar recessions. The active money supply, consisting of demand deposits and currency, increased at an annual rate of 5½ percent on a seasonably adjusted basis in the first part of 1958 and for 1958 as a whole the money supply expanded by $4.5 billion or about 3½ percent.

But, in addition to the volume of money, we have to consider the velocity of its turnover in order to see the proper relation to possible inflation. The turnover of demand deposits has been rising ever since World War II and during the first 2 months of 1959 it was estimated at the six financial centers outside of New York at a peak of 31.3 times a year while the New York City rate of turnover was 54 times a year.

Balances that people hold idle in their pockets or in banks can be increased with no immediate effect on demand and supply conditions or prices, but when people use their balances more actively, this can add to the aggregate demand without any change in the dollar volume of deposits and currency.

Illustrating the changes in use of funds, in 1955 consumers provided the main impetus to economic expansion through increased purchases of durable goods and homes by a sharp reduction of their financial savings and an increase in the volume of their debt. In 1956 and early 1957, on the other hand, increases in consumers' financial savings made an important contribution toward moderating the rate of economic expansion which was becoming inflationary. In 1958, with a slackening of general economic activity, but with little reduction in the level of personal income, consumers continued to save at a relatively high rate. The savings pattern for 1959 is not yet clear but growth in time deposits at commercial banks is down sharply from the unusually high rates of the previous 2 years. Deposits in mutual savings banks seem to be rising less rapidly than a year ago, but shares in savings and loan associations appear to be rising at close to last year's rate. Consumer decisions later this year as to what they will do with their potential savings can be an important factor in accelerating business demands or slowing down the present expansionary movement.

The problem of monetary authorities in the months ahead will be to govern the rate of monetary growth so as to avoid inadequate expansion, on the one hand, which might choke off further growth, and on the other hand to avoid excessive expansion which might lead to inflation.

But all of the wisdom of the Federal Reserve Board in regulating monetary growth through the manipulation of reserve requirements and rediscount rates and all the fine work being done by building, savings, and loan associations and our commercial banks to encourage thrift, and the investment of savings in business expansion, can be set at naught by a reckless spending program on the part of your Congress.

For instance, during the past 6 years, with personal incomes running at an alltime high, the Federal Government will have added to the national debt by the end of next June the sum of $16 billion. The $8 billion required to service that debt is twice the total expenditures of the Government when I was first elected to the House of Representatives in 1932. The proportion of deficit financing which has been handled by commercial banks has been inflationary since it created bank check money faster than the production of goods and services and lacked the saving grace of the Ricardo theory that a managed currency can be sound provided money is issued solely with relation to the money work to be done.

Marriner S. Eccles, a former Chairman of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, recently said in Washington that our present economic situation was characterized by "a dangerous inflation psychology." This, he said, was reflected in the strength of real estate prices, the soaring prices of stocks, and the skidding market for bonds and mortgages, particularly securities of the Federal Government. Undoubtedly, the Government spending to which I referred has contributed to this psychology of inflation and the big quection mark of the financial future revolves around the question: When will we have a balanced budget again?

The greatest contribution which the Federal Government could make toward a climate where thrift and savings could flourish is to restrain the urge to spend and to balance the budget.

I am chairman of a Senate committee that has authority to report spending bills, including what is known as the "backdoor approach to Treasury funds." I serve on five subcommittees of the Senate Appropriations Committee that handles 96 percent of the budget. I am confident that my efforts in behalf of economy, a sound fiscal policy and a stable dollar in both the Banking and Currency and Appropriations Committees of the Senate will have the active support not only of this savings and loan group, but also of the bankers I am pleased to see in attendance. While savings and loan associations are more interested in the current home building program than are commercial banks, both organizations have a common goal of preventing inflation, of preserving the stability of the dollar, and of encouraging the American people to save and to put those savings to productive use.

During the last Congress I had the pleasure of working with an advisory committee appointed to assist the Senate Banking and Currency Committee in the study of Federal laws governing our financial institutions.

This advisory committee was composed of representatives of every segment of the financial life of our country and it offered a fine example of harmony and cooperation for the national welfare.

Each member of this group took a broad view of the problem of reviewing all the Federal financial statutes and recommending amendments to bring them up to date. They decided issues on the basis of what was the best way for these institutions to serve the public and compromised their differences in an equitable manner.

A majority of the committee's proposals were incorporated in my bill known as the Financial Institutions Act and, as you know, that bill was passed by the Senate but was killed in the House by the delaying maneuvers of one or two Members. There is no doubt that if the bill had been permitted to come up for a vote in the House it would have passed overwhelmingly.

This, of course, is history now, but I remind you of it to point up one of the most important issues facing the financial world today—that is, you must stick together, because if you don't the political power of those who oppose you will destroy you.

As chairman of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee, I am subject to constant pressures from groups that demand more Government grants and loans for housing, depressed areas, community facilities, small business, and many other areas of direct concern to you. These groups wield a tremendous amount of power, both economic and political, and if they have their way we shall have more and more financial business handled by the Federal Government and less and less under the private enterprise system to which both banks and savings and loan associations belong.

If you do not want the Government to usurp your functions through grants and lending programs; if you do not want the dollar inflated by spendthrift programs to the point where we can have only printing press money, you must use all of your influence, in a united way, on behalf of a sound and independent economy.

You know where I stand in this fight and so long as you keep me in Washington as your representative, I shall continue to battle for economy in government, a reduction in the heavy burden of taxation, and the preservation of our system of free, competitive enterprise.

SENATE

SATURDAY, APRIL 25, 1959

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a.m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father God, once more a new day opulent with the golden gift of spring lies before us.

In the midst of crushing cares, relentless demands and haunting fears which the Nation's problems bring, may the quieting peace of Thy presence restore our jaded souls. May the Mighty One whose boundless love is in the darkness and behind the darkness, be to us as a covert from the wind, a shelter from the storm, and as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land. Harken to the prayers of our hearts as in our highest moments we forget ourselves and think of Thee.

In the Redeemer's name. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Friday, April 24, 1959, was dispensed with.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States submitting a nomination was communicated to the Senate by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session,

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States submitting the nomination of Lt. Gen. Clovis Ethelbert Byers, Army of the United States (major general, U.S. Army), to be placed on the retired list in the grade of lieutenant general, which was referred to the Committee on Armed Services.

LIMITATION OF DEBATE DURING MORNING HOUR

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, under the rule, there will be the usual morning hour for the transaction of routine business; and I ask unanimous consent that statements in connection therewith be limited to 3 minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas will state it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. When the morning hour is concluded and when the pending business, S. 1555, is laid before the Senate, what will be the pending question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question then will be on the appeal of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] from the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Have the proponents of the appeal utilized all time available to them?

The VICE PRESIDENT. They have.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Have those on the other side utilized all the time available to them?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Those in opposition have 30 minutes remaining.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Could time on the bill be allocated or used on the appeal?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; if yielded by the two leaders.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Would it be necessary for the leadership to have an agreement to do so; or could the leaders allot such time under the existing agreement?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the existing unanimous-consent agreement, the leaders could allocate time on the bill to Senators who wished to speak on the appeal.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. No additional agreement would be required in order to do so?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is correct.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. In other words, either the minority leader or the majority leader could allot such time?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; at his own discretion.

PERSONAL STATEMENT

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, at the close of business last evening, when the point of order which had been raised by the distinguished senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] was being discussed, I made what I consider to have been some intemperate remarks.

I did not then, and do not now, question the right of the senior Senator from New Hampshire to raise the point of order he did in regard to the amendment submitted by the Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL], on behalf of himself and certain other Senators on both sides of the aisle. In view of the fact that the McClellan amendment, which the Kuchel amendment sought to supersede, had previously been adopted by a one-vote margin, and thereafter, the motion to reconsider had been laid on the table by a one-vote margin, I believe that the point of order raised by the senior Senator from New Hampshire is, on that basis, valid. Therefore, it was then, and is now, my belief that because of the parliamentary situation, it was not necessary for the Senate to compare the provisions of the amendment submitted by the Senator from California, on behalf of himself and other Senators, with the provisions of the McClellan amendment, which had been voted on, adopted, and as to which the motion for reconsideration of the vote had been laid on the table.

My point is that a ruling had been made by the occupant of the Chair, the distinguished junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY], and that the ruling he made was based on the advice given him by our very able Parliamentarian, Mr. Charles L. Watkins. It was in that context that I stated last evening, that "what we are testing is the honesty and character of the occupant of the Chair, no matter who he may be."

In order to set the record straight, I have made this statement this morning; and because of the possible misunderstanding of my language, I am stating my point of view in some detail. Because of the implication I may have conveyed, I wish to take this means to put the record straight, and to express to the Senate my regrets for not thinking through in more detail the thoughts I had intended to convey.

Let me say again, Mr. President, that the distinguished senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] had, on the basis of Senate rules and procedure, every right to raise the point of order he submitted; and, in view of the possible similarities between the McClellan amendment, previously adopted, and the Kuchel amendment, now before us, it was logical and valid to raise the point of order.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana yield to me?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. I wish to raise my voice in high commendation of the statement the Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD] has just made and of the course of action he has just taken.

I think he knows that all of us understand that in the heat of debate and in the particular type of situation which unfortunately developed last evening in the Senate, it is easy for any one of us at times to make statements which later we wish we had not made. Certainly the test of the bigness of a man is whether he is willing to admit that he may have made a mistake.

The Senator from Montana has shown his bigness in this regard; and I am particularly happy that he made the statement he did on the merits of this matter, because if his statement of last evening had remained in the RECORD without this explanation by him this morning, when some of us came to vote on the question of whether the ruling of the Chair should be sustained, we would seemingly have been put in the position of voting against the character or the integrity of the Presiding Officer.

I knew the Senator from Montana simply could not have meant to use in their literal meaning the words he did employ last evening, because when we come to vote on the appeal from a decision of the Chair, so far as I am concerned any Senator could have been in the Chair, and we shall vote on the basis of our view as to the correct interpretation of the rules of the Senate—a matter which has nothing to do with the Senator who made the ruling.

I wish to state that I am very proud of the majority whip for the statement he has made this morning.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I thank the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana yield to me?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I am delighted to yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The statements made last evening by the Senator from Montana came immediately following a statement I made, namely, that I thought I should be allowed sufficient time to study the rule and the contents of the pending amendment. In making that declaration, and probably in implying that I might disagree with the ruling of the Chair, I did not contemplate casting any reflection upon the integrity of the Chair.

It is not my understanding that when a Senator takes an appeal to the Senate from a ruling of the Chair, such Senator, by the appeal, implies a lack of integrity or honesty on the part of the Chair. No occupant of the Chair should be subjected to even the implication that he had not acted with integrity.

I take it that what the Senator from Montana has said about the Senator from New Hampshire has equal application to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Yes, indeed; and I am delighted that the Senator from Ohio has brought up the question, because, as he indicated, it was after he had made a statement that I made my statement.

My purpose this morning is to make the record clear and certainly to indicate that, so far as I was concerned, I may have used intemperate language; and I wish to use this means as a form of apology to both the Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, I should like to express gratitude for the soothing and comforting words which were contained in the invocation given this morning by Chaplain Harris. Last night nerves were frayed. Emotions were dominating judgment. Things happened on the Senate floor which do not happen when we are thinking with moderation. Today a new hour has arrived—a new concept. Frayed nerves have been restored.

I knew last night that the Senator from Montana did not mean what he said, and I desire to say to him that I have the deepest confidence in him. No one has been more temperate and reasonable than he has been on the Senate floor during my 2 years and 4 months of service in the Senate.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I thank the Senator from Ohio.

MORNING BUSINESS

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is now in order.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. RUSSELL (for himself and Mr. SALTONSTALL) (by request):

S. 1795. A bill to amend title 10, United States Code, to revise certain provisions relating to the promotion and involuntary retirement of officers of the regular components of the Armed Forces; to the Committee on Armed Services.

(See the remarks of Mr. RUSSELL when he introduced the above bill, which appear under a separate heading.)

By Mr. KEFAUVER:

S. 1796. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 so as to provide accounting procedures whereby dealers in personal property may exclude from gross income amounts withheld by banks and finance companies on notes purchased from such dealers employing the accrual method of accounting; to the Committee on Finance.

(See the remarks of Mr. KEFAUVER when he introduced the above bill, which appear under a separate heading.)

HENRY B. LANDERS—REFERENCE OF BILL TO COURT OF CLAIMS

Mr. CARROLL submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 108); which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Resolved, That the bill (S. 1608) entitled "A bill for the relief of Henry B. Landers," now pending in the Senate, together with all accompanying papers, is hereby referred to the Court of Claims; and the Court shall proceed with the same in accordance with the provisions of sections 1492 and 2509 of title 28 of the United States Code and report to the Senate, at the earliest practicable date, giving such findings of fact and conclusions thereon as shall be sufficient to inform the Congress of the nature and character of demand as a claim, legal or equitable, against the United States and the amount, if any, legally or equitably due from the United States to the claimant.

AMENDMENT OF TITLE 10, UNITED STATES CODE, RELATING TO PROMOTION AND INVOLUNTARY RETIREMENT OF CERTAIN OFFICERS

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, and the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL], I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill requested by the Department of Defense which would amend title 10, United States Code, to revise certain provisions relating to the promotion and involuntary retirement of officers of the regular components of the Armed Forces.

I ask unanimous consent that the letter of transmittal explaining the purpose of the bill, written by the Deputy Secretary of Defense, be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 1795) to amend title 10, United States Code, to revise certain provisions relating to the promotion and involuntary retirement of officers of the regular components of the Armed Forces, introduced by Mr. RUSSELL (for himself and Mr. SALTONSTALL), by request, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Armed Services.

The letter presented by Mr. RUSSELL is as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, April 20, 1959.

Hon. RICHARD M. NIXON,
President of the Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: There is enclosed a draft of proposed legislation to amend title 10, United States Code, to revise certain provisions relating to the promotion and involuntary retirement of officers of the regular components of the Armed Forces, together with a sectional analysis thereof.

This proposal is a part of the Department of Defense legislative program for 1959 and it has been approved by the Bureau of the Budget. It is recommeded that this proposal be enacted by the Congress.

PURPOSE OF THE LEGISLATION

The purpose of the proposed legislation is to enable the Armed Forces to meet more effectively the objective of a Regular officer corps of the highest quality in all ranks by: (1) more closely relating the retention of officers after 20 years of service who are serving in the permanent grades of lieutenant colonel and colonel, commander, and captain to the requirements of the services, including the degree of contribution or productivity of the officer and the needs of the service rather than solely to a guaranteed number of years of service; (2) according increased recognition and incentive for outstanding ability and competence; (3) extending the application of the foregoing provisions to women officers on an equitable basis; and (4) expediting the separation from the service of officers who have been twice deferred from permanent promotion.

The proposed legislation is an important part of an integrated program of the Department of Defense to achieve and maintain a Regular officer force of the highest quality. As a part of this program, the Congress, on May 20, 1958, enacted Public Law 85-422, which modernized and improved the system of compensation for the uniformed services. The Department of Defense recognizes, however, that neither increase of pay alone nor a change in the pay system can accomplish the above-mentioned objective unless our officer personnel laws and regulations are equally responsive to the changing needs of the military services.

It is emphasized that the proposed legislation is not intended to cause, and will not be used for, the involuntary removal of Regular officers from the active list solely because of a reduction in the actual or authorized personnel strength of the service concerned. Rather it is intended that the removal of Regular officers from the active list will continue to be authorized only for the reasons and under the procedures and limitations now provided by law for such removal and as further provided by the proposed legislation.

Within the framework of existing law, the military services have been and are now vigorously carrying out sound, progressive, personnel programs and administrative measures designed to make career service more attractive and to improve further the quality of the career officer structure. Measurable progress has resulted from these programs and every effort will be continued to consolidate and improve the gains already made.

There remains, however, a need for added flexibility in some of the statutory provisions presently controlling the promotion, retention, and involuntary retirement of Regular officers.

Accordingly, the proposed legislation would amend title 10, United States Code, and would, in general, effect the following major changes in existing law:

ALL SERVICES

A. Majors, lieutenant colonels, and colonels: lieutenant commanders, commanders, and captains; discretionary retirement after being twice considered but not recommended for promotion to next higher grade: This bill provides that the Secretary of the department concerned may convene a board of at least five general or flag officers to consider and recommend for continuation on the active list, all Regular officers serving in the permanent grade of lieutenant colonel or colonel, commander or captain, as the case may be, and major, in the case of officers of the Army Nurse Corps, Army Medical Specialist Corps, or Women's Army Corps, or female officers of the Air Force, or lieutenant commander, in case of officers of the Navy Nurse Corps, who (a) have completed more than 20 years' total commissioned service; and (b) have been considered two or more times, but not selected, for promotion to the next higher permanent grade.

The Secretary of the department concerned will determine the number of officers serving in the particular grade under review that the board may recommend for continuation. The board will recommend majors, lieutenant colonels, and colonels, and lieutenant commanders, commanders, and captains, for continuation in the number specified by the Secretary; however, with respect to officers in the grade of colonel or captain (USN), the number specified by the Secretary may not be less than 80 percent of the number of colonels and captains to be considered for continuation on active duty by such board.

Each officer recommended for noncontinuation will, if the recommendation is approved by the Secretary, be retired on the first day of any month set by the Secretary, but not later than the first day of the seventh month after the date of the approval by the Secretary concerned.

The above provisions as to special boards for continuance or retirement will be permissive and in the discretion of the Service concerned. Should the Secretary concerned desire to continue all such officers on the active list to meet the needs of the Service, no board need be convened. In that case, such officers would be retained until they have reached the periods of service otherwise specified in law for their retirement.

B. Criteria for selection for promotion in all ranks: This bill provides with respect to permanent and temporary promotions in all Services that the primary criteria for selection for promotion shall be ability and efficiency.

C. Amendment relating to separation of certain twice deferred officers: This bill provides for the separation from the service of twice deferred officers at: (1) in the case of officers of the Army or Air Force, any mutually agreeable time after the Secretary approves the board report which places the officers concerned in a twice-deferred status, but not later than the first day of the seventh month after they are so identified; or (2) in the case of officers of the Navy or Marine Corps, at any time during the fiscal year in which that board report is made. No change is made in the case of twice-deferred officers who are within 2 years of qualifying for retirement.

ARMY AND AIR FORCE

A. Permanent promotion through the grade of lieutenant colonel—permissive selection of 5 percent below primary promotion zone: This bill provides authority to select for promotion through the permanent grade of lieutenant colonel "best qualified" officers from below a primary promotion zone; such selection to operate as a passover only for those officers who are in the primary promotion zone and who are not selected for promotion. The proposed legislation also provides that the number of officers so selected from below the primary promotion zone may not exceed 5 percent of the total number the regular selection boards are authorized to recommend for promotion to the grade concerned.

Navy and Marine Corps are not affected by this provision, since such authority to promote from below the primary zone already exists by law for those services.

B. Best qualified system for promotion to grades above captain, Army and Air Force: This bill provides that promotions of male officers to permanent grades above captain, Army and Air Force, would be made only on a best qualified basis; and that the number prescribed by the Secretary for recommendation for promotion must be at least 80 percent of those listed for consideration for the first time.

Navy and Marine Corps are not affected by this provision, since existing law already requires use of the best fitted system by the Navy and Marine Corps.

COST AND BUDGET DATA

No cost estimates are submitted as the costs of this proposal are dependent upon future determinations by the Secretaries of the military departments regarding the extent to which the discretionary authority contained in this proposal should be exercised.

Sincerely yours,

DONALD A. QUARLES,
Deputy.

SECTIONAL ANALYSIS OF A BILL TO AMEND TITLE 10, UNITED STATES CODE, TO REVISE CERTAIN PROVISIONS RELATING TO THE PROMOTION AND INVOLUNTARY RETIREMENT OF OFFICERS OF THE REGULAR COMPONENTS OF THE ARMED FORCES

Section 1 adds section 1294 to title 10. Section 1294 provides that the Secretary of a military department may convene one or more boards, each consisting of at least five officers in grades above colonel or captain, as the case may be, to review the records of, and recommend for continuation on the active list, those officers on active duty serving in the permanent regular grade of colonel or captain, lieutenant colonel or commander, or, in the case of certain female officers, major or lieutenant commander, as the case may be, who have completed at least 20 years' total commissioned service and who are considered as having failed of selection at least twice for promotion to the next higher grade. The board shall recommend officers for continuation in the number specified by the Secretary. The number specified by the Secretary for colonels or captains who have twice failed of selection for promotion may not be less than 80 percent of those officers. If the Secretary approves the report of a board, he shall retire each officer not recommended for continuation. Such retirement shall be not later than the first day of the seventh month after the date of the approval by the Secretary. The section will also provide that boards may be convened not more often than once each fiscal year.

Sections 2 and 3 amend sections 1401 and 1405 of title 10, to provide a retired pay formula for officers retired under section 1294.

Section 4(1) amends section 3297 of title 10 to provide that recommendations for promotion in the Regular Army shall be based upon ability and efficiency and that selection boards to recommend officers for promotion whom it considers to be the best qualified may recommend only those officers whom it also considers to be fully qualified.

Section 4(2)(-6) amends section 3300 of title 10 to limit the application of that section to Regular Army first lieutenants and Regular Army captains in the Army Nurse Corps, Army Medical Specialist Corps, and Women's Army Corps. Section 3300 is also amended to provide that when, in the case of those Regular Army captains, the Secretary of the Army directs a selection board to recommend officers for promotion whom it considers to be best qualified, the board may recommend not more than 5 percent of that number from captains, whom it considers best qualified, not in the promotion zone furnished by the Secretary to the board. However, captains not in the promotion zone who are on a promotion list above an officer so recommended may not be considered as having failed of selection for promotion.

Section 4(7) adds new section 3300a to title 10 to provide that (1) when Regular Army captains or majors are considered by a selection board for promotion, the board shall recommend officers, whom it considers best qualified, in the number specified by the Secretary of the Army for promotion; (2) the board may recommend not more than 5 percent of that number from captains or majors, whom it considers best qualified, not in the promotion zone furnished by the Secretary to the board; and (3) captains or majors not in the promotion zone who are on a promotion list above an officer recommended for promotion may not be considered as having failed of selection for promotion.

Sections 4(8), 6, 9, 10(9), and 12 amend sections 3303, 3913, 6382, 6383, 6384, 6401, 6402, 8303, and 8913 of title 10, relating to separation of "deferred" officers, to provide for their separation at (1) in the case of officers of the Army or the Air Force, any mutually agreeable time after the Secretary concerned approves the board report that places them in a "deferred" status, but not later than the first day of the seventh month after such approval; or (2) in the case of officers of the Navy or the Marine Corps, any time during the fiscal year in which the board report is made.

Section 4(9) adds new subsections (b) and (c) to section 3304 of title 10 to provide that a selection board may recommend for promotion to lieutenant colonel, from Regular Army majors in the Army Nurse Corps or the Army Medical Specialist Corps whom it considers best qualified who are not in the promotion zone furnished by the Secretary of the Army to the board, not more than 5 percent of the number specified by the Secretary under section 3304(a) for promotion from officers in the zone.

Section 4(10) adds new subsections (b) and (c) to section 3305 of title 10 to provide that a selection board may recommend for promotion to colonel, from Regular Army lieutenant colonels whom it considers best qualified who are not in the promotion zone furnished by the Secretary of the Army to the board, not more than 5 percent of the number specified by the Secretary under section 3305(a) for promotion from officers in the zone.

Section 5 amends section 3442(c) of title 10 to provide that selections for temporary promotions to commissioned officer grades in the Army shall be based upon ability and efficiency.

Section 6 (see explanation under section 4(8), above).

Section 7 amends section 5707(i) of title 10 to provide that recommendations for promotion or continuation on the active list of the Navy shall be based upon ability and efficiency.

Section 8 (see explanation under section 4(8), above).

Section 9(1) amends section 8297 of title 10 to provide that recommendations for promotion in the Regular Air Force shall be based upon ability and efficiency and that selection boards to recommend officers for promotion whom it considers to be the best qualified may recommend only those officers whom it also considers to be fully qualified.

Section 9(2) amends section 8299 of title 10 to provide that a selection board may recommend for promotion to lieutenant colonel, from Regular Air Force nurses or medical specialists whom it considers best qualified who are not in the promotion zone furnished by the Secretary of the Air Force to the board, not more than 5 percent of the number specified by the Secretary under section 8299(g) for promotion from officers in the zone.

Section 9(3)-(6) amends section 8300 of title 10 to limit the application of that section to Regular Air Force first lieutenants and Regular Air Force female captains (other than those designated under section 8067(a)-(d) or (g)-(i) of title 10). Section 8300 is also amended to provide that when, in the case of those Regular Air Force female captains, the Secretary of the Air Force directs a selection board to recommend officers for promotion whom it considers to be best qualified, the board may recommend not more than 5 percent of that number from captains, whom it considers best qualified, not in the promotion zone furnished by the Secretary to the board. However, captains not in the promotion zone who are on a promotion list above an officer so recommended may not be considered as having failed of selection for promotion.

Section 9(7) adds new section 8300a to title 10 to provide that (1) when Regular Air Force captains or majors are considered by a selection board for promotion, the board shall recommend officers, whom it considers best qualified, in the number specified by the Secretary of the Air Force for promotion; (2) the board may recommend not more than 5 percent of that number from captains or majors, whom it considers best qualified, not in the promotion zone furnished by the Secretary to the board; and (3) captains or majors not in the promotion zone who are on a promotion list above an officer recommended for promotion may not be considered as having failed of selection for promotion.

Section 9(8) (see explanation under section 4(8), above).

Section 9(9) adds new subsections (b) and (c) to section 8305 of title 10 to provide that a selection board may recommend for promotion to colonel, from Regular Air Force lieutenant colonels whom it considers best qualified who are not in the promotion zone furnished by the Secretary of the Air Force to the board, not more than 5 percent of the number specified by the Secretary under section 8305(a) for promotion from officers in the zone.

Section 10 amends section 8442(c) of title 10 to provide that selections for temporary promotions to commissioned officer grades in the Air Force shall be based upon ability and efficiency.

Section 11 (see explanation under section 4(8), above).

Section 12 is a savings provision to provide that a change or revocation of an election of an annuity under section 1431(b) of title 10, made within 5 years of retirement under section 1294 of that title, is effective notwithstanding section 1431(c) of that title, if it is made within 5 years before the officer would normally have been retired.

AMENDMENT OF INTERNAL REVENUE CODE OF 1954, RELATING TO CERTAIN ACCOUNTING PROCEDURES

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 so as to provide accounting procedures whereby dealers in personal property may exclude from gross income amounts withheld by banks and finance companies on notes purchased from such dealers employing the accrual method of accounting. It is my purpose to offer this bill as an amendment to tax bill when one comes to the Senate from the House of Representatives.

Mr. President, the bill provides that where a dealer in personal property employing the accrual method of accounting sells an article and receives a note for the unpaid purchase price, including a finance charge, and then sells the note to a bank or finance company which pays the dealer for the note less any part of the finance charge, the dealer may exclude from his gross income for that taxable year such part of the finance charge as is not paid or made immediately available to him by the bank or finance company.

However, such a dealer must include in his gross income all amounts of such withheld finance charge paid to him or made withdrawable by him in the taxable year in which such payment or withdrawable credit is made.

I understand that presently the Internal Revenue Service considers such finance charge reserves held by the bank or finance company as current income of the dealer and taxable in the tax year in which the note is sold by the dealer.

For example, banks and finance companies buying automobile finance paper frequently withhold a part of the finance charge as a reserve against losses such as in repossessing cars. These funds are eventually returned to the dealer. It seems inequitable to me to require the dealer to pay taxes upon such funds as current income to the dealer. It is a great burden on a dealer to be required to pay income taxes on funds which he has not received during the taxable year and which he may not receive for several years and may never receive a part of the funds due to losses.

I am advised by one of my constituents that he is now being called on to pay approximately $30,000 for 1 year due to the addition of approximately $61,000 of taxable income to his gross income which are funds held in reserve by three finance companies and which are not available to him. He must borrow from the bank $30,000 for taxes on funds which he did not receive in that taxable year and are still unavailable to him.

Mr. President, I am speaking about small business since most retailers are small businesses. Many automobile dealers have been unable to survive in the past few years. Such businesses cannot afford to borrow money for taxes on funds which they will not receive for some time after the taxes are paid.

I believe my bill will do equity to dealers selling to consumers on credit financed through the banks and finance companies. At the same time it does not deny to the Government the taxes to which it is entitled under the present law. The taxes are paid in the taxable year in which the funds are received instead of the year in which the finance paper is sold, if the finance reserve is withheld until a subsequent year. On the average, it would appear to me that the income tax received by the Government should not be materially affected, if at all.

Mr. President, I hope this bill can receive early consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 1796) to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 so as to provide accounting procedures whereby dealers in personal property may exclude from gross income amounts withheld by banks and finance companies on notes purchased from such dealers employing the accrual method of accounting, introduced by Mr. KEFAUVER, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

ADDRESSES, EDITORIALS, ARTICLES, ETC., PRINTED IN THE RECORD

On request, and by unanimous consent, addresses, editorials, articles, etc., were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. CARROLL:

Statement by him relating to Senate Concurrent Resolution 24, providing for an expanded program of education on an international level.

By Mr. JAVITS:

TRIBUTE TO OLDER MEMBERS OF THE U.S. SENATE

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, once again, on the night of April 24, we heard the plea that the Senate should not sit in a prolonged night session out of deference to its older Members.

I am not an authority on the chronology of Senate sessions, and do not pose as one. However, I want the RECORD to show that, in the 4¼ years I have been a Member of the Senate, I have never heard one elderly Senator voice a plea that the Senate adjourn. Such pleas are always made by others. It reminds me, Mr. President, of the famous E. B. White couplet about the society pages:

Why is it I always see the lady herself, in deadly clarity,
And never, never, never the object of her charity?

Mr. President, I never have heard Theodore Francis Green, Carl Hayden, Walter F. George, Jim Murray, Bill Langer, Harry F. Byrd, Dennis Chavez, Herbert H. Lehman, Ed Martin, Alex Wiley, or Joe O'Mahoney cry out that the Senate should quit and go home, only those who presume to speak for them.

My hand goes up in salute to our older Members. They can take it, and they have my unstinted respect and admiration—no matter on which side of the aisle they may sit.

ARBOR DAY

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, this week, in many of our States, one holiday will be observed which looks to the future rather than to the past.

April 22 is Arbor Day, traditionally an occasion on which the youth of our country participate in programs which emphasize the importance of tree planting.

The benefits of such programs are not limited to the children alone. The ideas which are instilled through the observation of Arbor Day will extend to all our endeavors. The advantages which are derived by the occasion will affect our homes, our communities, and our Nation.

By the planting of trees we prepare for the future. The trees which are planted today will provide products for the comfort, convenience, and welfare of people in generations to come. They beautify and enrichen the heritage given us.

Moreover, by the planting of trees we practice ideal programs of conservation. The forests which we now have play a significant role in the continued development of our country. Preserving these trees means more than providing a ready source of timber. It means protecting the watersheds of city reservoirs and the topsoil from erosion, to mention just two effects.

But lastly, by the planting of trees we pay honor to one man whose foresight and industry first awoke our Nation to the scope and importance of the problem. These efforts were recognized officially 87 years ago. I speak of J. Sterling Morton, of Nebraska, who was a one-time Secretary of Agriculture under President Cleveland and who waged a continuous battle to plant and preserve trees in America.

When Morton first arrived in Nebraska, that Plains State was rich in soil but, in many areas, practically treeless. Thanks to him and those who followed his lead, Nebraska now enjoys a wealth of woodlands, along with its fertile prairies.

The original Arbor Day was April 10, but in his honor the Nebraska State Legislature changed it to his birthday, April 22. The spirit of that first Arbor Day is with us now as the several States observe their conservation ceremonies.

Morton wrote to the Omaha World-Herald on the occasion of the first Arbor Day that "trees are the monuments I would have." What more enduring and satisfying memorial to him can we have than a nationwide celebration of a tree planting holiday?

Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska.

GOV. RALPH BROOKS, OF NEBRASKA

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, yesterday news arrived in Washington that Gov. Ralph Brooks, of Nebraska, who had been in the hospital for several days, had suffered a slight stroke.

Business of the Senate prevented my doing so yesterday, but at this time the senior Senator from Nebraska expresses regret at the news, and wishes to extend his earnest and sincere wishes and hopes that Governor Brooks' recovery will be speedy and complete, so that he may resume his duties and normal activities at an early date. No doubt the vigorous schedule he has been observing in connection with his leadership, with the State legislature in session, has contributed to his condition.

The senior Senator from Nebraska knows that in speaking these thoughts and hopes he expresses the sentiments of the entire delegation from the State of Nebraska both in the Senate and on the other side of the Capitol.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, within the past few days word has reached us here in Washington that Gov. Ralph G. Brooks, of Nebraska, has suffered an illness described as a slight stroke. I want Governor Brooks and all his friends, and all Nebraskans, to know that I join them in hoping for his speedy recovery.

Governor Brooks is an energetic, active individual who has been carrying a very heavy workload. It is regrettable that this illness should overtake him.

I join my senior colleague in extending to him my greetings and every wish for his recovery.

AN EFFECTIVE APPROACH TO SOLUTION OF BOXCAR SHORTAGE

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, I have joined with the able senior Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON] in sponsorship of a bill designed to help relieve the shortage of railroad boxcars by giving the Interstate Commerce Commission authority to establish charges between railroads for use of freight cars. Availability of boxcars is an important factor in the economy of my home State because of its dependence on a lumber industry with far-flung markets. The industry is rebounding from doldrums suffered a year ago when tight-money policies dried up housing construction. Revival of home building has stimulated the market for Oregon lumber products, and unemployment has declined from the critical levels of the winter of 1958. But this return to prosperity may be cut short unless an ample supply of boxcars is available during the height of the lumber shipping season in the next few months.

I wish to point out that the bill which has been introduced carries out legislative recommendations of the Interstate Commerce Commission. In February, when first prospects of a boxcar shortage began to appear, I asked the Chairman of the Commission for a report on corrective steps being taken. Chairman Kenneth H. Tuggle responded to the inquiry in some detail, and in conclusion he pointed out that the first recommendation in the Commission's annual report for 1958 was for revision of authority to fix per diem charges.

Mr. Tuggle said:

If enacted, this proposed legislation will provide an incentive for individual carriers to own and maintain a freight car fleet sufficient to protect their requirements rather than suffer the penalty of high per diem charges, during car shortages, through the use and holding of foreign cars on their line due to the inadequacy of their car ownerships.

I trust that early consideration can be given to this proposal. I recognize that some people in the railroad industry hold the view that other adjustments, rather than increased per diem charges, would lead to improvement of the boxcar situation. Perhaps hearings on the proposed legislation will provide this segment of the industry with an opportunity to explain in detail how they intend to meet the shortage. I am sure that many of my colleagues share my interest in learning of any proposals for assuring an adequate supply of freight cars to serve the Nation's entire rail transportation network.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to include with my remarks the letter which I have received from Chairman K. H. Tuggle, dated February 20, 1959. I also ask consent to include with my remarks an excellent editorial from the Medford Mail-Tribune, entitled "Coming Car Shortage," and a story by Mr. Dan Sellard, of the Eugene Register-Guard of March 15, in which he tells of the widespread concern in Oregon's lumber industry over the car shortage.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION,
Washington, D.C., February 20, 1959.

Hon. RICHARD L. NEUBERGER,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR NEUBERGER: I am in receipt of your letter of February 13, 1959, concerning fears expressed by some of your constituents with respect to an anticipated freight-car shortage and requesting advice as to current developments and steps being taken to work out a solution if such a car shortage is imminent.

Since the early part of January some slight boxcar shortages have been reported in the Northwest area. These shortages, however, have included only the so-called special types, such as insulated, damage-free cars, and wide-door 50-foot boxcars, and, with the exception of these types of cars, no serious supply problem has been encountered since late in 1957.

The increasing desirability of the above-mentioned special-type cars and the consequent heavy demand for them by shippers have brought about a car-supply problem with which the American railroads are steadily coping, and which, through new-car purchases and the rehabilitation of the existing car fleet, they hope to alleviate the shortage.

In April the Southern Pacific Co. will start taking delivery of 500 new wide-door boxcars suitable for mechanical loading of long lumber and plywood. Other carriers serving the Northwest also have a substantial number of new boxcars on order.

For some time the Commission has been greatly concerned with the deteriorating freight-car supply, and the matter has been handled by correspondence and conference with the Association of American Railroads. On September 22, 1958, Commissioner Freas, who was chairman at that time, addressed a letter to Mr. Daniel P. Loomis, president of the Association of American Railroads, calling his attention to the reduction in serviceable freight cars and to the heavy increases in bad-order equipment, and requesting that he impress upon the members of his board the gravity of the situation. A reply was received from President Loomis on October 1, 1958, stating that a copy of Chairman Freas' letter had been sent to the chief executives of all member lines, and that a copy would be included in the minutes of the board of directors' meeting. In his letter he indicated that as soon as the loading justified it the railroads would recall additional forces to put the car fleet in order.

On October 3, 1958, Chairman Freas replied to Mr. Loomis that he considered the freight-car situation more serious than was portrayed in Mr. Loomis' letter, and advised him that reports from our field force indicated that a large number of boxcars carried as serviceable were not suitable for even rough freight loading, and that with the mild increase in loading in October there were shortages of cars of several types for loading. He was further advised that while minor repairs can, of course, be made quickly, it is too late to start major repairs or build new cars when the shortage is upon us, and that in the broad interest of the country, as well as in the special interest of the railroads, positive and vigorous action seemed clearly called for.

Instead of making an improvement in the bad-order situation, it had steadily deteriorated up to the present time; and while reports have been issued by the association to the effect that practically all of the major carriers in the country have reactivated their car-repair programs and have as their objective the reduction of their bad-order cars within a reasonable figure, results are not in evidence so far.

Division 3 of the Commission, which has direction over car service matters, held an informal conference with Vice President May, of the Association of American Railroads on February 17, at which time the freight car supply was further discussed; and this matter will be handled further with the Association of American Railroads stressing the importance of railroads' giving immediate attention to the bad-order situation.

Of the approximately 152,000 bad-order cars, over 50 percent are owned by six eastern and Allegheny carriers. As of January 1, 1959, there were 151,612 bad-order cars or 8.4 percent of total ownership of class I railroads in the United States. The railroads in the eastern district had 27,865 or 9.5 percent of total ownership bad order; Allegheny district railroads had 69,095 or 20.6 percent bad order; Pocahontas district 8,664 or 4.9 percent bad order; and the southern district 12,384 bad order or 4.6 percent. All western railroads had 30,007 or 4.6 percent bad orders. The railroads in the eastern and Pocahontas districts having the majority of the bad order cars were: New York Central, 12,448, or 11 percent; New York, Chicago & St. Louis, 3,432, or 12.1 percent; Baltimore & Ohio, 15,224, or 16 percent; Central of New Jersey, 1,943, or 25.2 percent; Pennsylvania, 43,388, or 25.3 percent; Reading, 7,521, or 25.2 percent, which totals, 83,956.

Outside of the Eastern and Pocahontas districts, the other railroads have a percentage of bad-order cars of approximately 4.6 percent, which is not considered out of line. The eastern carriers, which have the largest percentage of the bad order cars, have been in financial difficulty for the past year due to the decrease in carloadings, and they have reduced all maintenance forces to a bare minimum and very little repair work has been done to equipment located on their rails. If the bad-order situation on these roads could be brought in line with southern and western roads, the car situation would not present such a gloomy picture, even though orders for new equipment during the year 1958 were mostly for specialized equipment. During the months of November, December, and January, approximately 14,000 new cars were ordered by all carriers, which is a considerable improvement over the previous 12 months.

The Commission does not have authority to require railroads to purchase freight equipment, and neither does it have authority to prescribe rules and regulations for maintenance of freight equipment. However, we will continue to bring the matter forcefully to the attention of the railroads in an effort to improve the present situation.

The Bureau of Safety and Service of the Commission gives constant surveillance to the car supply situation. The field representatives of that Bureau stationed in the Northwest are fully aware of the daily freight-car requirements and are keeping a watchful eye on the car supply and distribution to meet current needs. Reports received from these field agents indicate that the general car supply is favorable at the present time and that, except for the types of cars previously mentioned, no serious problem has presented itself in recent months.

I might add that our Bureau of Safety and Service also works very closely with the Association of American Railroads toward an equitable distribution of the available freight cars, and at the present time empty cars are being directed to lines in the Northwest to assist them in their supply problems. This plan is being effectuated through the cooperative efforts of the various railroads.

With respect to legislative efforts necessary to carry out the program of improving the car supply, I respectfully refer you to the 72d Annual Report of the Interstate Commerce Commission for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1958 (pp. 135–136). Legislative recommendation No. 1 reads as follows:

"We recommend (a) that section 1(15) be amended so as to authorize the Commission to direct the assessment of penalty per diem charges as an aid in alleviating shortages of railroad freight cars during periods of emergency or threatened emergency, or (b) that section 1(14) be amended so as to authorize the Commission to include as a factor in determining the amount of per diem charge, the earning power or value of the use of the vehicle lost to the owner when used or appropriated by others."

A discussion of the recommendation and reasons for its submission are also contained in the report. If enacted, this proposed legislation will provide an incentive for individual carriers to own and maintain a freight car fleet sufficient to protect their requirements rather than suffer the penalty of high per diem charges, during car shortages, through the use and holding of foreign cars on their line due to the inadequacy of their car ownerships.

Sincerely yours,

KENNETH H. TUGGLE,
Chairman.

COMING CAR SHORTAGE

Blame for an impending freight-car shortage in Oregon—described as the "granddaddy" of them all—should not fall upon the shoulders of western railroads alone.

An article in the Wall Street Journal last week points out that the problem and its causes are nationwide.

The Journal article cites as one cause a squabble between eastern and western railroads over possession of badly needed cars.

During the recent recession, article points out, railroads in this part of the country fared better than those in the East and were able to carry out for the most part their car buying and repairing programs.

The shrewd, perhaps envious eastern lines reportedly have taken advantage of this by the legal if not entirely ethical practice of pirating western cars.

When these cars enter eastern systems in the normal course of commerce they can be kept there for indefinite periods—so long as the line using them pays a $2.75 daily rental charge.

The article quotes an irate Midwest rail executive as saying the eastern roads figure it's cheaper to use one of our new cars for $2.75 a day than it is for them to build or repair their own.

"So," he adds, "they've just let their car programs go to pot."

The eastern railroads, according to the Journal have found it necessary to cut down on maintaining their own rolling stock because of shrinking capital. The Pennsylvania Road, for one, reportedly favors establishing a Federal agency to purchase new equipment and lease it to the hard-pressed private lines.

Many western railroads apparently view the $2.75 rental fee a major culprit. They point out that it provides insufficient reimbursement for a car that cost them anywhere from $8,500 to $20,000 to acquire.

"So long as it is cheaper to rent a car than it is to own one—and that is the situation today—underbuilding will be the policy of strategically situated railroads." The president of a midwest road who made this statement believes, according to the Journal, that raising the rental charges would increase the national car supply automatically by the operation of natural economic laws.

George Ehlen, traffic manager for the Spokane, Portland & Seattle Railway, is quoted as saying recently that more teeth in the Association of American Railroads' rules would discourage the eastern roads from hanging on to western cars for long periods.

Raising the rent would probably help the western lines. On the other hand, it could well put that much more pressure on the profit squeeze, of which most railroads, particularly in the East, complain so bitterly.

Another investigation, as demanded by Oregon officials, might came up with a partial solution, or at least some valuable insights. But from all reports the problem can only be licked on a nationwide basis.

The need for action is urgent. The Nation's railroads have gotten on a wrong track that could lead to economic calamity, both for them and for their patrons.

GRAVE FREIGHT CAR SHORTAGE FORESEEN

(By Dan Sellard)

PORTLAND.—Oregon's lumber industry may be faced with one of the most severe freight car shortages in history this summer, unless anticipation of the problem heads it off.

Already, in the past several weeks, this anticipation of the car shortage has caused a number of meetings to be held; several committees and investigating boards have been set up and the strategy has been outlined for the battle.

The shortage is almost an annual event, as lumber shipments bump into harvests of grain and other crops, but the 1959 crisis may be greater than ever, since the lumber market is currently strong and indications are that it will remain so throughout the good weather season.

At a meeting held here Friday of the Pacific Northwest Shippers Advisory Board, an organization made up of both shippers and railroad officials, M. A. Kasen, official of a mill operation in Portland, said that while the supply of cars is tight in all areas the worst hit will be the lumber industry.

Kasen said that a forecast for the second quarter of 1959 indicates that shipments of fir lumber will be up 6.3 percent over the same quarter in 1958; and that plywood will be up 18.3 over the 1958 second quarter.

This means, he translated, a demand for 4,128 freight cars in the coming second quarter than were needed during the same period last year.

NEED WILL INCREASE

Plywood, he reported, will need 4,634 more cars in the second quarter, 1959, than were needed in the 1958 period.

The overall economic picture for the coming second quarter in the Pacific Northwest, he said, indicates that demand for cars will increase 4.2 percent or a total of 9,560 cars.

No one said during the meeting that the area would be short that many cars, but based on past supply and demand situations, the consensus was that this increased call for freight cars would undoubtedly precipitate a crisis.

Although the forecasts were only for the second quarter of 1959 (April, May, and June) the situation could be worse in July and August, for then the grain harvest makes a large demand on freight cars.

Kasen and others at the shipper's meeting were critical of railroads of the Nation for not speeding up the repair of bad-order cars, those which are taken off the lines for repair work. Later in the meeting, R. E. Clark of the Association of American Railroads, said that of the Nation's freight cars, 153,000 are in need of repairs.

FEWER CARS NOW

Clark said that today there are 137,000 fewer boxcars (which are a must in the lumber industry) in the Nation now than there were during 1958. But, he pointed out, there are 5,900 more in service than there were during 1957.

Clark denied shippers' allegations that eastern lines are holding cars which go from the West. This is not so, he said, for in January, 71.6 percent of the West's boxcars were in the western region. There are more eastern cars in the West than there are western cars in the East, he said.

During a luncheon meeting of the shippers' association, Ben W. Heineman, chairman of the Chicago & North Western Railway Co., Chicago, Ill., said that railroads should be permitted to operate like other businesses, and should be able to reduce rates to meet the other modes of transportation.

"Railroading today is a highly competitive business," Heineman said, "and we can perform only if we are considered as such."

Overpricing on the part of railroads, he said, has sent business to trucks, and this is not necessary. "The truck is faster and more flexible than the railroads and as such should command a higher price for a specialized service," he said.

The railroad leader blamed Government regulation for the situation, and summed up his talk with a plea for the shippers to help the railroads to compete by reducing rates. This, he said, can be done, only if the railways are released from the binding of Federal and local government regulations.

As the car shortage neared, several combative moves were being made at the State level in Oregon.

Speaker of the House Robert Duncan asked that a study be made of what legislation is needed to prevent the car shortage; and Gov. Mark Hatfield announced he would name an emergency transportation committee to study the problem.

EFFECTIVE WORK OF THE SMALL BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, a constituent small business concern, the McLean Development Laboratories, Inc., of Copiague, Long Island, N. Y., has written me regarding the excellent assistance it has received from the Small Business Administration regarding a problem with which it was faced. I ask that a letter from Mr. H. P. Dolan, president of that company describing this help, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MCLEAN DEVELOPMENT
LABORATORIES, INC,
New York, March 10, 1959.

The Honorable JACOB JAVITS,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR JAVITS: This letter is being voluntarily written in order that you, as a Member of the U.S. Senate and, perhaps, through you, other Members of the U.S. Senate, may learn of the excellent cooperation and help which our company, McLean Development Laboratories, Inc., received from the Small Business Administration.

McLean Development Laboratories, Inc., located in Copiague, Long Island, N.Y., qualifies as a small business corporation and, for the past 10 years, has been engaged in the design and development of bomb release and suspension mechanisms for military aircraft. During that time, practically all of our business has been with the U.S. Navy Department, Bureau of Aeronautics, and the U.S. Air Force.

In June 1957, we were awarded an engineering design contract by the Air Force Special Weapons Center, Kirtland Air Force Base, N. Mex. The contract requirements called for the design, development, and prototype model of a universal suspension system for carrying and releasing special weapons. The contract was successfully completed, and the McLean designed system is now being manufactured by Boeing Airplane Co. at Wichita, Kans., and installed in the current production of B–52 aircraft. It is expected that the system will be retroactively installed in all operational B–52 and B–47 aircraft. This program, needless to say, involves many millions of dollars of Government expenditures.

The contract under which McLean Development Laboratories, Inc., performed was of the cost-plus-fixed-fee type. Under its provisions, Mr. McLean assigned to the Government a royalty-free license to produce the suspension system. Because of the very large potential manufacturing volume involved, and the possible short-term delivery schedule which probably would be required, our company did not feel it was in a position to perform a large share of the production contract to be awarded. However, McLean Development Laboratories, Inc., did believe it could, and should, participate on a competitive basis in the production order, either as a prime subcontratcor, because of its contribution to the program through the design and development work which had been successfully performed. For a time, nevertheless, we were deeply concerned that our company might be completely eliminated from the program.

At this point, McLean Development Laboratories, Inc., sought the advice and assistance of the Small Business Administration. The results were very satisfactory. Personnel of the Small Business Administration in Washington obtained from us detailed information about the suspension program and the work performed by McLean. After satisfying themselves as to the merits of our position, the Agency representatives arranged for us to meet with representatives of the Air Force in Washington and Wright Field and, also, with members of Boeing Airplane Co. in Wichita. At all of these meetings, we were given every opportunity to present our case, and were treated with every courtesy and respect. Personnel of the Small Business Administration accompanied us to several of the meetings, and it was obvious that they were held in high regard and esteem.

Our respect and thanks go to Mr. Wendell B. Barnes, Small Business Administrator, and his staff. During our conversation with them, the personnel of the Agency proved to be men of knowledge, ability, and experience. They acted promptly, efficiently, and with confidence. We now feel that because of the efforts of the Small Business Administration, we have an excellent opportunity to participate in the suspension system program of the Air Force.

Sincerely yours,

MCLEAN DEVELOPMENT
LABORATORIES, INC.
H. P. DOLAN, President.

OCEAN SHIPPING TO SUPPORT THE DEFENSE OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point the full text of my recent correspondence with Vice Adm. Ralph E. Wilson, Deputy Chief of Naval Operations—Logistics—concerning the posture of the American merchant marine.

Against the background of last month's report dealing with the U.S. Navy, these comments indicate that our merchant marine as well as our naval fleet are not in an acceptable state of readiness to meet any emergency of the future.

There being no objection, the correspondence was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JANUARY 26, 1959.

Vice Adm. RALPH E. WILSON,
Deputy Chief of Naval Operations (Logistics), Department of the Navy, Washington, D.C.

DEAR ADMIRAL WILSON: On April 24, 1953, in testimony before the Subcommittee To Study Maritime Subsidy Programs of the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, you, as a representative of the Department of Defense, made these statements:

"The Department of Defense is concerned about the lack of a comprehensive merchant-ship-construction program which would provide for the orderly replacement of the vast proportion of our merchant fleet which is fast approaching obsolescence."

* * * * *

"It is considered appropriate to * * * recommend that the Congress place the maximum reliance on U.S.-flag merchant shipping to support the defense of the United States."

* * * * *

"It is important to note that while the national defense fleet—active and reserve—is deficient only to a minor degree to meet initial defense requirements from a quantitative point of view, there is a serious deficiency from a qualitative point of view."

The posture of our merchant navy continues to be a matter about which I am gravely concerned, and I am therefore wondering if you would care to provide me with a similar appraisal, reflecting your present views, of the status of the American merchant marine.

Many thanks in advance for any comments you might care to share with me.

Sincerely,

JOHN MARSHALL BUTLER,
U.S. Senator.

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF NAVAL OPERATIONS,
Washington, D.C., February 21, 1959.

Hon. JOHN MARSHALL BUTLER,
U. S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR BUTLER: In your letter of January 26, you refer to testimony presented by me in 1953 and express interest in a current appraisal of the status of the American merchant marine. The substance of the testimony presented in 1953 is still valid. There have been some improvements in certain areas, but they have been more than offset by continued depreciation of the vast proportion of our sea transportation resources. Other complicating factors, which I will discuss later, have also entered into the picture. Consequently, the seriousness of the overall problem has increased with the passage of time.

My original statement on "Ocean Shipping to Support the Defense of the United States" has been revised in order to bring it up to date and reflect the present views of the Department of Defense on this subject. A copy is enclosed for your information.

Most of the subsidized shipping companies have entered into long-range contracts for the orderly replacement of their aging ships. In the cargo ship category, accomplished and projected construction falls in the speed range of 17½ to 20 knots. In the passenger ship category, four new ships have been built and three converted from mariners that meet the minimum speed requirement of 20 knots. Further, the last session of Congress authorized the construction of two large high-speed passenger ships which will significantly improve our trooplift capability.

The rate of progress of the above programs will depend on actions taken in the future with respect to construction differential subsidies. It is hoped that it will be practicable for governmental subsidy funding to keep pace with the contractual schedules for replacement.

It is important to note that the subsidized segment of the U.S. flag merchant fleet amounts to a little over 300 berth line ships. They operate over essential trade routes under mandatory voyage scheduling procedures dictated by the Maritime Administration. Several unsubsidized shipping companies have applied for governmental subsidy. Should their applications be approved, the total number of authorized subsidized voyages would need to be increased and additional funds would be required.

Our unsubsidized shipping companies operate approximately 700 ships under U.S. flag. Further, they own and operate about 500 additional ships under the so-called "flags of convenience" (Panama, Liberia, and Honduras).

Unsubsidized operators have built a goodly number of modern tankers in the past few years. Most of them range in speed from 16 to 18 knots. They have built comparatively few ore carriers, other bulk carriers, or general cargo ships. In general, unsubsidized operators have neither a comprehensive nor a long-range plan for the replacement of aging ships on an orderly time schedule.

In 1953 the large number of ships that comprised our national defense reserve fleet were considered an invaluable source of augmentation of our active shipping capabilities in the event of an emergency requiring their use. These ships have aged another 6 years in the meantime and depreciated in proportion.

The vast majority of ships in the national defense reserve fleet are slow-speed Liberty types of limited usefulness. Over the past 2 years it has been found necessary to select and approve the scrapping of 300 of these ships. Their marginal value did not warrant the cost of further preservation efforts. In this regard, the President's budget message of January 19 stated that some savings in maintenance costs will be realized by the Maritime Administration through reducing preservation work on over 1,000 Liberty ships no longer suitable for mobilization. Consequently, there is an obvious need that the reserve fleet be purified on a cyclic basis by the trade-in of aging ships under orderly replacement programs. Otherwise, our national defense reserve fleet will gradually deteriorate into insignificance.

The Department of Defense fully shares your grave concern with regard to the posture of our U.S. controlled merchant fleet. We are especially worried over recent developments in the international controversy regarding the registry of American-owned ships under foreign "flags of convenience."

American-owned merchant ships that are registered under flags of convenience are under effective U.S. control by virtue of agreements effected by the Maritime Administration. They are readily available and will be required in the event of mobilization or other serious emergency to augment our limited U.S.-flag merchant fleet. More than half of the U.S. controlled tanker tonnage is registered under foreign flags.

Over the past few months, increasing pressure has been exerted against "flags of convenience" by foreign shipping interests and maritime labor organizations. Combined opposition from these sources threaten to make it economically impracticable for American owners to operate their ships under "flags of convenience." This raises the immediate question as to what steps should be taken to insure the continued availability of these ships for purposes of national defense.

European shipping interests have long criticized those aspects of American shipping policies which enable our operators to compete in ocean trade. They have enlisted the support of their governments in strongly opposing American practices with respect to shipping subsidies, cargo preference, and registries under "flags of convenience." International maritime labor organizations have furthered the objectives of European shipping interests by exerting forceful pressures against the owners of "flags of convenience" shipping.

In December 1958, the Netherlands Government presented a note to the Secretary of State on behalf of a number of Western European countries. The note suggested that informal talks be arranged between representatives of the United States and the Western European countries, the object of which would be to explore whether the shipping policies of the Western European countries and the United States could be brought into closer harmony without impairing either the legitimate needs of the United States in shipping matters or the common economic strength of the West. The Department of State, by letter dated January 28, 1959, has advised Senator MAGNUSON, your committee chairman, of steps being taken in preparation for the forthcoming talks.

The latest development in the "flags of convenience" problem occurred during the recent London conference of the International Transport Workers Federation. At this conference, a decision was made to require shipowners to hire crews under contracts with unions of the shipowners' nationality. American owners of "flags of convenience" ships contend that they cannot operate under American wage scales without governmental subsidy.

To bring the American-owned "flags of convenience" fleet (about 350 ships) under U.S. flag and subsidize its operation would entail extremely high ultimate costs, as numerous unsubsidized ships that are presently under U.S. flag would also become eligible for subsidy.

It would not be appropriate for either the Navy or the Defense Department to become involved in a dispute between labor and management. Department of Defense interest and anxiety in this matter pertain to the impact on our national defense posture that this unresolved problem poses.

In view of your position and your interest in the welfare of our maritime industry, it is important that you be fully informed on the foregoing trend of event.

Sincerely yours,

Vice Adm. RALPH E. WILSON,
United States Navy, Deputy Chief of Naval Operations (Logistics).

OCEAN SHIPPING TO SUPPORT THE DEFENSE OF THE UNITED STATES

INTRODUCTION

The United States must be prepared today—and throughout the foreseeable future—to deal immediately and effectively with any emergency that may be forced upon us. We must be ready at all times to fight a limited war, or a general war, or to support our foreign policies under tense conditions short of actual conflict.

The prosecution of war utilizes all the resources of our Nation. Our entire industrial potential is intermeshed into our overall national defense posture. To project our military power overseas and support sustained combat operations, our Armed Forces must rely heavily upon American industry—and our maritime industry, as in the past, must play a key role.

The strategic importance of ocean transportation in wartime dictates that the United States must have effective control over sufficient active merchant-type shipping to promptly meet our initial emergency requirements—for the redeployment of military forces and the rapid transportation of noncombatant evacuees from danger areas.

Six years ago we possessed a marginal, but gradually deteriorating capability to carry out the transportation task outlined above. Since then the Department of Defense has observed with concern the slow rate of progress made in the replacement of aging vessels. Greater emphasis must be placed on the need for orderly shipbuilding programs.

We cannot rely on NATO pooling to solve our merchant shipping problems, as it appears most probable that the combined requirements of all NATO nations will exceed the total capabilities of the pool. Moreover, considerable delay in the implementation of NATO pooling procedures is anticipated. Our global interests require that the United States be prepared for emergencies other than a NATO war.

BACKGROUND

At the outbreak of World War I, shipping available for charter to American interests suddenly became extremely scarce. Charter rates skyrocketed. We were forced to hastily improvise a shipbuilding program which was both costly and inefficient. Peak production was reached after the war ended. We learned in World War I that the law of supply and demand is real. We were taught the same lesson again in World War II.

The primary mission of the American merchant marine is the normal task of transporting our domestic waterborne commerce and a substantial portion of our foreign export and import ocean trade. The health of our industrial economy is dependent on sea transportation for the import and export of numerous raw materials and finished products. It is imperative that the world's foremost trader control sufficient merchant shipping to transport what we need when we need it.

A collateral and extremely important mission of the American merchant marine is the maintenance of a posture of strength and readiness that will contribute the maximum to our national security. In the event of war we will require the services of a large number of merchant type ships to meet our military, industrial, and civilian demands.

It is important that our anticipated wartime needs be insured to the maximum practicable degree in peacetime by the ready availability of privately owned merchant ships employed in gainful ocean commerce. The magnitude and quality of active commercial tonnage under U.S. control in peacetime will determine, in the event of a future war, whether or not we will be required to initiate a crash building program.

REQUIREMENTS AND AVAILABILITIES

Periodic evaluations of merchant shipping requirements and availabilities are made jointly by the Department of Defense, the Department of Commerce, and the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization. A similar joint appraisal is made annually by the Maritime Administration and the Navy Department.

The determinations of merchant shipping requirements are based on approved mobilization plans for general war. Civilian and military requirements are combined to represent our total minimum shipping needs for the early phases of a general war.

Our joint evaluations of shipping availabilities consistently show that the United States does not have sufficient active U.S. owned and controlled shipping to meet our initial wartime needs. Consequently, our estimated total capabilities must include planned early activations from the National Defense Reserve Fleet—under optimum assumed conditions which make no allowances for possible damage to shore facilities. Allowances are made for cumulative losses of shipping from enemy action. However, such estimated deductions are probably conservative.

A recent joint review of merchant shipping requirements and availabilities made by the Maritime Administration and the Navy Department indicates that during the initial phases of a general war:

(a) There would be a numerical deficit of between 100 and 200 dry-cargo ships equivalent to the C–3 class, approximately 30 reefer cargo ships equivalent to the Rs–S–BV1 class, and 4 heavy-lift ships (150-ton booms) equivalent to the converted C–4 class.

(b) There would be small but manageable deficits in tanker availabilities.

(c) We could meet our minimum needs for troop transport. This determination is valid, however, only on a quantitative basis. There are serious qualitative deficiencies.

Our sea-transportation resources for limited war are presently considered to be adequate. However, the degree of promptness with which sealift responds in an emergency will have an important impact on the eventual outcome. A limited war crisis could well become a race against time to evacuate nationals, to redeploy troops and equipment, or to augment and resupply existing forces overseas. To be prepared for such situations, we must rely on the ready availability of modern merchant ships of all types.

PRESENT CAPABILITIES

Existing inventories of sealift resources under U.S. control, as of January 1, 1959, are summarized below:

	Number	Dead-weight tonnage
(a) Dry cargo ships:
Operational	921	10,222,400
Reserve fleet	1,580	16,241,600
Total	2,501	26,464,000
(b) Tankers:
Operational	693	13,702,900
Reserve fleet	66	890,800
Total	759	14,593,700
		Passengers (emergency capacity)
(c) Passenger ships/transports:
Operational active total	70	115,892
Reserve fleet	89	223,884
Total	159	339,776

The active U.S. controlled sealift capability is comprised of merchant ships under U.S. flag, certain foreign registered merchant ships under "Effective U.S. Control," and merchant-type ships operated by the Military Sea Transportation Service (MSTS).

The term "Effective U.S. Control" applies to selected American-owned ships which have been registered under the so-called "flags of convenience" (Panama, Liberia, and Honduras), in order to reduce operating costs. In such cases, the Maritime Administration has effected agreements with the parent shipping companies in the United States to make these ships available to the U.S. Government in the event of a national emergency. These agreements can be fulfilled without restraint, because the laws of Panama, Liberia, and Honduras do not impose restrictions on the control of merchant ships that fly their flags. These countries have no shipping requirements of their own and they are likely to remain neutral in the event of war. In view of these circumstances, the Department of Defense considers such ships to be under "Effective U.S. Control."

The vast proportion of our U.S. controlled merchant-type ships were constructed during the years 1942 to 1945. They were mass produced for specific wartime purposes. Many of their design features were matters of expediency rather than choice. Ships built during World War II are now 14 to 17 years old and have long been outmoded from the standpoint of modern design.

The capabilities shown as comprising the National Defense Reserve Fleet may be misleading. It should be pointed out that over 1,300 of the dry cargo ships are slow-speed Liberty types of limited usefulness. Approximately 180 of them are awaiting scrapping under previous approvals to select and scrap 300 of the poorest quality ships. Their marginal value did not warrant the cost of further preservation efforts. Of the 89 transport/passenger ships, 51 are 17 knot C–4 austerity transports and 23 are 15.5 knot Victory troopships.

We can look forward to further depreciation of the overall potential of the Reserve Fleet—from the standpoints of both quantity and quality. Consequently, there is an obvious need that the Reserve Fleet be purified on a cyclic basis by the trade-in of aging ships under orderly replacement programs. This requirement goes hand-in-hand with the need to modernize our active merchant fleet.

DRY CARGO SHIPS

The only fully modern dry cargo ships in commercial operation today are the Mariner Class ships that were built by the U.S. Government. The 20 knot C–4 Mariners, which can do 23 knots if required, represent an impressive step forward in cargo ship design. Their performances have been highly praised by several private operators to whom 29 of the ships were sold. Three of these ships have been converted into passenger ships.

With regard to future construction of dry cargo ships, the Department of Defense recommends that the design characteristics listed below be incorporated to the maximum degree that is commercially practicable.

(a) Speed: When built under construction-differential subsidy contracts and certified as being suitable for economical and speedy conversion into naval auxiliaries, dry cargo ships should have a sustained sea speed of 20 knots or better. Dry cargo ships certified as otherwise suitable for the use of the U.S. Government in time of war or national emergency, should have a sustained sea speed of not less than 18 knots. Where construction subsidies and/or national defense allowances are not involved, the highest commercially economical speeds are acceptable.

(b) Other characteristics: The most practical and useful types of general-cargo vessels, from a military point of view, appear to be those having the capacity and the characteristics of the C–3's and C–4's (particularly Mariners), of Maritime Administration design. However, much is to be desired in the matter of modernization with respect to cargo handling equipment and methods. Cargo vessels should be designed and equipped to load and discharge, using their own gear, in one-half the time now required by the existing C–3's and C–4's. At least one hatch of each vessel should be served by a "jumbo" boom of 60 tons capacity and all hatches should be equipped with 10-ton booms. There is a definite need for a limited number of heavy lift ships equipped with oversized hatches and cargo booms capable of lifting up to 150 tons.

(c) Special type cargo ships: Roll-on/roll-off ships on the order of the USNS Comet as well as ships with partial roll-on/roll-off capability offer advantages in meeting requirements for the overseas movement of mobile military equipment such as wheeled and tracked vehicles. Additionally, we encourage the continued development of container cargo ships, which are designed to carry containerized and prepalletized cargoes. Further construction of such ships in peacetime would increase active capability and afford operating experience. U.S. shipyards would also gain construction experience which would enable them to commence early production under an emergency situation.

TANKERS

American shipowners have built a good number of modern tankers in the past few years—some for registry under U.S. flag and some for registry under foreign flag. These new ships range in speed from 16 to 18 knots. Consequently, the overall quality of our total tanker capability is much better than the dry cargo category. This improvement has been due to various incentives directly related to the law of supply and demand.

The tanker building program should continue in order to provide orderly replacement of aging ships. It is recommended that future tanker construction incorporate design features as indicated below:

(a) Speed: Where national defense allowances are made, and the ships are certified as suitable for speedy and economical conversion into naval auxiliaries, tankers should be capable of a sustained speed of 20 knots or more. Where certified as otherwise suitable for use by the U.S. Government, tankers should be capable of a sustained speed of not less than 18 knots. Where no certification by the Secretary of the Navy is sought, then the maximum commercially economical speed is acceptable.

(b) Other characteristics: Although tankers of larger deadweight-tons capacity can be utilized to a limited extent, the recommended general characteristics of commercial tankers most suitable for military purposes are 25,000/38,000 deadweight-tons, capable of carrying several types of petroleum products. At the same time, there is still a requirement for smaller tankers of about 17,000 deadweight-tons to handle products to and from limited facilities.

PASSENGER SHIPS/TRANSPORTS

Seven new passenger ships have been built since World War II and three have been converted from Mariner class cargo ships. The seven new ships are the 25-knot Constitution and Independence, the 33-knot United States, the 20-knot Santa Paula and Santa Rosa, and the 21-knot Brasil and Argentina. The Mariner conversions are the 20-knot Mariposa, Monterey, and Atlantic. These ships have contributed significantly to our maritime prestige and to our defense readiness.

Additionally, the 19-knot President Cleveland and President Wilson were converted from troopships. These ships, however, are basically World War II types. They form a part of the older, and major segment of our total trooplift capability, which is not fully suitable for possible future emergencies. The majority of our ships are old, deficient in speed, and lacking in other features that are important in minimizing the hazards of moving troops by sea.

There is an urgent need to improve the quality of our trooplift potential. For ships that will be employed in wartime to transport personnel through areas in which hostile modern submarines may be operating, it is necessary to set much higher standards of performance and safety than would be required for ships carrying dry cargo and fuel.

(a) Speed: Speed is the best defense that merchant ships can employ against an enemy. The faster the target, the more difficult it is to hit with submarine torpedoes—or to pinpoint with missiles. Fast ships can be operated independently over more devious routes than is possible in convoy operations. This complicates the search and attack problems of enemy aircraft and submarines. Recent studies confirm that vulnerability to submarine attack is significantly and progressively reduced as speeds in excess of 25 knots are attained.

Troopships constructed in the future, and passenger ships suitable for conversion into troopships, should be capable of a sustained speed of 25 knots or greater. In no case should their maximum sustained speed be less than 20 knots.

The Department of Defense has consistently urged that all new merchant-type shipbuilding incorporate the maximum speed that is economically practicable. In this regard, it is important that our merchant ships be commercially successful. To be of immediate use to the Department of Defense in an emergency, they must be operating commercially at the time they are first needed.

(b) Other features: Emphasis on added speed should not obscure the significance of other national defense features which can be built into a merchant ship. High standards of compartmentation reduce vulnerability to enemy hazards by localizing damage. Various preventative measures increase a ship's resistance to the spread of fire. Special mountings minimize breakdowns of essential machinery under shock.

Endurance adequate for round-trip voyages at maximum sustained speed is a vital factor in wartime. Additional fuel capacity, the size of distilling plants, the storage space for provisions, and many other design aspects have an important bearing on endurance. Many of the foregoing factors, aside from improving the wartime utility of a ship, also assure safer, more versatile and reliable performance in peacetime commercial operations.

FUTURE OUTLOOK

The subsidized segment of the U.S.-flag merchant fleet amounts to 309 berth line ships. They operate over essential trade routes under mandatory voyage scheduling procedures dictated by the Maritime Administration. Several unsubsidized shipping companies have applied for governmental subsidy. Their applications are still pending.

Most of the subsidized shipping companies have entered into long-range contracts for the orderly replacement of their aging ships. In the dry cargo ship category, projected construction falls in the speed range of 17½ to 20 knots—an appreciable improvement over standard performances heretofore. Further, the last session of Congress authorized but did not appropriate funds for the construction of two large high-speed passenger sidies. It is hoped that it will be practicable for governmental subsidy funding to significantly improve our trooplift potential. They will almost double our capability in the important speed range of 25 knots and above.

The rate of progress of the above programs will depend on actions taken in the future with respect to construction-differential subsidies. It is hoped that it will be practicable for governmental subsidy funding to keep pace with the contractual schedules for replacement.

Our unsubsidized shipping companies operate approximately 700 ships under U.S. flag. Further, they own and operate about 500 additional ships under "flags of convenience" (Effective U.S. Control). While they have built considerable tonnage in recent years, few unsubsidized operators, if any, have either a comprehensive or a long-range plan for the replacement of aging ships on an orderly time schedule. Their planning is influenced from day to day by various incentives or discouragements. Their enthusiasm for shipbuilding has been dampened recently by renewed attacks against "flags of convenience."

Over the past few months, increasing pressure has been exerted against "flags of convenience" by foreign shipping interests, maritime labor organizations and Western European governments. Combined opposition from these sources threaten to make it economically impracticable for American owners to operate their ships under "flags of convenience." This raises the immediate question as to what steps should be taken to insure the continued availability of these ships for purposes of national defense. It is important to note that over half of the U.S. controlled tanker tonnage is registered under the flags of Panama, Liberia and Honduras.

EMERGENCY EXPANSION

One basic factor to be considered in the development of specific construction programs is the necessity for the maintenance of a sufficient number of private shipyards in operation to form the base for expansion in time of war to meet mass-ship construction programs. The Department of Defense desires to emphasize that the existence of these active privately owned shipyards, together with the skills of the shipyard workers and the capabilities of the tools, equipment and facilities, is essential to the National Defense.

In 1956 a large increase in orders for commercial ships to be built in U.S. shipyards pointed up the limited capability of the active shipbuilding industry to accommodate itself to rapidly expanding shipbuilding requirements. Prompt and effective action should be taken to institute measures which will improve the operational readiness of the U.S. shipbuilding establishment, including in the area of ship components manufacture.

SUMMARY

Under the most optimistic assumptions, and on a quantitative basis only, the United States still possesses a marginal capability to carry out the sea transportation tasks of a general war.

There are serious qualitative deficiencies in our overall sealift capability, particularly in the dry cargo ship and the transport-passenger ship categories. The further aging of outmoded ships will aggravate this situation.

The present rate of new shipbuilding will not offset the rapidly approaching block obsolescence of the vast proportion of U.S. controlled merchant-type tonnage—both active and reserve. There is an urgent need for increased emphasis on orderly ship construction.

The continued depreciation of ships in the National Defense Reserve Fleet without cyclic purification will soon generate serious quantitative deficiencies in our total sealift capability.

Crash building programs in wartime can only be avoided by maintaining a modern and adequate maritime posture in peacetime.

CONCLUSION

In order for the United States to maintain adequate merchant shipping to meet our initial wartime needs, it is important that the ships of both subsidized and nonsubsidized operators be periodically replaced under orderly and progressive programs. In so doing, every advantage should be taken of recent and future technological developments. Cargo handling equipment and propulsion plants should be further improved, with a view to reducing the transit and turn around times of commercial shipping.

Our shipbuilding programs should be farsighted in order that ships contracted for in coming years will be actually competitive throughout their economic life span. Further, ships built with foresight will be more readily adaptable to speedy and economical conversion into naval auxiliaries, or otherwise suitable for naval use in the event of war.

APRIL 6, 1959.

Vice Adm. RALPH E. WILSON,
U.S. Navy, Deputy Chief of Naval Operations (Logistics), Department of the Navy, Washington, D.C.

DEAR ADMIRAL WILSON: Your recent letter concerning the posture of the American merchant navy is deeply appreciated. I find your supporting memorandum entitled "Ocean Shipping to Support the Defense of the United States" to be both enlightening and alarming.

To those of us in the Congress who strive to ensure that our merchant and naval fleets are maintained in a constant state of adequate readiness to meet any future eventuality, your analyses and conclusions are most helpful. But if the deficiencies you cite are to be rectified, I am sure you will agree, more vigorous leadership and effort must be put forth by the Congress, the executive branch and industry alike. You may be sure that your recommendations will receive the measure of congressional attention they properly deserve. Similarly, I hope that the soundness and wisdom of your advice will be impressed upon administration officials to the extent that a change in our present dangerous policies affecting the merchant marine will be adopted without further delay.

With sincere thanks for your cooperation and kind personal regards, I am

Cordially,

JOHN MARSHALL BUTLER,
U.S. Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed.

LABOR-MANAGEMENT REPORTING AND DISCLOSURE ACT OF 1959—CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Does the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] care to discuss the appeal from the ruling of the Chair?

Mr. KENNEDY. I do not care to discuss it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum. Can the time for the quorum call be taken out of the 30 minutes reserved on the appeal, or the bill, or both?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That can be done.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Very well, Mr. President. I suggest the absence of a quorum, and asked that the time be charged to both sides equally.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator request that the Chair lay before the Senate the pending business?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I make that request, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the pending business.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1555) to provide for the reporting and disclosure of certain financial transactions and administrative practices of labor organizations and employers, to prevent abuses in the administration of trusteeships by labor organizations, to provide standards with respect to the election of officers of labor organizations, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The appeal of the Senator from New Hampshire from the ruling of the Chair is before the Senate, and the question is, shall the ruling of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I suggest the absence of a quorum, and ask that the time be charged to the bill and to both sides equally.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Douglas	Johnston, S.C.
Allott	Dworshak	Jordan

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] are absent on official business.

I also announce that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. BIBLE] is absent because of a death in his family and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR] is absent because of illness.

Mr. KUCHEL. I announce that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] is necessarily absent.

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CARLSON] is absent on official business.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] is necessarily absent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A quorum is present. The Chair would like to make a statement.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, may we have order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate will be in order.

With respect to the point of order made by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] against the so-called Kuchel amendment striking out certain language in the bill and inserting other matter, the Chair would like to call to the attention of the Senate some precedents supporting the proposition that the amendment is in order. They are short, and without objection they will be included in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the precedents were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A MOTION TO STRIKE OUT A PORTION OF THE TEXT OF A BILL, WHICH HAD BEEN AMENDED BY THE SENATE, IS IN ORDER

On May 16, 1932 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 75, pt. 9, p. 10276), during the consideration of H.R. 10236, a revenue bill, Mr. Tom Connally, of Texas, indicated his purpose subsequently to move to strike out a portion of the bill which had been amended by the Senate. Mr. George H. Moses, of New Hampshire, took the position that after a committee amendment had been agreed to, Mr. Connally would not be in a position to offer the amendment which affected the committee amendment as agreed to by the Senate. The Vice President (Mr. Charles Curtis, of Kansas) said:

"The Chair is of the opinion that if the amendment covers more than the committee amendment, if it covers an additional part of the House text, it is in order * * * regardless of the time when it is offered."

IF AN AMENDMENT TO A PART OF A SECTION OF A BILL IS AGREED TO, A MOTION TO STRIKE OUT THE ENTIRE SECTION AS AMENDED IS IN ORDER

On July 27, 1939, during the discussion of S. 2864, to finance recoverable expenditures (spending-lending), Mr. Barkley, of Kentucky, proposed an amendment as a substitute for three subdivisions of section 5.

Mr. King, of Utah, submitted the following parliamentary inquiry: "Would the adoption of this amendment preclude later on, if perhaps it should be amended in some respects, a motion to strike out the entire provision dealing with public roads?"

The Presiding Officer (Mr. CHAVEZ, of New Mexico) held it would not.

Subsequently, the Presiding Officer (Mr. Truman, of Missouri) made a similar ruling. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 84, pt. 10, pp. 10160, 10178.)

On May 23, 1944, during the consideration of H.R. 4679, the Interior Department appropriation bill, a committee amendment in the paragraph relating to the Federal Power Commission, striking out $375,000 and inserting $3,950,000, was reached. Mr. Clark (Mo.) inquired: "Would the adoption of this amendment preclude the entry of a point of order to the paragraph at the proper time"?

The Presiding Officer (Mr. Burton, of Ohio) said: "The Chair understands the Senate is dealing with the House language in this paragraph, and that being already in the bill by the action of the House a point of order does not lie against it. If the Senator from Missouri wishes to strike out the paragraph as amended he may do so.

Mr. Clark said: "I will move to strike out at the proper time. My inquiry was whether the adoption of the amendment would preclude the motion to strike."

The Presiding Officer said: "The adoption of the amendment would not preclude the later motion to strike out the paragraph." (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 90, pt. 4, p. 4862.)

A MOTION IS IN ORDER TO STRIKE OUT A SECTION OF A BILL WHICH HAS BEEN AMENDED

On June 12, 1958, during the consideration of S. 3974, the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1958, Mr. COOPER, of Kentucky, proposed an amendment inserting an additional paragraph to a section of the bill. Mr. Knowland, of California, submitted the following parliamentary inquiry:

"I should like to inquire of the Chair, assuming the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky is accepted, and subsequently it was the will of the Senate to strike that whole section (c) from the bill, whether that motion would be in order."

The Presiding Officer (Mr. PROXMIRE, of Wisconsin) stated that such an amendment would be in order. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 104, pt. 8, p. 10951.)

Subsequently, during the further consideration of the foregoing amendment, a request was made for unanimous consent to modify the amendment, whereupon Mr. GOLDWATER, of Arizona, submitted a parliamentary inquiry, whether, if the amendment was modified, that action would preclude a motion to strike all of subsection (c) on page 7.

The Presiding Office (Mr. MARTIN, of Iowa) stated that the motion to strike all of the subsection, as amended, would be in order. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 104, pt. 8, p. 10958.)

On April 23, 1928, in the House of Representatives, the Committee of the Whole had under consideration the bill (S. 3740) for the control of floods of the Mississippi River and its tributaries.

A committee amendment to section 3 of the bill was agreed to, when Mr. Martin B. Madden, of Illinois, offered an amendment to strike out section 3, including the amendment just adopted.

Mr. Frank B. Reid, of Illinois, made the point of order that an amendment having been inserted in the bill, it was not in order to propose further disposition by amendment.

The Chairman (Mr. Frederick B. Lehlback, of New Jersey) ruled:

"The Chair is ready to dispose of any point of order. It is quite in order to strike out a section that has been amended and insert new language." (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 69, pt. 7, p. 7022.)

The VICE PRESIDENT. From these precedents it is clear that where a part of a bill has been amended—whether or not a motion to reconsider was made and tabled—it is in order subsequently to move to strike out contiguous language in the bill broader than and including such amendment, and likewise to insert other matter in lieu of the language as amended proposed to be stricken out.

The right to offer perfecting amendments to a section, sections, or parts of a bill under consideration, prior to action on any motion to strike out or to strike out and insert is granted under the rule. Where such amendments are agreed to, and the motion to strike out such language containing the amendments agreed to and insert other matter is adopted, the amended language is displaced by the matter inserted.

Thirty minutes remain for debate on the question.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I assume no time is now available.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield such time to the Senator from Georgia as he may require.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia is recognized.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, there have been a number of occasions on which I have disagreed rather vigorously with some of the parliamentary positions taken by the distinguished Vice President. I must say, however, that on this occasion I thoroughly concur in the decision the Vice President has just stated. It so happens that I was a Member of the Senate when the procedure of making a motion to reconsider and to lay that motion on the table was first used in the Senate. That procedure had never been followed in the Senate prior to 1933. That and some other procedures which have crept into the Senate procedure were imported from the House of Representatives. They are in derogation of the deliberative nature of the Senate.

The then Senator from Missouri, Bennett Champ Clark, had been the Parliamentarian of the House of Representatives at the time his father served as Speaker. The Vice President, a citizen of the State of Texas, the Honorable John N. Garner, had been the Speaker of the House of Representatives and had served in that body for a number of years.

On one occasion, Senator Clark moved to reconsider and to lay on the table. A number of Senators were very much disappointed when the Vice President sustained that procedure in the Senate. That procedure had been a matter of controversry for some 2 or 3 years prior to the time when the Senate had rewritten its rules so as to eliminate the practice of proceeding as in Committee of the Whole, which had obtained in the Senate. It was undoubtedly a restriction upon the very liberal rules and parliamentary practices which had theretofore prevailed in the Senate.

The rule on liberality in offering amendments in the Senate is as essential to preserving the characteristic of the Senate as a deliberative body as is the right of free and unlimited debate. The rule on amendments is as broad in the Senate as is the doctrine of universal salvation which some religious sects hold.

There is no rule of relevancy in the Senate as to amendments. In the Senate, an amendment can be offered which embraces entirely different subject matter from that contained in the bill to which the amendment is proposed. That does not hold true in the other body, and I do not think it holds true in any other parliamentary body on earth. So, in my opinion, there is no doubt that a complete substitute could be offered to this bill at any stage of the proceedings prior to the third reading of the bill.

If an amendment in the nature of a substitute can be offered for the entire bill, it necessarily follows that a substitute can be offered for a portion of the bill, even though the substitute might embrace some provision, or provisions, which had theretofore been agreed to and a motion to reconsider which had been subsequently laid on the table.

I think the ruling by the Chair is wholly in accord with the liberal parliamentary doctrine that we like to claim for the Senate, and which sets the Senate apart from any other legislative body which is known to governments anywhere on the face of the earth.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. MONRONEY. I deeply appreciate the statement made by the distinguished Senator from Georgia. I feel that he is exactly correct in saying that the procedure to move to lay on the table a motion to reconsider cannot and must not estop a legislative body such as the Senate from working its will prior to the third reading of the bill. To do that would be to deny to the Senate the right to perfect, correct, or eliminate material which, on second thought, was contrary to the majority will of the Senate.

There is no doubt in my mind that various procedures are available to achieve this objective. There could have been absolutely no question had the motion been to move to recommit the bill to the committee, and to have the committee report a bill forthwith with instructions to adopt all amendments previously adopted by the Senate, with the exception of the rewriting of the McClellan amendment as follows; and there could have been no question of the Senate's right to correct it. This is another parliamentary means by which new matter is added and old matter deleted, so as to represent the more mature and considered thought of the Senate, if the Senate, by a majority vote, adopts the new amendment.

I concur completely in the statement by the distinguished Senator from Georgia that a legislative body such as the Senate must have within its power the right to work its will, after mature consideration, on all amendments which have been adopted prior to the third reading of the bill.

Mr. RUSSELL. The motion to reconsider and the motion to lay on the table, which were first recognized here by Vice President Garner, undoubtedly have a very profound effect upon the Senate in its deliberations, because they do estop any further motion to reconsider. That had been a motion which Senators had valued very highly in all instances prior to the ruling by Vice President Garner.

But certainly the denial of the right of a Senator to move to reconsider cannot be construed as the denial of the right to offer an amendment or an amendment in the nature of a substitute or a motion to recommit, or any other parliamentary motion which may be in order. It relates solely and exclusively to the motion to reconsider.

I concede that under a strict construction of the rule an amendment which affected only the matter which had been agreed to and a motion to reconsider which had been laid on the table, would not be in order. But when other matter is sought to be added to the bill, which makes the amendment an amendment in the nature of a substitute, it is certainly in order; otherwise the majority of the Senate would be denied the right to write such legislation as the majority might support.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator from Georgia that according to the precedents which are advanced the only requirement is that the other matter must be contiguous to the amendment which has been previously considered. Does the Senator agree with the Chair?

Mr. RUSSELL. Certainly it would be necessary for it to reach contiguous matter. Any Senator has the right to offer a complete substitute, beginning with the caption of the bill and continuing through to the last section. I do not think anyone would deny that such an amendment would be in order. And if it is in order, the offering of a substitute provision affecting matter which precedes or follows the amendment desired to be affected certainly is proper.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That was true in the precedents cited.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, it is my understanding of the parliamentary situation that when the Senate concluded its labors last night, the pending question was on a point of order raised by the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] and an appeal from the ruling of the Chair. That is the question, as I understand, which is now pending. Before the Senate can proceed to the discussion of any other amendment or amendment in the nature of a substitute, the appeal must first be disposed of. Is my understanding correct?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois is correct.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The distinguished Senator from New Hampshire is unavoidably away from the Chamber for a few hours, but I have communicated with him by telephone. There are two ways of disposing of the question. It could be tabled, or it could be withdrawn. I have been advised, and I have the consent of the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire, to withdraw the point of order and the appeal. I ask unanimous consent that that be done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the point of order is withdrawn.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, what is the question before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question before the Senate is on agreeing to the Kuchel amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. As I understand, on that amendment each side has 30 minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas is correct. Thirty minutes are allowed to each side.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, may we have order in the Chamber?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate will be in order. The Senator from California will not continue until the Senate is in order. The time on the amendment will not run during that period.

The Senator from California may now proceed.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, a few evenings ago the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN] offered an amendment to the bill which he entitled "Bill of Rights of Members of Labor Organizations." As did all other Senators, I listened intently to his presentation. Thereafter, I listened to the argument advanced by the able Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], in opposition to the amendment.

I thought the first point the able Senator from Massachusetts made was a valid one. He raised the question whether, if a Federal bill of rights for labor were adopted, it would put at naught all State laws in the country protecting the workingmen.

I arose, and interrupted my friend, the Senator from Massachusetts. I asked him whether he would yield. He did yield.

I then asked my friend, the Senator from Arkansas, whether he would be willing to meet the valid argument of preemption, by offering to the amendment an appropriate nonpreemption amendment. After some discussion, the able Senator from Arkansas said he would; he did so, and the Senate approved it.

On the basis of the debate, I concluded—as did many other Senators—to support the bill of rights amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas. It was a long amendment; and we had been debating long and hard, for many, many hours, in trying to arrive at a labor reform bill which would have bipartisan support, which would represent progress by the Congress in the field of labor reform, and which would become the law of the land.

The next day, I, like many of my colleagues, read the text of the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas for which I had voted. It was several pages long. Certainly, with more than 100 printed amendments on our desks, it was physically impossible for any of us to read, let alone to study, the amendments as, one by one, they were offered with rapidity and we were required to vote each one either up or down.

Others of my colleagues on both sides of the aisle did what I did—read and studied the amendments. It became apparent that there were some obvious questions as to parts of the language used. I concluded that in this proposed legislation there were provisions which were imperfectly drawn, which should be improved, and changed.

Thus, with some of my colleagues on this side of the aisle and with some of my colleagues on the other side of the aisle, I began to explore the possibility of keeping that which the Senator from Arkansas advocated, namely, a bill of rights for labor, but of writing those rights in clear, unmistakable, reasonable, and just terms. That is what we tried to do.

Some Senators were proceeding on this same subject independently with their thinking; and others proceeded on a different basis, but all with the same objective.

Finally, late yesterday, we came into general agreement as to an area which we believed represented forward progress and represented a sound, understandable, just, and reasonable bill of rights for labor. That is what is before the Senate now.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from California yield?

Mr. KUCHEL. I do not yield yet.

Mr. President, I must say that I regret with all my heart that our amendment which now is before the Senate was not on the desk of each Senator last night. I apologize to the Senate for that situation. Regardless of how long I may remain in the Senate, in the future I hope never to be either the author or the coauthor of any amendment which, when offered, is not placed on the desk of each Senator.

But, Mr. President, what was the alternative yesterday evening? It had been asserted that the majority leader of the Senate hoped to have the vote on final passage of the bill taken last night. Under those circumstances, should we have forgotten, and should we simply have torn up and discarded, the draft of the amendment which we thought it necessary to include in the bill? I say "No." We had a duty, viewing the problem as we did, to offer our amendment to the Senate.

I state again my regret that a copy of the amendment was not on the desk of each Senator last evening. If I am forgiven, I am thankful for it.

Mr. President, at this time I ask my colleagues to examine the text of the amendment which the Senate adopted the other evening. It appears on pages 6475–6476 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for April 22. I ask them also to examine the text of the amendment which our bipartisan group now offers in good faith. It is set forth at pages 6693 and 6694 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for yesterday.

Perhaps first of all, Mr. President, I should say that in several major points the McClellan amendment would be changed by our amendment. In one case our amendment provides for deleting from the McClellan amendment the provision for the right of the Secretary of Labor to seek an injunction when any of the rights enumerated are alleged to have been violated. In such circumstances, our amendment gives to a union member who alleges such a grievance the right to go into the Federal court for appropriate relief. Incidentally, under the language of the bill, it is made a crime to deny any of the rights enumerated. That is one of the major changes which we have attempted to make by means of the amendment which now is before the Senate.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator from California yield?

Mr. KUCHEL. Not yet.

In addition, Mr. President, the bill now before us provides that a candidate for union office, other than an incumbent, shall have the right to require the union to send his political pamphleteering to the members of the union, although he, himself, let me add, will be required to pay for it. The bill further provides that the officers of the union shall not discriminate—the word "discriminate" is used—against any of the other candidates. As Senators will observe, the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas clearly included a provision by means of which any of the candidates might obtain, under certain circumstances, a copy of the union membership lists.

It seemed to me, as I read that provision for the first time, after I had voted on it—as I am sure most other Senators did—that a policy question was involved, namely, what rule of reason we should follow. Are business corporations under law required to turn over a list of all their stockholders to one stockholder who is interested in running for an office in the corporation? Not so. Should there be a double standard, one for business corporations and one for labor unions? Should we provide in a Federal statute for a double standard in such cases? Not so. Should we treat a business in one fashion, and should we treat a labor organization in another? Not so.

Thus it was that the able Senator from New York fashioned an amendment in which the rest of us concurred which provides that a candidate for union office, other than the incumbent, may go into the Federal court and may have his rights under the language of the bill adjudicated with respect to nondiscrimination in the use of membership lists in union elections. If the Federal court finds the existence of a discrimination on the part of the union officers with respect to the mailing list, the court, under the provisions of the amendment of the Senator from New York, in which as I say we concur, will be entitled to give such relief as it deems equitable under all the circumstances.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, will the Senator from California yield?

Mr. KUCHEL. I should like to continue this statement; and then I shall yield, because I know the Senator from Vermont has a most important point to discuss.

Mr. President, we asked the able Parliamentarian whether we could present to the Senate the proposed legislation which now is before the Senate as an amendment. The Parliamentarian indicated that, in his judgment, that would be in accordance with the rule. So that amendment is now before the Senate.

Let me read the amendment slowly to the Senate; it is not long. Then I shall be glad to attempt to answer questions.

Our amendment reads as follows:

SEC. 101. (a)(1) EQUAL RIGHTS.—Every member of a labor organization engaged in an industry affecting commerce shall have equal rights and privileges within such organization to nominate candidates, to vote in union elections or referendums, to attend membership meetings, and to participate in the deliberations and voting upon the business of such meetings, subject to reasonable rules and regulations in such organization's constitution and bylaws.

(2) FREEDOM OF SPEECH AND ASSEMBLY.—Every member of any such labor organization shall have the right to meet and assemble freely with other members and to express any views, arguments, or opinions, and to express at union meetings his views, upon candidates in a union election or upon any business properly before the union meeting, subject to the organization's established and reasonable rules pertaining to the conduct of meetings—

That language, we believe, lays down with clarity the rights which I believe all of us believe should be written into this legislation.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, may we have order? We cannot hear the Senator on this side of the room.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate is not in order. Senators wishing to converse will retire to the cloakroom. Members of the staff who are enjoying the privilege of the floor must maintain silence and decorum, so that the debate of the Senate can be understood by the Members of the Senate.

Does the Senator from California desire to yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. KUCHEL. I do, Mr. President.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I suggest an amendment, in this part of the amendment, by inserting a semicolon after the word "members" on line 9 of page 2 of the amendment. That is simply a clerical change. There ought to be no objection to that modification.

Mr. KUCHEL. There will not be any objection, and I accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California accepts the suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. KUCHEL. I yield to the able Senator from Kentucky, a distinguished coauthor of the amendment.

Mr. COOPER. I wish to call my question to the attention of the Senator from Arkansas. I think it is wise to make some legislative history on the point. I assume the purpose of placing a semicolon at that point is to assure, if there is any question about it, that the constitutional safeguards of free speech shall be preserved outside the union hall.

Mr. McCLELLAN. The purpose is to make certain that union members shall have freedom of speech not only in a union hall, but outside.

Mr. KUCHEL. I agree.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I understand the amendment has been accepted. Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California has accepted the modification proposed by the Senator from Arkansas and has made it a part of his amendment. The modification will be agreed to or disagreed to when the vote on the amendment of the Senator from California is acted upon.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Then, I understand my amendment is accepted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has been incorporated in the amendment of the Senator from California at this time, by his request.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, what is the situation as to the time? Who is in charge of the time for the opposition?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL] is in charge of the 30 minutes for the proponents of the amendment, and the Chair would presume the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] or the majority leader would be in charge of the opponents' time.

Mr. KUCHEL. Who is in charge of the opponents' time, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the majority leader is opposed to the amendment, he would be in charge of the time.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, the reason why I am asking these questions——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the majority leader is in favor of the amendment, then control of the time goes to the minority, first to the minority leader, or to a member of the committee who is opposed to the amendment, and subsequently to a member of the minority who is opposed to the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, does the Senator from California desire me to state my position at this time?

Mr. KUCHEL. Yes, because I would like to have some of the time used on the other side.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. We have plenty of time on the bill, and I will yield the Senator from California such time as he wishes. Does the Senator want time now?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, is the majority leader in control of the time in opposition?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Both the majority and the minority leaders are in favor of the amendment. The control of the time would be in charge of those who are in opposition.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The majority leader would not object if I controlled the time, would he?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. It would be all right with me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Since both the majority and the minority leaders are in favor of the amendment, a member of the committee who is opposed to the amendment——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I was under the impression that the Senator from Arizona was in favor of the amendment, but if he is against it, I shall be delighted to have him control the time in opposition. We have to designate a Senator, and we would have to designate a Senator who is qualified. First I should like to know if the Senator from Arizona qualifies as being opposed to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Chair may read the portion of the unanimous consent which is germane, it reads:

Provided, That in the event the majority leader is in favor of any such amendment or motion, the time in opposition thereto shall be controlled by the minority leader or some Senator designated by him.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, the majority leader has asked if I am against the amendment. I am not against all of it; I am against parts of it. If the Senator is opposed to all of it, he should control the time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The unanimous-consent agreement provides that if the majority leader is in favor of the amendment, as I am, then the time should be in control of the minority leader; and if the minority leader is in favor of the amendment, as he is, we should designate some Senator who is opposed to the amendment.

If the Senator from Arizona is opposed to it, and he wants to have the privilege of yielding time in opposition, I shall be glad to have him do so.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, I ask for the regular order. The Chair should observe the part of the unanimous-consent agreement he has read.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am opposed to the amendment in its present form.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. No such qualification is specified in the unanimous-consent agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the existing situation, the control of the time goes to the minority leader, who may designate another Senator if he so desires.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, simply to keep the record straight, the minority leader has not committed himself on this question, but, under the unanimous-consent agreement, he is entitled to control the time in opposition, and I will be more than delighted to yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from California yield?

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. KUCHEL. Not at the moment. I ask how much time I have utilized.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California has consumed 18 minutes of the 30 minutes allotted to him.

Mr. KUCHEL. Did the Chair include the last few minutes of the colloquy and the parliamentary inquiries?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The 18 minutes includes all of the colloquy.

Mr. KUCHEL. I ask unanimous consent that my side be given another 10 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I shall be glad to yield 5 minutes on the bill to the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas yields to the Senator from California 5 minutes of the time allocated on the bill.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, my parliamentary inquiry was to ascertain who is in charge of the time in opposition to the amendment. We on this side of the Chamber could not hear what was said. The minority leader did not say whom he had designated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The minority leader had the choice of designating a Senator to be in charge of the time, but did not do so.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. KUCHEL. I yield first to the Senator from Arizona for a parliamentary inquiry, and ask unanimous consent that it may come out of his time rather than mine.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, how much time is left on the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Considering the 5 minutes just yielded by the majority leader on the bill, there are 35 minutes remaining on the bill to the proponents and 46 minutes remaining to those in opposition.

Mr. GOLDWATER. If the Senator will yield for one more question to the majority leader, last night the majority leader, I believe, said we would be taken care of if the time ran out, and if we wanted time on the passage of the bill. We are getting down rather low on the time remaining on the bill. Did I hear the majority leader correctly?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes. I am always anxious that every Senator have whatever time he may need. Does the Senator want to add some time to the time for consideration of the bill at this moment, or shall we dispose of the amendment?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I merely wanted to have the Senator's assurance.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I can give the Senator only my assurance that I will never cut off any Senator's request for a reasonable extension of time on a unanimous-consent request.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator's assurance is all I need.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I now yield to the able Senator from Nebraska for a question.

Mr. CURTIS. I thank the Senator.

In the McClellan amendment, as it was agreed to, lines 3 to 6 on page 2 read:

> Every member of a labor organization engaged in an industry affecting commerce shall have equal rights and privileges within such organization, including

In other words, the language is all-inclusive, and provides equal rights and privileges.

In the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from California and his colleagues, it is provided that union members shall have equal rights and privileges within such organization to do certain specified things. In other words, the amendment provides equal rights limited to a few functions.

Mr. KUCHEL. I will answer by saying "No."

Mr. CURTIS. Why is it that the Senator has taken away from the workers as members of the same organization equal rights in everything?

Mr. KUCHEL. I would deny that that is what the authors have done or have intended to do.

To the contrary, Mr. President, it seemed to us that the language in the amendment of the able Senator from Arkansas, as printed on page 6475 of the RECORD, regarding any matter, was too broad, and that there are in this land of ours, for example, reasonable laws governing libel and slander. The rule of reason is what we sought to apply. By the language of our amendment, which is printed beginning on page 6693 of the RECORD, which I read just a few moments ago, we attempt to provide for the rule of reason with reasonable restraints on the right of free speech. To that extent we have changed the language.

Mr. CURTIS. Is it true that under the Senator's amendment there are some rights which are not granted equally to all members of the union?

Mr. KUCHEL. That would be true only if one of the courts of the United States, which was called upon to sit in judgment as to whether the rights were violated, determined that it was reasonable on the part of a specific labor organization to make such an excision.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President——

Mr. KUCHEL. I now yield to my friend from Vermont.

Mr. AIKEN. It was necessary to change the language so as to enable the unions to expel the known Communists and criminals, who would otherwise have been frozen in a position of equality with all other union members.

Mr. CURTIS. As I understand the language, then, it is a limitation of rights——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska will obtain permission from the Senator from California by asking him to yield before he addresses a question.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I should like to answer the question of my friend. I should like, with the indulgence of my colleagues, to read quickly the remainder of the proposed amendment, making some comments as to what changes have been made in the language, and then I shall yield, if I have time remaining.

I want Senators to understand the wording, and to hear some comments from those of us who believe it would be in the public interest to have the Senate agree to this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California declines to yield at this time, until he completes his statement. Members will please take their seats until the Senator completes his statement.

Mr. KUCHEL. I continue to read the amendment, from section (2):

> Provided, That the foregoing is limited so that nothing herein shall be construed to impair the right of a labor organization to adopt and enforce reasonable rules as to the responsibility of every member toward the organization as an institution and to refrain from conduct that would interfere with its performance of its legal or contractual obligations.

I think my answer to the able Senator from Nebraska at this point, at least, adequately shows why we inserted the language.

The next section is "(3) Freedom from arbitrary financial exactions."

I will say to the Senate that this language was taken almost verbatim from that part of the McClellan amendment which was applicable, except that we eliminated the so-called 75 percent maximum initiation fee, as is set forth in the latter part of that section of the McClellan amendment.

I can read the language very rapidly.

My friend from Arizona has suggested to me—he is sitting just across the aisle—that in the interest of time we can skip the reading of this section because apparently there will be no problem in connection with that language, at least from his standpoint.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of section (3) be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, section (3) was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

> (3) FREEDOM FROM ARBITRARY FINANCIAL EXACTIONS.—(A) The rates of dues and initiation fees payable by members of any such labor organization in effect on the effective date of this subsection shall not be changed, and no new or additional dues or initiation fees shall be imposed and no special or general assessment shall be levied upon such members, except (i) by a majority vote by secret ballot of the members in good standing present at a general or special meeting, after reasonable notice of the intention to vote upon such question, or (ii) by majority vote of the members in good standing voting in a referendum conducted by secret ballot through the mails, or (iii) in the case of a national or international labor orzanization, other than a federation of national and international organizations, by majority vote at a regular convention or a special convention held after not less than thirty days' written notice to the principal office of each local or constituent labor organization entitled to such notice.

Mr. KUCHEL. The next section is:

> (4) PROTECTION OF THE RIGHT TO SUE.—No such labor organization shall limit the right of any member or officer thereof to institute an action in any court, or in a proceeding before any administrative agency, irrespective of whether or not the labor organization or its officers are named as defendants or respondents in such action or proceeding, or the right of any member or officer of such labor organization to appear as a witness in any judicial, administrative, or legislative proceeding, or to petition any legislature or to communicate with any legislator: Provided, That any such member or officer may be required to exhaust reasonable hearing procedures (but not to exceed a six-month lapse of time) within such organization, before instituting legal or administrative proceedings against such organizations or any officer thereof: And provided further, That no employer or employer association shall directly or indirectly finance, encourage, or participate in, except as a party, any such action, proceeding, appearance, or petition.

Mr. President, in this section we have changed the 3-month provision of the amendment of the able Senator from Arkansas, to 6 months.

The next section is:

(5) SAFEGUARDS AGAINST IMPROPER DISCIPLINARY ACTION.—No member of any such labor organization may be fined, suspended, expelled, or otherwise disciplined except for nonpayment of dues by such organization or by any officer thereof unless such member has been (A) served with written specific charges; (B) given a reasonable time to prepare his defense; (C) afforded a full and fair hearing.

We believe, Mr. President, that language is clear and explicit, and provides the usual reasonable constitutional basis upon which charges might be brought. We believe further that the language in subdivision (6) of the amendment of the able Senator from Arkansas, upon which we voted the other night, did raise some rather vexing questions. For example, the McClellan amendment provided in part that there should be a final review on a written transcript of a hearing, by an impartial person or persons (i) agreed to by such organization and the accused, or (ii) designated by an independent arbitration or mediation association or board.

We believe that is cumbersome and unnecessary language. Since we have provided not merely for a criminal penalty but, in addition, for a civil right on the part of the aggrieved member to go to court, we believe that the U.S. district court will be able to determine whether the rights of the union member have been protected and whether he has had constitutionally reasonable notice and a reasonable hearing, and whether the matter has been reasonably disposed of.

Paragraph 6 reads as follows:

6. Any provision of the constitution and bylaws or other governing charter of any labor organization engaged in an industry affecting commerce which is inconsistent with the provisions of this section shall be of no force or effect.

Section 102 reads as follows:

SEC. 102. Any person whose rights secured by the provisions of this title have been infringed may bring an action in a district court of the United States for such relief as may be appropriate. Any such action against a labor organization shall be brought in the U.S. district court for the district where the alleged violation occurred, or where the headquarters of such labor organization is located.

As will be recalled from my earlier comments, here is one of the major changes in the proposal. The amendment of the Senator from Arkansas provided that the Secretary of Labor might, on behalf of the injured or aggrieved member, have the right to litigate the alleged grievance and to seek an injunction or other relief. We believe that giving this type of right to the aggrieved employee member himself is in the interest of justice, and therefore we propose to eliminate from the bill the right of the Secretary of Labor to sue in his behalf.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. KUCHEL I yield to my distinguished colleague from New York, who is a coauthor of the amendment.

Mr. JAVITS. I think it is very important to point out that the criminal penalties remain attached to the bill of rights as prepared. Any other conclusion is erroneous, for this reason:

The language on page 53, lines 14 to 23 of the bill, provides a criminal penalty for violation of any part of the law which will be enacted if this amendment is incorporated in the bill. I wish to make that very clear, because there is some misconception on the question whether the criminal penalties have been excised. They have been neither excised nor reduced. The penalty is $10,000 fine or 2 years imprisonment

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. KUCHEL. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. BUTLER. I invite the attention of the distinguished Senator to section 101(a)(1), under the title "Equal Rights."

The amendment enumerates certain specific rights. Ordinarily the enumeration of specific rights excludes other rights. Is it the opinion of the distinguished Senator from California that, there being nothing in the section referring to the right to run for office, every member of a labor organization who might be nominated from the floor would have such a right?

Mr. KUCHEL. I do not believe that in any fashion the equal rights section touches what the provisions of the consitution or bylaws might be with respect to the right to run for office.

In that connection, I should like to ask the author of the bill, the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], if he can shed any light on what may be in the bill with respect to that problem.

Mr. KENNEDY. As I understood the Senator's question, it was whether by limiting these rights we would exclude other rights.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. KENNEDY. Not at all.

Mr. BUTLER. If there is a provision in the charter of the labor organization providing that certain persons shall not have the right to hold office in the union, they would not have such right under the terms of the bill.

Mr. KENNEDY. That is an entirely different question. I wondered whether the Senator's question was directed to the proposition that, because certain rights may be enumerated in the bill, other rights were abridged.

Mr. BUTLER. I think ordinarily that would be true. Why is the situation any different in this case?

Mr. KENNEDY. I do not believe there is anything in the bill which would abridge other rights which would ordinarily be granted to a member of a labor organization or to a citizen of the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator from California yield to me in order that I may request the yeas and nays on his amendment, so that Senators may be on notice?

Mr. KUCHEL. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. KUCHEL. I yield to my friend the able Senator from Kentucky to respond to the question of the senior Senator from Maryland.

Mr. COOPER. The bill itself, in section 301, subsection (d), page 36, guarantees to every member of a union the right to be a candidate. I think that answers the question.

I think it important to state for the legislative history that the enumeration of the rights mentioned does not exclude other rights. It is so provided in another section of the amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, will the Senator from California yield on that point?

Mr. KUCHEL. I am grateful for the comment of the able Senator from Kentucky, who is a coauthor of the proposed amendment.

I now yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. As the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] previously pointed out, the bill of rights must be read in conjunction with the remainder of the bill. It is true that on page 36, beginning in line 13, we find the following language:

(d) In any election required by this section to be held by secret ballot a reasonable opportunity shall be given for the nomination of candidates and every member in good standing shall be eligible to be a candidate and to hold office (subject to reasonable qualifications uniformly imposed) and shall have the right to vote for or otherwise support, the candidate or candidates of his choice, without being subject to penalty, discipline, or improper interference or reprisal of any kind by such organization or any member thereof.

So other rights are guaranteed, in addition to the rights guaranteed in the bill of rights, and the general constitutional rights.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield on the point which has been raised?

Mr. KUCHEL. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. I invite the attention of the Senator from California to the fact that section 103 of his amendment contains a partial correction of any harm which might be done by the simple relation of certain rights under the section which deals with equal rights, or any catalog of details under any other section. Section 103 reads as follows:

Nothing contained in this title shall limit the rights and remedies of any member of a labor organization under any State or Federal law or before any court or other tribunal.

Mr. KUCHEL. I am grateful to the Senator for underlining and emphasizing that point, because I think it is an irrefutable answer.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one further observation?

Mr. KUCHEL. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. I think the Senator's conclusion may be a little more than section 103 would provide, because I notice that among the rights and remedies which are carefully preserved are only those which arise under State or Federal law, without any reference to those which arise under the charter and bylaws or regulations of the union. It seems to me that such reference should be added, to make complete the showing that nothing is excluded by the inclusion of the rights which are included, or the details which are included in any of these sections. I do not like to jump to conclusions, but it seems to me that such reference should properly be added, and I hope the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from California will at least consider the suggestion.

Mr. KUCHEL. I thank my friend.

I wish to yield to one of my good friends on the other side of the aisle. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts to bear in mind the point mentioned by the Senator from Florida, with respect to possibly finding in the bill language which would answer the Senator's question, or of proposing an amendment on the point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair advises the Senator from California that he has only 2 minutes remaining, including the 5 minutes yielded by the majority leader.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. KUCHEL. I yield 1 minute to the able junior Senator from Idaho.

Mr. CHURCH. I thank the Senator from California.

I have only one minute to express some views with respect to the pending amendment. I must say that, as a member of the select committee, I was strongly in favor of a bill of rights for the working people in organized labor unions, and I voted against the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Arkansas with great reluctance only because it contained provisions which would unduly harass and obstruct legitimate unionism, without contributing to the rights to which I felt the working people were entitled.

I have participated in this redraft, not for the purpose of weakening or limiting such rights, but only for the purpose of eliminating the unnecessary provisions which would only harass and obstruct the achievement of that end. I wish to commend the Senator from California and other Senators on the other side of the aisle who have participated in good faith in this undertaking. The redrafting of the bill has improved the guarantees of the fundamental rights which we were seeking to have included in the bill. We have not altered the objective sought by the distinguished Senator from Arkansas. I believe that the bill has not been weakened but, instead, improved for the benefit of working people and for the benefit of the public at large.

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield 3 minutes to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania is recognized for 3 minutes of the time previously yielded by the acting majority leader from the time on the bill.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, on behalf of the Members of the Senate on this side of the aisle who have participated in the drafting of the amendment, I should like to express our pride in the leadership furnished by the disitnguished Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL]. He has advanced his stature with all reasonable, clear-thinking people in the United States, regardless of party, by the courageous stand he has taken in assuming leadership on the pending amendment.

The amendment does five things, and the most important is that it protects the legitimate rights of the rank-and-file members of unions. It does that without, first, inadequate draftsmanship. The amendment is carefully drawn. Its predecessor was full of loopholes. Second, it does not contain union-busting provisions, as its predecessor did. Third, it does not permit any Communist infiltration into unions. Its predecessor did. Fourth, it takes the Federal bureaucracy out of this bill of rights and leaves its enforcement to union members, aided by the courts.

It is a good, sound amendment, which properly protects the rights of union members. The bill will be a better measure as a result. I am confident that if the amendment is adopted it will be a provision of which all of us can be proud.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I must disagree wholeheartedly with what the Senator has said—that my provision would accommodate any Communists in unions. I cannot remain silent when that kind of statement is made.

Mr. CLARK. I say to my friend that I am sure from the bottom of my heart he would not wittingly do anything which would have that effect, just as I am sure the original provision would have had certain other effects which, my friend from Arkansas will agree, were not foreseen. The amendment as originally drawn, in my opinion, would have made it easier, even though it was certainly not intended to have the effect now disclaimed. There is no Member of the Senate for whom I have higher regard than my friend from Arkansas. I believe the amendment now proposed is more effective in keeping Communists out of unions than was its predecessor. I repeat, there is no Member of the Senate for whom I have higher regard than the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield myself 2 minutes on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts is recognized for 2 minutes.

Mr. KENNEDY. I must disagree with my friend from Pennsylvania on this subject. I wish to make two points clear. In the first place, the Kennedy-Ervin bill would not be before the Senate today, and would not have been before the Senate last year, were it not for the Senator from Arkansas. Secondly, the amendment in its final language, if we are able to agree on it, would not be before us if it were not for the Senator from Arkansas.

It is possible that in the space of 24 hours or 48 hours, with the help of the Senator from Arkansas, some of the language may be rewritten and strengthened and improved, to make it better.

During the debate I had some question about the language of the original amendment, just as many Senators had some doubt about the language which I had offered. I should like to say to my friend from Pennsylvania that I do not believe the language of the original amendment would have permitted Communists to come into a union. It is possible that the language would not have been so effective as the redrafted language in that regard. The Senator from Arkansas has helped to strengthen and improve the language. It is in the public interest.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I do not believe I am an expert in the field of drafting legislative language. However, I yield to no man with respect to my convictions as to what is right and what is wrong. Even after 2 or 4 or 5 years one finds that it is always possible to improve on language in a measure. It is always possible to redraft it and to improve it according to new ideas. However, I cannot sit idly by and hear the insinuation made that I am trying to accommodate Communists.

Mr. CLARK. There is nothing further from my mind than any such insinuation on the character and ability and integrity of my friend from Arkansas. Subsection (k) dealt with members in good standing. As it was originally drafted, anyone was permitted to come into the union so long as he paid his dues. I am glad that provision was stricken.

Mr. KENNEDY. It was stricken in the sense that it was rewritten by the Senator from Arkansas, as well as other Senators.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Will a Senator yield me some time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMATHERS in the chair). The Chair announces that the opponents have 28 minutes remaining and that the Senator from California has 1 minute remaining on the amendment. What is the pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. McCLELLAN. Will a Senator yield me 1 minute?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes from the bill to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, I should like to discuss the equal rights provision and the free speech provision, and to point out to the Senate that the McClellan amendment guaranteed absolute equality of rights under the rules and regulations of the union. The provision in the substitute does not guarantee absolute equality of rights. No explanation has been given why the substitute provides that the rights shall be limited if the union so desires.

Second, on the subject of free speech, the McClellan amendment guaranteed the absolute right of free speech. The substitute limits the right of free speech. There can be no denial of the fact that, for some reason, the McClellan amendment was diluted to the point that equality of rights have been abbreviated and freedom of speech has been limited. My query of the proponents is why the equality of rights has been limited and why the right of free speech has been abridged. I wish someone would answer that query.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, may I be yielded some time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time is under regulation. Does the Senator from California yield time?

Mr. KUCHEL. I shall be glad to yield 1 minute to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky is recognized for 1 minute.

Mr. McCLELLAN. A few minutes ago, by unanimous consent, the distinguished Senator from California modified his amendment by inserting a semicolon after the word "members" on page 2, line 9. We find that the semicolon was erroneously inserted at that point. The semicolon should be inserted after the word "opinions" on page 2, line 10. I ask unanimous consent that the first modification be stricken and that the distinguished Senator from California accept the second modification of his amendment.

Mr. KUCHEL. I join in that request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the modification is made. The Senator from Kentucky has been yielded 1 minute.

Mr. COOPER. Will someone yield me 2 minutes?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky is utilizing his 1 minute to get 2 minutes. [Laughter.]

Mr. COOPER. I hope I will be successful. I address myself to the question asked by the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE]. He suggested that section 101 limits the right of union members, in comparison with the McClellan amendment. One provision reads "subject to reasonable rules and regulations in such organization's constitution and bylaws."

That is a procedural provision. It deals with the right of a private or a semiprivate organization to control its meetings by reasonable rules. But in the view of all of us who propose the amendment, it is not believed that this language on the proviso limits any substantive rights, contemplated and defined in the entire title or otherwise in the bill.

Mr. President, may I have one more minute?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I yield the Senator 2 minutes on the bill.

Mr. COOPER. This will be perhaps my only statement on the amendment. I am one of its cosponsors. When I voted "aye" on the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Senator McCLELLAN], I was perfectly aware that the amendment contained some provisions which I believed extreme. Yet, because I believe strongly in the rights involved—the constitutional principles which the McClellan amendment expressed, the rights guaranteed under the Bill of Rights—I considered that these principles overrode any objection I might have to certain provisions, which, in any event, could be corrected.

We have presented an amendment which I believe corrects the errors in the first amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas. Some Senators may believe that the amendment which we offer limits rights or derogates rights afforded by the McClellan amendment. I do not think so. It removes the extremes raised by the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas. It assures clearly the rights of members of a union.

As the distinguished Senator from California has said, there are two substantial changes to the McClellan amendment proposed by his amendment. First, it removes the power of the Secretary of Labor, and I may say his duty, to deal with the government of a union; second, is a change with respect to the availability of membership lists, which the Senator from New York at a later time will explain. I believe this is a good amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield time to me?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I must first yield to the Senator from Arizona. I have no choice in the matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona is recognized. The Senate is operating under a unanimous-consent agreement. The Senator from Illinois has control of the remaining time. Twenty-eight minutes are left.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona yield me 3 minutes, so that I may address some questions to the Senator from California?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am happy to do so.

Mr. HOLLAND. First, the Senator from California admitted a moment ago that he felt that the provisions of section 103 of the amendment should be amplified by adding certain words. I have asked counsel for the committee to prepare those words. I understand it is agreeable to the committee that the words be added. As drafted by the committee counsel, they would be added at the end of section 103, if that be agreeable to the Senator from California. The words are "or any union constitution or bylaws."

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment to the amendment may be approved, so that it will be quite clear that not only will State or Federal law be followed, but also, quite obviously and understandably, the constitution and bylaws of the organization.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I notice, from a careful checking of the bill with the committee counsel, that three of the provisions covered by the reporting requirement of the committee bill, found on page 6, designated as items (vii), (viii), and (ix), in lines 11, 12, and 13, are omitted from the so-called Kuchel amendment. I have been told by the drafting counsel that that omission was inadvertent, and that those items contained in the committee bill should be restored.

Mr. KUCHEL. The Senator is correct.

Mr. HOLLAND. May I ask the distinguished Senator from California if he will modify his amendment so as to restore those items?

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I ask that that be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I ask the indulgence of the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from California.

I voted for the McClellan amendment. I believe, in all honesty and sincerity, it is the only thing which has been added to the bill which really does anything good for the working people and the public. I would have liked to see it remain in the bill; but evidently it will not.

I shall discuss portions of the amendment now proposed.

I refer to page 2, paragraph 2: "Freedom of Speech and Assembly." I say to the Senator from California that I have grave misgivings as to the proviso clause. I think if it were eliminated, the "Freedom of Speech and Assembly" paragraph would be perfectly acceptable. It would be in accordance with the McClellan amendment language. The language now reads:

> Provided, That the foregoing is limited so that nothing herein shall be construed to impair the right of a labor organization to adopt and enforce reasonable rules as to the responsibility of every member toward the organization as an institution and to refrain from conduct that would interfere with its performance of its legal or contractual obligations.

I feel that the use of that language will leave the situation just as it is today. The language of the union constitutions sounds like democratic language, but it is not. We find, for instance, that 74 unions limit member criticism of officers and fellow members, and 15 unions prohibit the issuance of any literature emanating from members unless the consent of the national officers is received.

If that proviso is retained in the amendment, I say the unions could continue to write into their constitutions language to limit the actions of the membership; they could prevent the members from standing up in a meeting, for example, and saying they object to the union's backing a certain candidate in a political campaign.

I have two approaches to this matter.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield.

Mr. KUCHEL. For the sake of the legislative history, I may say there is no intention on the part of the proponents of the amendment to be done that of which the Senator from Arizona is apprehensive.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I may say, simply to make the matter completely clear, that I know, certainly, that they do not have that intention. I have an amendment to suggest. I will read it, to save time, if the Senators will pay attention.

On page 2, line 7 through line 20, I propose to strike out all of paragraph "(2)" and insert in lieu thereof:

(2) FREEDOM OF SPEECH.—Every member of any such labor organization shall have the right to express any views, arguments, or opinions regarding any matter respecting such organization or its officers, agents, or representatives, and to disseminate such views, arguments, or opinions either orally or in printed, graphic, or visual form without being subject to penalty, discipline, or interference of any kind by such organization—

This, I think, takes care of the fear of going too far—unless there has been a final determination by the courts, in a civil or criminal proceeding, that such utterance constituted an actionable or criminal defamation of such organization, or any of its officers, agents, representatives, or members.

Is the Senator from California willing to accept that amendment?

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield for a question.

Mr. CLARK. Would not the result of the amendment of the Senator from Arizona be the granting of an ex post facto right which could never be enforced until final judicial determination had been made? What concerns me about the form of the Senator's proposed amendment is that it may turn into a chaotic condition the normal operations of the union; whereas the amendment drafted by those of us who support the Senator from California does, in the proviso, as I am certain the Senator from Arizona knows, fix a limitation on enforcing reasonable rules as to the responsibility of every member toward the organization as an institution, to refrain from conduct which would interfere with the performance of its legal, contractual obligations.

In other words, our amendment requires that they go to court and prove that the restriction is unreasonable. But the amendment of the Senator from Arizona would say it was ipso facto unreasonable unless the court determined to the contrary.

Have I given a fair summary of the amendments?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I think so. But I think the same proviso could be included in the Senator's amendment.

Mr. CLARK. Does the Senator mean the same one, in reverse?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Yes; in reverse. However, the language is limited. The Senator includes the limiting qualification. We do not argue about the reasonableness. I know the Senator's source for that, and I think any reasonable man will recognize that. But the Senator proposes that they be given the right to do what they are doing today; I do not think that is reasonable.

Mr. CLARK. Again, I believe this matter involves a question of judgment on the part of what I hope are reasonable men.

On balance, I hope the Senator from California will not accept the amendment, although I agree that the Senator from Arizona can make a plausible case for it.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The other evening the Senate adopted—although not in a very decisive way—the McClellan amendment which I would say contains no provisos at all. Frankly, that is the way I should like to see the amendment remain.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Arizona will yield to me, let me say that I am reluctant to accept such an amendment.

Once again, I would say that every rule laid down in all these sections of the amendment is enforceable both through criminal action and through civil action. Therefore, if there is an unwarranted or unreasonable inhibition against the right of a union member, by his organization, he will have an opportunity to obtain redress in court. It seems to me—and I think all my colleagues will share this opinion—that that represents the finest means by which his rights may be protected.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I should like to continue.

If we were dealing with an organization in which membership was not compulsory——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GORE in the chair). The Senator from Arizona will suspend until the Senate is in order. The Senate is not now in order, and it must be in order before the Senator from Arizona may proceed. Half a dozen conversations are under way on the floor, and the galleries are not quiet.

Conversations on the floor will cease; Senators, other than the Senator who has the floor, will take their seats. The occupants of the galleries must be silent.

Now the Senator from Arizona may resume.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, if we were dealing with organizations in which membership was purely voluntary—for instance, business organizations, fraternal organizations, and so forth—I would hold with the Senator's argument. But we are dealing with organizations to which—in most cases—a man must belong if he is to work.

The argument that to interfere with the operations of such organizations would be wrong does not hold with me, because before the McClellan committee we have, for 2 years, found unions who abuse the rights of the American people.

Let me make perfectly clear that I believe that the great majority of unions can be absolved of all such charges. I know unions, and I know union people; and I have great respect for them. But I have no respect for those who abuse the rights of the American people.

As was stated on yesterday by the Senator from Ohio, there are 170 million people in our country, and probably 99.9 percent of them are perfectly law-abiding citizens. But there are laws by which we have to live.

Today in this country there is a denial of American rights in unions, only because some union constitutions contain provisions which make it possible for the democratic rights of the union members to be denied.

I am undertaking to point out that if the proviso remains in the amendment, the effect of the amendment will be that we shall not change anything that has allowed the disturbances which have been disclosed in the course of the investigations by the McClellan committee.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am happy to yield.

Mr. KUCHEL. A specific apprehension comes to my mind, after having read and reread the language of the amendment of the Senator from Arizona, along with the language of the amendment of the junior Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS]. Suppose a union member committed an infraction of the reasonable rules of his union organization. For instance, suppose his conduct were unbecoming. It would be perfectly reasonable to prevent that member from continuing his unwarranted conduct, whatever it might be. I very greatly fear that the language proposed by the Senator would permit that union member to say, "You cannot touch me for what I do or say"—even if every court in the land would say he was conducting himself in an unbecoming manner.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I may say that we are not talking about conduct.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona yield to me for 1 minute?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield.

Mr. ALLOTT. I should like to have the attention of the Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL].

I do not think any Senator will disagree with me when I say that a union has a right to make reasonable rules for the conduct of its members, and so forth—for instance, rules against improper or undesirable conduct; for example, if a union member comes in drunk, or if he raises cain all the time, and so forth.

The one thing about which I am concerned, and about which my friend, the Senator from Arizona is concerned, is that the term "reasonable" would include the proposition that a member could not criticize his union or the officers of his union or could not oppose the officers in an election—in short, that he could not openly criticize the officers or the conduct of the union's business; that he could not engage in such criticism either in or out of the union hall.

I realize that the Senator proposes to include a provision which would make such criticism in the union hall permissible.

But if the union's rules prohibit such criticism—and the Senator from Arizona says that the rules of 74 unions do—I would be opposed to this proposal. That is where the real rub comes in connection with this matter.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona yield to me?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I am sorry that I do not have time to yield further. I regret that our time for the discussion of so important a subject is so greatly limited. I think it a great crime that the Senate has to rush through its consideration of this measure, with only half an hour allowed to a side for debate on these amendments, when we are determining the fate of millions of American working people.

I should like to refer to the language of the amendment, as follows:

> Every member of any such labor organization shall have the right to express any views, arguments, or opinions.

That provision does not guarantee the right of a union member to attend an evening meeting at his church, when no other members of his union are present, and there say, "I do not like to have my union back Tom Smith for this particular union office." In my opinion, the language proposed would not guarantee that right to a union member. In other words, the proposed language guarantees the union member freedom of speech in the union hall, at meetings of union members, but does not give him such a guarantee in connection with meetings outside the union hall.

My friend has indicated that he will not accept my amendment.

Again—because we are operating under what I call an almost severe time limit—I wish to proceed.

I have an amendment on page 2, in line 14, as follows: Strike out the colon, and insert a period in lieu thereof; and strike out the words beginning with "Provided," down through the period in line 20. That would remove the proviso.

I should like to ask the Senator from California to state his thoughts on that proposal.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, first, will the Senator from Arizona yield to me?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am glad to yield.

Mr. CLARK. While the sponsors of the Kuchel amendment are considering the suggestion which has just been made by the Senator from Arizona—and which, frankly, I think goes too far—I wonder whether we could achieve the same result, to the extent that it is desirable, by rewriting the proviso as follows:

> Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to impair the right of a labor organization to adopt and enforce reasonable rules.

And then insert: "Not inconsistent with the provisions of this title as to the responsibility of every member toward the organization."

And then include the language following as it now stands.

It seems to me that would meet the fear the Senator from Arizona has, and really would cover the matter fairly well.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The 15 minutes allotted to the Senator from Arizona have expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I yield the distinguished Senator 10 additional minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona is yielded 10 additional minutes.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time required to bring about order in the Chamber be not charged to either side. That is a unanimous-consent request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request is not necessary. The preservation of order is supposed to be automatic in the Senate Chamber.

The Chair advises the occupants of the galleries that they are guests of the Senate. This is not a place where they are expected to conduct casual conversations. They are here to observe and witness the conduct of the U.S. Senate. The Chair requests the observance of decorum by the guests.

The Senator from Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I wish to refer to another part of the amendment. I ask my friend the Senator from California or any one of the sponsors——

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield so we may know whether our minds have met on the proviso?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I do not know what it means, frankly.

Mr. CLARK. It is an amplification of what is already on page 4, line 14. It merely buttons it up in connection with the proviso under discussion.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I do not agree that it does anything. It is the type of language which somebody once described as gobbledygook. I think that is pretty much what it is. If the sponsors of the amendment do not want to accept my amendment, very well. I think the insertion of the semicolon has done some good, but my objection to the amendment will remain and, frankly, will constitute my reason for voting against the substitute.

Mr. President, as time is running out, I wish to turn to page 4 of the amendment, and invite the attention of the Senator from California to line 4, page 4:

> That no employer or employer association shall directly or indirectly finance, encourage, or participate in, except as a party, any such action, proceeding, appearance, or petition.

I think that is a good provision. I agree with the Senator from California, which may surprise him.

Mr. KUCHEL. No; it does not surprise me. I think the Senator from Arizona is one Member of the Senate who deserves the salute of all of us for the constant attention he has given in this field.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I thank the Senator.

I ask the Senator from California if he would accept an amendment in the form of an addition; on page 4, at the end of line 6, before the period, to add the following words: "unless such employer has no dispute, controversy, contract, connection, or relationship of any kind in any area of activity, with the labor organization against which such action or proceeding has been or is being brought by such member."

Let us say a businessman is a neighbor of a union member, and he is trying to finance him. The businessman has no dispute with his neighbor. He may be in business in another community. If the language proposed were to apply, it would prevent such a laboring man from being financed by his friend, the employer.

I do not think my request is an unreasonable one. I think it would add strength to the provision which has been proposed.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am happy to yield.

Mr. CLARK. It occurs to me that, while I certainly recognize the good motives of the Senator from Arizona, the addition to the proviso might well open up an undesirable loophole. The instance cited by the Senator from Arizona is a legitimate one to raise; but, on the other hand, would it not be possible for an employer or association of employers who just did not like unions generally to finance the activities which they are forbidden to finance or encourage merely because, as a matter of philosophy——

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am not talking about an association in my amendment. I say "employer." I refer to a case in which a man who lives next door, or is a friend of the workingman, offers to finance him.

Mr. CLARK. I understand. As the Senator from Tennessee knows, I had the privilege of listening to the president of the United States Steel Corp. testify before the Antitrust and Monopoly Subcommittee. He is a fine American and a great businessman, but he just does not believe in unions. From where he sits, perhaps he is right. I would not want him to finance his neighbor in order to break up a union to which he belonged.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Contrary to what my friend may think, I not only believe in unions; I want them to get bigger and better. I object to the way some of them are run. I would not, for that reason, and for the fear that somebody might dislike a union, want to preclude a friend from using funds which would come under the purview of this section. I want to give him the freedom to use the funds.

Mr. CLARK. I am speaking as only one of the sponsors. I dare say it is no secret that this colloquy will enable my colleagues to determine what they want to do. I think I am right, but if my colleagues desire to accept the amendment of the Senator from Arizona, I would have no serious objection to accepting his amendment.

Mr. GOLDWATER. While the Senators in this part of the Chamber are deciding on the language, I wish to state that the Senator from California did not finish reading his amendment to title II, Reporting by Labor Organizations. It contains the language which is contained in the committee bill, I certainly have no objection to it. I make that statement so the Senator from California will not need to read it.

May I now ask to what conclusion my friend has come about my suggested change?

Mr. KUCHEL. I say this, Mr. President, that language is not sufficiently clear to the coauthors of the amendment who are in this part of the Chamber at present for me to stand up and say, "We accept it."

The sentence we are discussing, which my friend from Arizona would like to amend by adding more words to it, reads:

No employer or employer association shall directly or indirectly finance, encourage, or participate in, except as a party, any such action, proceeding, appearance, or petition.

That is all that clause states. In other words, it would be an unfair practice, it would be against the law, for an employer or an employer association, directly or indirectly, to spend any money or otherwise to get into that type of situation, unless it were a party. Is that not good public policy?

I do believe we ought not to clutter up that language. It is clear. The provision is an attempt to protect a union member who may be engaged in a dispute with the organization. My colleagues would not want me to accept the amendment.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Let me ask another question. Let us suppose the man to whom we are giving these rights has no money to enable him to go to court, has no money with which to finance a suit, but has a friend, who is an employer, who says, "John, I will lend you the money to go into court—but wait a minute; I cannot do it, because no employer can do it." Are we not tampering with the basic right of a man to borrow a dollar or two from a friend?

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield.

Mr. MUNDT. It seems to me he could not go to any bank, either, if the bank is an employer.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator from South Dakota has made a good point. He could not go to a bank to borrow the money, because the bank would be an employer. In fact, the union member could not borrow it from his own union, because his union is an employer.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. It occurs to me that we ought to make very clear at this point, by the legislative history, if my friend will indulge me, that the somewhat strained construction of the word "employer" which has been given in the last colloquy is not intended by anybody to apply, and that certainly an employee could go to a bank to borrow money for his defense, and there should not be a shadow of doubt about it.

Mr. MUNDT. Could the Senator from Pennsylvania tell us of a bank which is not an employer?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Under this language the union member could not do it.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, if the Senator from Arizona will yield, it has been suggested by the senior Senator from New York that the word "interested" could be added in line 4, after the word "no", so as to make the language read, "no interested employer or employer association." If the Senator would accept that amendment, with the legislative history which has been developed, I think it would solve his problem.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Will the Senator explain what that means?

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator will yield, I think it would clearly mean the language would not include a bank.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I understand what it means, but we want to make a legislative history. I want the proponents of this interesting word "interested" to explain it.

I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. I have in mind the fact that an employer who has an interest in the litigation ought not to bring pressure upon a union. In the eventuation of a relationship of the litigant to the union, an interested employer should not be a party to finance the suit.

We ourselves are so against antibarratry statutes that I do not want to be a party to a law which would prevent a union member from finding a friend, who happens to be an employer of people in a totally unrelated business, a bank or anything else, to loan him the money. We should not have a law to make it impossible to borrow from a friend to start a suit.

Mr. ALLOTT. May I ask a question, for the legislative history?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield.

Mr. ALLOTT. Including the word as the Senator has used it, in the opinion of the Senator would the language include "any" employer? Let us assume that the employer is in the general grocery business. Would the word "interested" include any other employer?

Mr. JAVITS. I think it probably would if the litigation involved the union in the whole line of business, because the words of art are "employer or employer association."

Again we have a balance of convenience. Neither side ought to trim this, and that is why I have given the legislative history.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, there are 3 minutes remaining on the amendment. I yield to the distinguished Senator from Arizona 5 minutes, of which 2 minutes will be from the time on the bill and 3 minutes from the time on the amendment.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I do not need 5 minutes. Two minutes will be sufficient.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield the Senator 3 minutes, then.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona has been yielded 3 minutes.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I am very sorry the sponsors of the amendment cannot agree with my amendments which relate to freedom of speech and assembly. I think the language they propose will continue to allow certain unions to abuse their membership. I fear that retaining the proviso clause in the freedom of speech and assembly provision will furnish an open door to the continuation of the abuses which we have seen, other language in the bill notwithstanding.

I believe, indeed I know, honestly, that the Senators who have sponsored the amendment have done so with the idea that they are being of extreme help. I was perfectly willing to see stricken from the McClellan amendment those provisions of which our southern friends were fearful but I did not know that such a hatchet job was going to be done. I thought we would apply a fine scalpel, in order to get along with our friends from the South on a reasonable objection. I am sorry this has gone as far as it has.

I am sorry also, Mr. President, that such a precedent is being established for getting around a motion to lay on the table a motion to reconsider. I think we are going to regret it. I can see for the future no validity in a Senate vote to lay a motion to reconsider on the table. We are doing something today which we will regret, not only with regard to the substance of the proposed legislation, but with regard to the substance of what we are doing. We are developing a new "gimmick" to get around a legislative act which has been decided. I, as a Senator, want no part of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time on the amendment has expired.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield me a half minute?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I yield a half minute, from the time on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas is recognized for a half minute.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I will say to the distinguished author of the amendment, he should delete the provision about the employer and the limitation on a man borrowing money. Every one of us knows that such a provision is unconstitutional. We should take the language out. It makes no sense to say to a man, by law, "You cannot borrow money."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York is recognized for 2 minutes.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I think it has been clear in this debate that all the Senate is trying to do is to be mature. Everybody knows the Senate could reach the same result by many methods, including a motion to recommit the bill. All of us, those who voted against the McClellan amendment, as well as those who voted for it, recognize that the McClellan amendment has to be cleaned up properly. I think we are adult enough not to wait until the bill gets to a conference, or to make that a reason why the other body will not act on the proposed legislation at all.

Let those who are so vehement about the bill of rights ask themselves, What do we want, an issue or a law? I want a law. That is why I have done what I have done. I thought that the balance of convenience in civil liberties was greater than the balance of convenience in the bill of rights, because the whole

Kennedy bill is a bill of rights. We can add something or subtract something if we wish.

Mr. President, we are trying to perfect this language, so that it will do everything the Senator from Arkansas wanted to do, but also will make sure it does not do more, because if it did more, it could destroy the bill, and could make the Secretary of Labor run every union.

Mr. President, I point out that if we let the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas stand as it is, the provision with respect to initiation fees, which are fixed by the union, would require an amendment by the U.S. Congress to enable any union to change its initiation fee from 75 percent or less of a week's wages to more, even if it were a highly desirable thing to do. We assumed no such result. We did not want to have such a result, yet that is what we are facing.

Mr. President, it seems to me a reasonable approach is being taken, within the confines of law, to accomplish what we are trying to accomplish.

Mr. President, I say to those who talk about free speech that under the Constitution of the United States free speech is not license. Supreme Court Justice Holmes laid down the proposition long ago that it might be free speech to get up in a movie theater and to yell "Fire," but that we could prevent it by law. What would our colleagues do? Would our colleagues have us allow a union member to get up at a union meeting and yell "Fire"? Would our colleague say that is free speech?—because that is what we are asked to write into the bill. That is nonsense, and we know it. Of course, all freedom has to be subject to proper and reasonable rules of procedure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from New York has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I yield 1 more minute to the distinguished Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. Who determines what is reasonable? That is determined by the same body which always determines such questions in American public life—the court. The courts determine whether a driver is reasonable when he hits a pedestrian. The courts determine whether somebody acted reasonably in the commission of a crime. The court determines what is reasonable every day. The court will do so in this instance. We have lodged the power where it belongs.

Finally, Mr. President, the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from California, for himself and his colleagues, does not deal with union lists. I assure Senators that, if recognition may be obtained we have a way whereby the union lists will be made fully and freely available to anyone who ought to have them, without fear of action against him, for proper uses. I shall have the honor to propose such an amendment as soon as the Senate has taken action on the bill of rights amendment, but I wish to emphasize that this is all a part of the same package. It has been through the screening of the distinguished Senator from Arkansas and of many colleagues on this side, many distinguished lawyers, I humbly submit it will satisfy my colleagues.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from New York has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER].

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the sponsors of the amendment a few question.

First, I wish to congratulate the sponsors of the amendment on the amendment they have presented, leaving out section 103, which, as has been stated, would put the Secretary of Labor in the middle of the actions of every labor union in the United States and give him the right to institute suits at his will. It would be very difficult to carry on management-labor relations in the public interest if an unthoughtful Secretary of Labor wished to interfere. This section, plus the absence of a requirement for jury trials, were the principal reasons I voted against the McClellan amendment.

The particular question I wish to ask is this: Whereas the McClellan amendment contained a provision for penalties, with respect to which I thought some of the language was a little harsh, I do not find any direct provision in this amendment for penalties, except that section 102 gives the members rights to certain actions. I suppose section 506 of the original McClellan amendment contains provisions for penalties, and that it is intended that the penalty provisions shall apply to this section.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. That is correct. That is why no specific penalty section was inserted in the amendment. If the Senator will refer to section 506, he will see that it refers to violations of the act, and, of course, the bill of rights title will be a part of the act. The penalty provision is intended to apply.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Subsection (c) of section 506 provides as follows:

> Any person who shall willfully violate the provisions of this section shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than 2 years, or both.

Is it intended that the words "this section" include also the new amendment which has been presented?

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator will indulge me, I will obtain a copy of the amendment.

Mr. KEFAUVER. If not, I suggest that the Senator from Massachusetts consider enlarging the expression "this section" to "this act."

I hope the sponsors of the bill will consider the language, to be sure that the words "this section" apply to the new amendment which has been presented.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Tennessee has expired.

All time on the amendment has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, for the purpose of some clarification of language which was agreed upon, I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Florida on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida is recognized for 2 minutes.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Florida a question as a matter of legislative history.

Mr. HOLLAND. I have only 2 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida declines to yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I should like to address two inquiries to the distinguished Senator from California.

I share the concern of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] with respect to the proviso in subsection (2) of section 101, but since nothing has been worked out along the lines suggested, it seems to me that something would be accomplished if the words beginning at the end of line 14, "the foregoing is limited so," were stricken.

Mr. KUCHEL. And one of the "thats."

Mr. HOLLAND. That is correct. If those words are not stricken it would appear that a limitation had been set up on the freedom of speech and assembly provided for earlier.

Mr. KUCHEL. I join my colleague, the Senator from Florida, in asking unanimous consent that on page 2, at the end of line 14, the words "the foregoing is limited so that" be stricken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HOLLAND. My second inquiry relates to a matter of draftsmanship pure and simple. I understand that the draftsmen who have handled the preparation and presentation of the amendment are agreed that on page 2, at the beginning of line 19, the word "refrain" should be stricken and the words "his refraining" be inserted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the request?

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment recommended be accepted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment is agreed to.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from California, as amended.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold his suggestion for a moment?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Certainly.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I wish to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I wish to make certain that the modification requested by the distinguished Senator from California a moment ago was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was agreed to.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I renew my suggestion of the absence of a quorum.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold that suggestion in order that I may submit a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield for the purpose of a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator must first withhold his suggestion of the absence of a quorum.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I am glad to do so.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, my parliamentary inquiry is whether or not the amendment suggested on page 4, to insert the word "interested" after the word "no," was agreed to, or whether the Senator from California accepted it.

Mr. KUCHEL. Indeed I did, and do.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I renew my suggestion of the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Green	Morse
Allott	Gruening	Morton
Anderson	Hart	Moss
Bartlett	Hartke	Mundt
Beall	Hayden	Murray
Bennett	Hennings	Muskie

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment, as modified, offered by the Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL], on behalf of himself and other Senators. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I hope the Chair will undertake to maintain order throughout the yea and nay vote, so we can hear Senators as they respond to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair appreciates the suggestion. Members of the Senate will take their seats. The Chair is not advised that the persons standing in the rear of the Chamber have been requested to aid the Senate. The clerk will not proceed with the call of the roll until the Senate is in order. The Senate will be in order. The clerk will proceed to call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] are absent on official business.

I also announce that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. BIBLE] is absent because of a death in his family.

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR] is absent because of illness.

On this vote, the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ] is paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY]. If present and voting, the Senator from New Mexico would vote "nay," and the Senator from Minnesota would vote "yea."

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. BIBLE] would vote "yea."

Mr. KUCHEL. I announce that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] is necessarily absent, and is paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] who is also necessarily absent. If present and voting, the Senator from New Hampshire would vote "nay," and the Senator from Wisconsin would vote "yea."

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CARLSON] is absent on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 77, nays 14, as follows:

So the amendment, as modified, offered by Mr. KUCHEL on behalf of himself and other Senators was agreed to.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I move that the vote by which the amendment was agreed to be reconsidered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield myself half a minute. I think we owe the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN] a great debt of gratitude for having pointed up this very important section which has just been added to the bill and for having contributed much of the language which is in the bill.

At the same time, I express my appreciation to the distinguished Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL] and the Senators associated with him, who have helped the Senate to bring about this action today. I think this is a proud moment for the Senate.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I should like to have the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] to discuss a matter relating to the amendment just agreed to.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield to me for a moment?

Mr. ERVIN. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield myself 1 minute on the bill.

Mr. President, this very body which functions this afternoon is a product of a compromise made more than 170 years ago. I think it points up the fact that the country has gone forward and that results have been achieved by considering legislation as the art of the possible. It is a case of beating out hard truths on the anvil of discussion and controversy.

I would be derelict in my duty if, among other things, I did not direct attention to the fact that the distinguished Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] has been most diligent in his duties in the Senate and has taken one great burden here, together with other members of the committee.

I happen to serve on the committee also. I know that he was in his place always when the committee was meeting. I could not say quite as much for myself, because I had other duties. I pay the junior Senator from Arizona and all other members of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare on our side and on the other side a high compliment. But I must single out for special mention the Senator from Arizona because of his fidelity to the cause represented by the bill and the diligence with which he has pursued it. I think his efforts in behalf of a good bill have been productive of many improvements before the bill should leave the Senate and go to another body for further refinement.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I have been advised that the distinguished senior Senator from New York wishes to offer an amendment germane to the matters just considered. For that reason I withdraw the request I made a moment ago.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I am very grateful to my colleague.

I call up my amendment which is at the desk, and which is part of the package that is before us.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 35, in line 18, it is proposed to strike out the word "Such"; and on the same page it is proposed to strike out all of lines 19 through 24; and, on page 36, in line 1, it is proposed to strike out the words "labor organization", and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

Such labor organization and its officers shall be under a duty, enforcible at the suit of any bona fide candidate for union office in the district court of the United States in which such labor organization maintains its principal office, to comply with all reasonable requests of any candidate to distribute by mail or otherwise at the candidate's expense campaign literature in aid of such person's candidacy to all members in good standing of such labor organization and to refrain from discrimination in favor of or against any candidate with respect to the use of lists of members: Provided, also, That whenever such labor organization or its officers authorize the distribution by mail or otherwise to members of campaign literature on behalf of any candidate or of the labor organization itself with reference to such election, similar distribution at the request of any other bona fide candidate shall be made by such labor organization and its officers, with equal treatment as to the expense of such distribution.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMATHERS in the chair). How much time does the Senator from New York yield to himself?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield to myself 10 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, the amendment I have proposed is, in substance, printed and before all Members of the Senate; it is substantially the amendment which has been printed, and was intended to be proposed by the Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL] and is identified as "4–24–59–B." The Senator from California has very graciously allowed me to propose the amendment, inasmuch as I suppose it is fair to say that I am the author of the idea; and, also, I suppose he is a little tired, as a result of the recent debate.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. KUCHEL. I wish to say to my colleagues that JACK JAVITS deserves a special vote of thanks for the brain functioning which has produced the amendment which now is before us, and which completes the solution of a very knotty problem.

JACK, congratulations.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank my colleague.

Mr. President, to explain the amendment, let me say that it requires that if anyone in a union has the use of lists or the use of mailings or circulars, then, on similar terms and conditions, anyone else who is a bona fide candidate shall have the same use. Such a provision will take care of insurgents, and at the same time it will take care of those who are not candidates, but who simply are trying to obtain a union list.

The amendment will apply equally to an incumbent president of a union who, without regard to what the union's regulations may be, will have the list, as we know, and to anyone else who is a serious candidate for the same office.

The amendment which was printed, as I have described, includes, for all practical purposes, everything set forth in the pending amendment, which has just been read, except at the end of my amendment, which is pending, we have added the reverse of the negative proposal that there shall be no discrimination. We provide that everyone shall have an equal opportunity, upon the payment of the costs of mailing. At the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT], we have added the reverse of that provision—namely, provision for the affirmative duty of a union organization, if it offers a mailing, to accommodate everyone who is a serious candidate.

I have done my utmost to talk about the amendment to all Senators who sponsored the so-called package amendment, but it has been impossible to get a literal approval from all of them. I am offering the amendment in my own name; but I believe that substantially it represents our common point of view.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield to me?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. McCLELLAN. In the pending amendment, as contrasted to the language which this amendment would supplant, will the right of a candidate to obtain a list be preserved?

Mr. JAVITS. I preserve——

Mr. McCLELLAN. I should like to have a "yes" or a "no" answer, please.

Mr. JAVITS. In the amendment, I preserve the right that he shall not be discriminated against—in other words, if anyone gets the list, he will get the list.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Does the Senator consider the situation in the case of an officer already in office? He would have the list; he would have custody of it. Would someone who was not in office, and who undertook to run for office, get the list, too?

Mr. JAVITS. My amendment would have a court make a practical solution of the problem of, on the one hand, seeing to it that union lists are not abused and, on the other hand, seeing that every legitimate candidate, regardless of whether he is an incumbent, has the same right. That is the solution I have devised.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I understand. I think I understand what caused a problem about this matter; there was apprehension that a person might become a candidate and then might use the list for improper purposes.

Mr. JAVITS. Exactly.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I am concerned about that, too. Certainly I do not want that situation to be abused, if that can be avoided.

But I am also concerned with situations in which incumbent officers are, as a result of some practices which we have found to prevail in certain unions, able to perpetuate themselves in office, by doing the very thing that, under these circumstances, could be done. The one who was in office would know how to line up his forces, and so forth; but a candidate who was not in office would not have a list and would not have all that information. This amendment would simply permit him to send his campaign material to the union and have the union mail it out.

I understand that the candidate could go to a court and, unless he received the list, could show that he was being discriminated against; and then the court would require that he be given a list, if he was a legitimate candidate.

Mr. JAVITS. Yes. In other words, if he were a legitimate candidate, the court would order—in order to avoid discrimination—that a copy of the list be given to him.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GORE in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. SCOTT. The Senator from New York has been so gracious as to state that I have suggested some of the wording of the amendment, in the interest of protecting equality of rights for everyone. In other words, if a candidate has actually distributed campaign literature to the union membership, this amendment will establish the right of any other candidate to that union office to have the union make available to him the distribution of his campaign literature, so that all the candidates will have their literature presented equally to the union members; and if the distribution of the literature of one candidate is made without charge, then the distribution of the literature of the other candidates will likewise be made without charge; they will be entitled to equal treatment. On the other hand, if one candidate is charged for the distribution of his campaign literature, the other candidates will have to pay the same cost or charge for the distribution of their campaign literature.

Mr. JAVITS. That is correct; and I thank the Senator from Pennsylvania for his participation in the preparation of the amendment.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield to me?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. MUNDT. I should like to ascertain whether the amendment provides some protection for a dissident group which would go into court, and then would find that while it was before the court, the election was held—in other words, that the election was held before the members of the group obtained the list.

The Senator from New York is a very careful draftsman; and I believe he should include a provision to take care of such a contingency, inasmuch as the processes of the courts are slow, and such a development would not be very satisfactory.

Mr. JAVITS. In this respect, I must rely upon the tradition of our jurisprudence, namely, that when there is danger of the loss of a remedy as a result of the passage of time, the court—whether Federal, State, or local—is generally found to act. I know of very few instances in which it can properly be charged that that has not been done.

I wrestled with the idea; but I came to the conclusion that any provision on this point which we might include would not improve on what we have already provided to preserve that right. I know that in political elections, courts often act within 5 hours, because such prompt action is necessary.

So, although there might be exceptions—I cannot state that there would not be—I believe that we have a right to assume that courts will follow the rule of reason—namely, that once the right to go into court is provided, the judicial proceedings will be conducted with reasonable speed.

Mr. MUNDT. What the Senator from New York says is very plausible. Of course, if it were not for the fact that there are utterly corrupt unions, we would not now be dealing with this matter at all. What we have to assume here is that we are setting up a protective mechanism against corrupt officials being installed in office. Since they have that power in a hypothetical case, I want to deny it to them. I am afraid they can rig elections, shorten campaign times, and make it practically impossible for an honest, diligent court to hear both sides of the question and arrive at an appropriate verdict.

A notorious situation now exists wherein the president of the International Teamsters' Union is seeking to hold an election quickly, which the monitors and the court are stopping him from holding. I think that we should stop a situation in which a corrupt group of union leaders can have a quick election held, and that we should provide the kind of remedy which I know the Senator is seeking to provide.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I yield myself another 5 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. JAVITS. In my amendment, I make it the responsibility and duty of the labor organization and its officials. At the very least, I believe it would be a duty which would be actionable for remedies even in the event of the impossibility of a court being able to catch up with the organization. I make that statement not because I do not believe a court will act, and act in time, but here is an effort to place this affirmative duty on the union officer.

Mr. President, my proposal is the best one I have been able to devise on this subject. I have used all the ingenuity I possess, and this is the best I have been able to come up with.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. PROUTY. May I ask the Senator if the amendment changes in any way the existing right, under the provisions of the bill, for an incumbent officer to send through the mails, at union expense, so called factual statements of issues?

Mr. JAVITS. What the Senator has reference to goes to a totally different section of the bill, which the Senator from Vermont or any other Senator is perfectly free to try to amend. That provision is not affected by my amendment. The Senator from Vermont has reference to page 38, line 5, of the bill. My amendment deals only with the provisions on pages 35 and 36.

Mr. PROUTY. Is there at the present time any criminal sanction imposed for violations of any of the provisions in the election sections of the bill? Several days ago I maintained that was true. I still think it is true. I cannot find a single penalty provided for violations, unless the violation involves coercion, reprisals, and so forth.

Mr. JAVITS. I may say to the Senator that the generic provision with respect to criminal penalties is found on page 53 of the bill. That provision deals with force, violence, economic reprisals, and so forth. If the Senator feels that provision should be buttressed, he is at liberty to attempt to do so. Nothing I am proposing in my amendment would prejudice such a proposal.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. Yes, of course.

Mr. CURTIS. The amendment of the Senator from New York raises a problem in my mind. It presumes that an insurgent candidate is more apt to give a membership list to a commercial firm or individual than an incumbent officer.

A while ago I received a communication from a man who had been expelled from a union and had lost his job because he had been a party to a lawsuit growing out of an election. I have obtained a copy of the petition and writs in the court in Kansas City. I find that one man has held the office of business manager, treasurer, and corresponding secretary for 20 years. Why is it the membership list is entrusted to an incumbent officer, while a possible opponent cannot have free access to inspect and copy the list? Why is the incumbent a better guardian of the privacy of the list than any other individual?

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, the Senator has asked a number of questions. I will start by taking the last one first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from New York has expired.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I yield myself 1 additional minute, in order to answer the question.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield 1 minute to myself in order to answer the question.

Mr. CLARK. I hope the Senator will save some time.

Mr. JAVITS. I will.

Mr. President, I think I have 9 minutes remaining, after yielding 1 minute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. JAVITS. When a union has elected an officer, it has vested in him many responsibilities—funds, reputation, direction, and so forth, including the list. My amendment seeks to equalize the situation when it comes to election time.

I point out that the bill of rights which the Senate adopted related to rights and duties, and one of the provisions provided for periodic elections. So if the bill is passed, the type of situation to which the Senator has made reference could not exist.

Mr. President, I conclude by saying that, without pride of authorship, and without much collaboration, we have endeavored to deal with a very difficult situation, which everybody, including my friend from Arkansas, agrees was difficult.

I hope the Senate will see fit to make the amendment a part of the proposed law. I think it provides a desirable reform.

Mr. President, I now yield 3 minutes to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania is recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I commend the Senator from New York for bringing before the Senate his amendment, which I think is a helpful one. I would like to have the Members of the Senate, and others who read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, know that this amendment is similar in intention, and I think similar in effect, to the amendment which was identified as 4–24–59–B, which was offered last night by the same bipartisan group which offered the amendment to the McClellan amendment, and which I am confident has the same bipartisanship and the same bipartisan support.

I have compared carefully the working of the amendment identified as 4–24–59–B, of which five Senators on this side of the aisle are cosponsors, with the wording of the amendment of the Senator from New York. I find no substantial difference either in intent or in effect. Therefore, not only am I glad to support the amendment of the Senator from New York, but I am sure the four other cosponsors on this side of the aisle would feel the same way. While they are not present on the floor and are unable to speak for themselves, I should like the RECORD to show this is a nonpartisan, bipartisan amendment, and not something that comes from only one side of the aisle.

I want to congratulate the Senator from New York for the offering amendment, which I think is well drawn, and which is the same, but in greater detail, as the amendment we offered yesterday.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, in reply, I wish I could have presented it for all of us, but that kind of clearance was not possible. It was proposed in an effort to clarify some of the questions on this side of the aisle. I hope we will understand this is in effect exactly the same provision respecting this matter which is contained in the printed amendment which is on everyone's desk.

Mr. President, I yield back the time I have remaining to me, if the opposition to the amendment is prepared to yield back their time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield back our time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time on the amendment has been yielded back.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and the distinguished Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND], I offer an amendment, which I ask the clerk to state.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina for himself and the junior Senator from South Carolina will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed, at the end of title II, on page 35, to add a new section, as follows:

SEC. 207. No person as defined in section 501 of this Act shall be punished for any criminal contempt allegedly committed outside the immediate presence of the court in connection with any civil action prosecuted by the Secretary of Labor or any other person in any court of the United States under the provisions of this Act unless the facts constituting such criminal contempt are established by the verdict of the jury in a proceeding in the district court of the United States, which jury shall be chosen and empaneled in the manner prescribed by the law governing trial juries in criminal prosecutions in the district court of the United States.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, this amendment, which I offer on behalf of myself and the distinguished junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND] merely provides for jury trials in criminal contempt cases. In that way it would harmonize with the pattern of law which has prevailed in labor controversies since 1914, when the Clayton Act was adopted.

The purpose of the amendment is to make it plain that it is not the object of Congress in enacting the present bill into law to change the pattern of legislation which has been in effect since 1914.

The amendment would not in any way affect the power of the court to enforce its judgment by civil contempt proceedings where no jury is employed.

The able and distinguished junior Senator from Massachusetts informed me that he would accept the amendment, and I have made a diligent effort to discuss the amendment with Senators on both sides of the aisle. So far I have been able to find no one in opposition to it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I am informed that the amendment is acceptable to the chairman of the subcommittee. I yield back the time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN], for himself and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, on behalf of the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] and myself, I call up my amendment and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed, at the end of section 607 to add the following:

For the purposes of sections 8(a)(5) and 8(b)(3), to bargain collectively shall include the mutual obligation of the employer and the representative of the employees to refrain from proposing, insisting upon, or conditioning any contractual provision upon any clause violating the provisions of section 8(e).

SEC. 608. Any contract between an employer and a labor organization or its agents heretofore or hereafter executed which is, or which calls upon anyone to engage in, an unfair labor practice under section 8(e) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, shall to such extent be unenforceable and void.

SEC. 609. Section 10(1) of the National Labor Relations Act is amended by adding after the words "section 8(b)," the words "or section 8(e),".

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, the purpose of the amendment is to strengthen and extend the prohibition in an amendment offered by the able Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE] and approved by the Senate, in the area of hot cargo clauses and in the area of secondary boycotts as they apply to the Teamsters Union and the employers with whom the Teamsters Union makes contracts.

This amendment, as is true of the amendment of the able Senator from Tennessee, would not cover anyone except those common carriers operating in interstate commerce under part II of the Interstate Commerce Commission Act.

In the original amendment offered by the able junior Senator from Tennessee, it was made an unfair labor practice for there to be put into a contract to be entered into a hot-cargo clause. The amendment which has been proposed by me and the junior Senator from Louisiana would provide that the same prohibition should apply to contracts now in existence. A second step would be to say that the hot-cargo provision and secondary boycott threats cannot be used in matters of negotiations. The third step would make such unfair labor practices subject to the mandatory injunction provisions of section 10(l) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended. The objective of the amendment is to effectively curb hot-cargo practices being indulged in in interstate commerce.

As a result of the McClellan hearings, all of us are acquainted with the abuses and threatened abuses of the Teamsters Union and the conduct of its president, Jimmy Hoffa. We know only too well of his effort to obtain an economic stranglehold on our economy. His attempts to achieve this goal must be thwarted. Effective safeguards to enforce the prohibition of hot-cargo activity on the part of his union and any others engaged in such wrongful practices, is a great step forward in preventing any one individual or group of individuals from obtaining through the abusive exercise of power an economic stranglehold on our economy which would disastrously affect the public.

The amendment proposed by me and the distinguished and able Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] provides enforcible safeguards and unmeasurably strengthens the unfair labor practices declared in the amendment of the able and distinguished Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE].

Mr. President, I have discussed the amendment with the able junior Senator from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Labor Subcommittee. I have discussed it with Members on the other side of the aisle. So far as I know, there is no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS], for himself and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I call up my amendment 4–17–59–E and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator wish to have his amendment read in its entirety, or simply printed in the RECORD?

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I think it would be well to have the amendment read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 35, line 12, it is proposed to strike out "its constitution and bylaws" and insert in lieu thereof "this section, and with its constitution and bylaws to the extent that they are not inconsistent with this section".

On page 35, line 18, it is proposed to strike out "its constitution and bylaws" and insert in lieu thereof "this section, and with its constitution and bylaws to the extent that they are not inconsistent with this section".

On page 36, lines 11 and 12, it is proposed to strike out "the labor organization's constitution and bylaws" and insert in lieu thereof "this section, and with the labor organization's constitution and bylaws to the extent that they are not inconsistent with this section".

Beginning with line 13 on page 36, it is proposed to strike out over through line 16 on page 37 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(d)(1) Candidates in any election required by this section to be held by secret ballot shall be selected as provided in this paragraph. There shall be mailed to each member of the labor organization at his last known home address a primary ballot containing a list of the offices to be filled. Each such member shall be entitled to place on such primary ballot the name of the person of his choice for each such office and to return such ballot by mail within a reasonable specified time to a counting officer designated by the labor organization as provided in paragraph (4). The counting officer shall tabulate and certify the results of the balloting to the labor organization and to the two persons receiving the highest number of votes for each office. The two persons receiving the highest number of votes for any office to be filled shall be the candidates for such office.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the amendment be dispensed with and that the remaining part of the amendment be printed in the RECORD as if read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nebraska that the further reading of the amendment be dispensed with and that the remainder of the amendment be printed in the RECORD?

Mr. MCNAMARA. Mr. President, is this a unanimous-consent request?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a unanimous-consent request that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with and that the remainder of the amendment be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MCNAMARA. I object, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Did the Senator object?

Mr. McNAMARA. Yes. I should like to hear what is in the amendment, and I should like to have some explanation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard. The clerk will continue to read the amendment.

Mr. CURTIS. The amendment is printed. Does the Senator have a copy?

Mr. McNAMARA. No, I do not have a copy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will continue to read the amendment.

The Legislative Clerk resumed and concluded reading the amendment, as follows:

(2) An election required by this section to be held by secret ballot shall be conducted as provided in this paragraph. There shall be mailed to each member of the labor organization at his last known home address an election ballot containing a list of the offices to be filled and the names of the candidates selected as provided in paragraph (1) for each such office. Each such member shall be entitled to indicate on such ballot his preference for one of the two candidates for each such office and to return such ballot within a reasonable specified time by mail to a counting officer designated by the labor organiaztion as provided in paragraph (4). The counting officer shall proceed to tabulate the votes and certify the results to the labor organization and to each candidate. The candidate receiving the highest number of votes for any office shall be deemed to have been elected to such office.

(3) The ballots required to be mailed under paragraph (1) or paragraph (2) shall be accompanied by appropriately addressed return envelopes so designed that the name of the member casting the ballot will appear on the outer envelope in order that it may be checked against the membership list of the labor organization for the purpose of verifying the eligibility of the voter. Such ballots shall be received and handled by the counting officer in such manner as will preserve the secrecy of the ballot. All ballots cast shall be preserved by the counting officer for a period of ninety days during which such counting officer shall permit their inspection, in his presence, by the two persons receiving the highest number of votes for any office in the case of an election held for the purpose of nominating candidates, or by a candidate in any other election, or by the duly authorized representative of any such person or candidate.

(4) The Secretary shall establish and publish a list of qualified individuals who are available to act as counting officers for the purpose of this paragraph. In establishing such list, the Secretary shall insofar as possible include the names of persons from each geographical area in which elections subject to this subsection may be held. No person shall be designated by a labor organization as a counting officer unless his name appears on such list, or if he is an officer, employee, or member of such organization or an employer any of whose employees are members of such organization. The Secretary shall formulate and publish a schedule of fees to be paid by labor organizations to such counting officers.

(5) Any person who, except as authorized by this subsection, opens or examines any ballot mailed by a member of a labor organization in an election to which this section applies, or who folds, tears, or places any mark on any ballot to be used in any such election for the purpose of learning or attempting to learn or making it possible for any other person to learn or attempt to learn the identity of the person casting such ballot, or who, having knowledge of the identity of a member of a labor organization casting any such ballot, discloses to any other person, without the consent of such member, any information obtained from such ballot, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I yield myself 10 minutes on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CURTIS. May the junior Senator from Nebraska suggest the absence of a quorum without losing the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It may be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent that I may suggest the absence of a quorum and retain the floor, without the time being charged to either side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, reserving the right to object—and I do not wish to object—we might have some difficulty in obtaining a quorum at this time of day. Would the Senator be willing to ask that the order for the quorum call be rescinded after Senators had had sufficient notice?

Mr. CURTIS. I have an amendment which I should like to present when a greater number of Senators are present than are now present. I do not propose to take the full time. I should like to discuss my amendment for 5 or 10 minutes. I am presenting it at the request of a group of unionists.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the unanimous-consent request is agreed to, and the clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I wish to state very briefly what is involved in this amendment.

It involves an election procedure for nominating and electing the officers of a union. It is predicated on the thesis that if the real power to operate a union is vested in the union members themselves, most of these problems will disappear. I thoroughly believe that. I have confidence in the rank and file of our union members. I know them to be citizens of honesty and integrity.

My amendment provides that whenever union officers are to be elected, there shall be mailed to each member of the union a primary ballot. The primary ballot will contain only a list of the offices to be filled. It will be mailed to every member of the union; and the member will vote in his home, in absolute secrecy. He can write down the name of any persons he chooses for the various offices to be filled.

He will return the ballot to a counting officer. The counting officer will tabulate the result; and the two candidates with the highest number of votes will be nominated.

Then, for the election of officers, a ballot containing the names of the two nominees will be sent through the mails. Once more the union member will vote in the privacy of his home. He will return the ballot by mail, and it will be counted. Whoever obtains the greater number of votes will be deemed elected.

This is not a Government supervised election. A very simple procedure is provided for. The Secretary of Labor will publish a list of approved counting officers in every geographical area of the country. It may be the honest ballot association. It may be various citizens of high standing. At any rate, he publishes the list of approved counting officers. The union can select anyone they choose. The counting officer conducts the election by mail. Any chance of a group on the inside controlling the nominating processes is eliminated. Any chance of coercion or intimidation is eliminated.

Mr. President, I also call attention to the fact that sometimes a local union serves a wide geographical area. Ballots would be mailed to every member. It would be an open primary and an election in which the voter would vote in absolute secrecy in his home, and that vote would be transmitted through the U.S. mail. Such details as two envelopes—one in which to put the secret ballot and the other, the outside envelope, containing the name of the member, so that it can be checked against the membership list—are provided for.

I am aware that we have been considering the bill for about 8 days. I do not wish to discuss the amendment any longer. I am thoroughly convinced that the procedure proposed is workable. I am also convinced that if union members had absolute control of their own unions, we would not need a McClellan committee. We would not have a parade of union officers taking the fifth amendment, if we adopted the amendment; neither would we have any Dave Becks in charge of unions or conferences of unions if the members could nominate their own officers and elect their own officers with absolute secrecy, and if the ballots were honestly counted.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time. I urge the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CURTIS. I yield.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Perhaps what I am about to say is extraneous to the subject under discussion. It has, however, a direct bearing on the democratic process. The Senator has mentioned the responsibility of the individual member of a labor union.

It is a time, my colleagues, when we should appropriately call to the attention of the Senate during this debate of the responsibility of the individual citizen for participation in the processes of his own government at all levels. For illustration, I cite two recent municipal elections in West Virginia. These were important events. Approximately 60 to 65 percent of the registered voters who were eligible to cast ballots, failed to do so. In other words, 65 out of every 100 eligible voters were absent from citizenship duty, for one reason or another, and did not participate. This is the recurring pattern throughout the United States.

The Senator, who is a devoted member of this body, knows full well that the time has come when we could discuss the failure, not only within a labor union, but within the larger Union of States in our elective system when American citizens fail to participate. The individual responsibility of a citizen is needed today. We must all work to the end that a forfeiture of our freedoms shall not weaken the Republic. Mr. President, it is evident as debate nears its conclusion on this vital measure, that compromise has been effective on some matters under consideration.

As a member of the Labor and Public Welfare Committee, I express especial thanks for the firm and fair manner in which Senator KENNEDY has handled this bill.

Mr. CURTIS. I thank the Senator. I should point out that I do not believe that dishonest men become heads of unions because union members neglect their duties. I believe it is because dishonest men seize the positions and run the offices from the top. Every union which has been exposed by the McClellan committee as being corrupt has been a union which was run from the top.

The great majority of Americans are honest, and that goes for the great, great majority of union members, also. I say that if we were to adopt this amendment, we could forget about many of the attempts to control and regulate, if we had an arrangement whereby the real power in a union could be exercised only by the rank and file. What is wrong with a method for nominating officers in an absolute primary conducted with a secret ballot through the mail from the homes of the members, and for elections?

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the chairman yield me 2 minutes?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I rise to oppose the amendment. All one need do in opposing the amendment is to ask Members of the Senate to read the bill starting at page 35, the title on elections, and then to read the report of the committee on "elections," with particular reference to the material beginning at page 20.

I say most respectfully that what the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska would do would be to have the Congress of the United States dictate to the unions what their constitution and bylaws procedure shall be in conducting their elections.

The purpose of the bill is to provide to the membership of the unions a guarantee of democratic procedures, and not to have Congress to legislate for the unions. Under the Kennedy-Ervin bill, it is for Congress to provide the procedures under which democratic elections can be held by the determination of the membership of the unions themselves.

I do not propose to vote for an amendment which undertakes to turn the Congress of the United States into a constitutional convention and bylaws legislative body for all the unions of America.

Let us take a look at what the committee bill proposes. I wish to say in behalf of the two sides of the table of the committee on which I have the honor to serve, headed by the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL], who is now on the floor, and with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH], and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], that it has been a matter of great pride to me to work with these men on the pending bill. The Senator from Nebraska will discover, if he will talk to the Republican members of the committee, that the overwhelming majority of the Republicans on the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare believe that we have done an excellent job in the election provision of the bill, and that we have gone as far as we reasonably can go in making decisions for unions in regard to their election procedures.

On page 20 of the committee report the committee states:

> The committee bill requires the election of the officers of international unions not less frequently than every 5 years.

We know that the evidence which was adduced before the McClellan committee showed that in some segments of the American labor movement an evil exists in that the membership is denied——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield me 3 more minutes?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield 3 additional minutes to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORSE. There are denied to the membership of some unions elections at reasonable periods of time so that democratic processes can work. We go so far as to say that they shall have their elections not less frequently than every 5 years.

We provide that local union officials must be elected by secret ballot not less often than every 3 years. We provided that democratic safeguard. Then in the case of international unions we say:

> In the case of both international and local unions, members of executive boards or other governing bodies are also required to be elected by secret ballot. The bill recognizes that in some unions intermediate bodies exercise responsible governing power and specifies that the members of such bodies as systems boards in the railroad industry be elected by secret ballot of the members of the union or union officers elected by the members by a secret ballot.

The bill guarantees every member notice of a secret election. It guarantees him a reasonable opportunity to nominate candidates. It guarantees to every candidate for local union office, through the use of union mailing lists and distribution machinery, the right to distribute at his own expense material in support of his candidacy to every member of the union. The bill guarantees to every candidate for office the right to have an observer present during the balloting and at the counting of the ballots. It guarantees that all members in good standing shall be permitted to vote without coercion or restraint.

The bill guarantees that all records pertaining to the election are to be preserved. Union officials are forbidden to expend union dues, assessments, and similar compulsory levies upon the members to pay campaign workers or meet the other campaign expenses of candidates. It guarantees court proceedings for noncompliance with the provisions of the union constitution and bylaws governing elections.

Furthermore, Mr. President, the bill guarantees procedures which will make it possible for the union members to control democratically their own election system. But the bill does not propose to write the union constitution and bylaws provisions for the union in every minute detail concerning the conduct of the elections. As the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH] has just whispered to me, if the Curtis amendment were adopted, we would really be imposing upon the unions our notions of what an election straitjacket should be.

If responsibilities are to be developed in unions, then it is necessary to give them a framework in which they can exercise their democratic rights with respect to the overall democratic procedures which are guaranteed by the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Oregon has expired.

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield 2 more minutes to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORSE. The members of the committee, from both sides of the aisle, worked hard to write the election procedures section of the bill. I do not say we are in complete agreement on all phases of it, but I would be perfectly willing to let the Republican members of the committee cast their votes on the Curtis amendment, and in that event I am satisfied, though I have not talked to a single one of them about this matter, that a majority of them would vote to sustain the committee. I am sure that on the Democratic side the same thing would be true.

I rest my case by saying that the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare is entitled to have the support of the Senate on the election section of the bill which has been reported after long, hard study, and the working out of the various points of view expressed in the committee. The bill is a good bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I call up my amendment designated "4–23–59—H."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 36, beginning after the period in line 1, it is proposed to strike out down through line 4, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

> Not less than forty-five days prior to an election the secretary of every labor organization shall proceed to establish an election committee to be composed as follows: One member for each of the individuals duly nominated for office in the forthcoming election, such member to be designated by such individual in a statement signed by such individual and filed with such secretary. No individual shall be eligible to serve as a member of an election committee who is not, at the time he is appointed or designated to serve on such committee, a member in good standing of the labor organization, who at such time is an officer or employee of the labor organization or any other labor organization of which such labor organiaztion is an affiliate or constituent unit, or who is a nominee for an office to be filled in the forthcoming election. If the number of eligible individuals designated to serve as members of the election committee is less than six, then the individuals who are members of the election committee shall select such additional eligible individuals to serve as members of the committee as may be necessary in order that such committee shall consist of not less than six members. The election committee shall select one of its members as chairman. It shall be the duty of the election committee to supervise the conduct of the election, to advise the members of the labor organization of the time and place the election is to be held, to count the ballots and to certify to the membership of the labor organization the results thereof, and to preserve for not less than one year the ballots cast in, and other records maintained in connection with, the election: Provided, however, That nominees for office in a labor organization may by unanimous agreement designate a person or persons other than members of such organization to perform the counting of the ballots.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, this is the so-called honest count amendment which I offered last year when the Senate was considering the Kennedy-Ives bill. The amendment was defeated at that time by a vote of 44 to 45. The vote is recorded at page 10361 of the RECORD of June 17.

I congratulate the committee, first, upon what I think is substantial progress in the direction of providing better voting mechanism in labor unions than that which prevails at present. I have studied this section very carefully, and appeared before the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare in connection with it.

As the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] has just pointed out, the committee placed some additional safeguards in the bill. New rules and regulations have been provided for the casting of ballots, and for the manner in which candidates shall be nominated. Also, various approaches have been provided from the standpoint of the frequency of elections.

However, as I called to the attention of the committee when I appeared before it, one very significant and pernicious loophole has not been covered by the committee's action. At the time I appeared before the committee, I called attention to that loophole. In a subsequent television program on which I appeared with the chairman of the committee, the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], the Senator from Massachusetts expressed appreciation for the fact that I had highlighted this matter, and said that the committee would move in that direction, which indeed it has, as is indicated on page 36 of the bill, where the following language was added, subsequent to my committee testimony:

Adequate election safeguards to insure a fair count of the ballots shall be provided, including the right of any candidate to have an observer at the polls and at the counting of the ballots.

Since that language has been added, it seems to me that the amendment I have offered, and which has been read, can achieve its purpose in simpler form. I have discussed the question with the chairman of the committee, and I believe he is prepared to accept a simpler version of my amendment, which is as follows, and which I hope he will accept. On page 36, I propose to strike out "observer" and insert in lieu thereof "teller." If that amendment is acceptable, I am willing to substitute it for the amendment I have offered.

Mr. KENNEDY. I suggest that we modify the amendment at page 36, line 3: "any candidate to have an observer at the polls and a teller at the counting of the ballots."

Mr. MUNDT. That is perfectly satisfactory.

Mr. KENNEDY. Much of the impetus for the whole amendment and the language in the bill was the result of the amendment offered on the floor of the Senate last year by the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. MUNDT. I appreciate the Senator's statement. It seems to me that this is a perfectly satisfactory manner in which to achieve what we all want—an honest count.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota modify his amendment?

Mr. MUNDT. I so modify my amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. MUNDT. I yield back the time remaining to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment, as modified, offered by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT].

The amendment, as modified was agreed to.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I regret the necessity for calling up this amendment, but under existing conditions I must do so. I call up my amendment designated "4-20-59-B," and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida desire to have his amendment read in its entirety?

Mr. HOLLAND. It is a short amendment. I should like to have it read in its entirety.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 56, line 20, it is proposed to strike out the quotation marks.

On page 56 between lines 20 and 21, insert the following:

(d)(1) Nothing in this Act or the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, shall be construed to nullify the provisions of any State or Territorial law which regulate or qualify the right of employees of a public utility to strike, or which prohibit strikes by such employees.

(2) As used in this subsection the term "public utility" means an employer engaged in the business of furnishing water, light, heat, gas, electric power, or passenger transportation services to the public.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, the reason why I regret to call up this amendment is that I would much prefer to have the proposal contained therein heard in committee. For 8 years, I have been trying to have it heard in committee—I know that statement sounds ridiculous, but it is the truth—and to have it reported by the committee, whether favorably or unfavorably. In fact, it would not make too much difference which way it was reported. If a bill on this subject were to be reported by the committee to the Senate, I believe it would be passed by the Senate, without question. But apparently there is an unwillingness on the part of our good friends who have had control of the committee up to this time to have such a bill reported to the Senate, and have it considered on the floor of the Senate and here voted either up or down.

Mr. President, this question relates to the serious matter of preemption, of preventing States from enforcing their own laws and responsibilities—a situation which has developed since enactment of the Taft-Hartley Act. This matter has to do with the decision of the Supreme Court in the so-called Wisconsin case and the Court's decision in other cases—but principally its decision in that case, in which the Court held that although Wisconsin had a compulsory arbitration law affecting public utilities in the State and serving the public of the State, Wisconsin was without power to resort to that law to keep the public utilities in operation—because, so said the Court, by a majority, the enactment of the Taft-Hartley Act had pre-empted that field in such a way that the States were powerless to act.

Mr. President, it is rather terrible to consider that under our Government—in which both the Federal Government and the State governments are sovereign—there is a situation, under that decision of the Court, in which the people of a State or in a great area served by a power company or a gas company or a water company or a bus company are without any authority whatever to keep the public utilities operative, either under Federal law or under State law.

The Taft-Hartley Act contains an emergency provision which, as every Senator knows, is applicable only to national emergencies. That provision has been invoked helpfully so as to reopen coal mines which had been shut down, to get ships in operation, following a maritime union strike; to get our atomic energy activities under way again, in the interests of the Nation, following a strike by the employees at Oak Ridge; and in similar situations. But that emergency provision applies only to matters of national importance and affecting the national health, welfare, and the like.

Under the Court's decision in the Wisconsin case, the States—many of whom have tried to deal with these matters, and many of whom had statutes which dealt with them before the time of the enactment of the Taft-Hartley Act—are left without any power at all to serve their own people and to keep their public utilities running.

Mr. President, in my opinion that is the most destructive result of any preemption decision. I do not know why my learned friends on the committees are unwilling to have this amendment come to the floor by itself; but I believe I have a good idea why they are not willing to have it do so. It is because they think that the pressure of public opinion and the troubles which the people in numerous areas of the Nation have had because of public-utility strikes which they are powerless to handle would force the adoption of this amendment, if it ever were considered by itself.

Mr. President, let me briefly state the facts involved. But before doing so, and in order to save the time of the Senate, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks the entire statement I have prepared. Instead of reading the entire statement at this time, I shall try to make my remarks much more brief.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. HOLLAND. First of all, Mr. President, that decision of the Supreme Court runs squarely in the face of a fact that is shown by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at the time of the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act, for that RECORD shows very clearly that Congress did not intend any such result.

At this time I shall quote very briefly from a question which was asked by Representative Kersten, of Wisconsin, who knew about the existence of the Wisconsin Act. I shall also quote from the remarks of Mr. Hartley, the coauthor of the Taft-Hartley Act. These remarks were made on the floor of the House of Representatives at the time when the conference report which became the Taft-Hartley Act was pending before the House:

Mr. KERSTEN. I should like to ask the gentleman about that portion which pertains to the validity of State laws. Wisconsin and other States have their own labor-relations laws. We are very anxious that disputes be settled at the State level insofar as it is possible. Can the gentleman give us assurance on that proposition, so that it is a matter of record, that that is the sense of the language and of the report?

Mr. Hartley replied as follows:

That is the sense of the language of the bill and of the report. That is my interpretation of the bill, that this will not interfere with the State of Wisconsin in the administration of its own laws. In other words, this will not interfere with the validity of the laws within that State.

Mr. President, how wrong was that statement by the coauthor of that act; for since then a majority of the Supreme Court, in ruling on the Wisconsin case, has interpreted the act, notwithstanding that statement and notwithstanding that record, as preventing that very State—Wisconsin—from enforcing its laws to keep its public utilities operative, in the interest of the protection of the people of the State and in the interest of giving them service.

When the case came before the Supreme Court, the Court did not reach a unanimous decision. On the contrary, there was considerable division. The minority opinion, written by Mr. Justice Frankfurter, and joined in by Justices Burton and Minton, very strenuously supported the position of the States, and supported the position that the people of the States should not be left without remedy, and that if they had State laws, they should have authority to use those laws to keep their public utilities in operation and to serve the people of the State.

Mr. President, not only does this matter relate directly to the preservation or the recreation of States rights, but it also has to do with the services of the general public in great areas of the Nation or in any area of the Nation.

Mr. President, I read the following from the opinion of Mr. Justice Frankfurter; it was the minority opinion, but to my mind it states the sound logic of the case:

But the careful consideration given to the problem of meeting nationwide emergencies—

That is to say, the consideration given to it in connection with the Taft-Hartley Act—and the failure to provide for emergencies other than those affecting the Nation as a whole do not imply paralysis of State police power. Rather, they imply that the States retain the power to protect the public interest in emergencies economically and practically confined within a State. It is not reasonable to impute to Congress the desire to leave the States helpless in meeting local situations when the Congress restricted national intervention to national emergencies.

Mr. President, I shall not read further from the opinion; but I wish to say that my State, along with 17 others, in all, and along with a larger number which have other types of legislation, has dealt with this matter. Some of these States have dealt with it very fully, by means of compulsory arbitration statutes or seizure statutes. Some of these States have dealt with it by other means—for instance, by making provision for cooling-off periods, plus conciliation, plus the use of injunctions, plus the use of other provisions which they have written into their laws. A total of 17 States, plus the new State of Hawaii, and making 18, in all—have such provisions in their State laws.

I should like to have the RECORD show what was done in Florida. The Florida Legislature met. It recognized this problem as being one of compelling public concern. It created an impartial committee to deal with this subject. The committee drafted the law which our State senate passed by unanimous vote, and which our State house of representatives passed by an overwhelming majority.

I believe it particularly noteworthy, Mr. President, that the chief counsel for the State Federation of Labor and the State president of the American Federation of Labor served on the committee which formulated that law. That fact shows a much more wholesome willingness to work together with the legislators and with the representatives of the general public and with employers, than anything we have seen at the Federal level—at least in recent times.

I should like to dwell upon the various kinds of laws that are available, but I think that point will be shown with complete clarity in my longer, prepared remarks, which I have placed in the RECORD. I do want the RECORD to show again that for 8 years, ever since the decision was handed down in 1951, the Senator from Florida, the distinguished junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON], and various other Senators, as shown in my full speech, have endeavored to bring this matter to a head, and there has been no Congress in which a bill has not been introduced and in which an effort has not been made to have hearings and have the matter come to the people.

Mr. President, not merely on the question of States rights and State responsibilities, but on the matter of ignoring the rights of great segments of our population to be served in the matter of heat, electricity, light, gas, local transportation, and even water—there are a great many local water companies which would be covered by this act—it is a sad commentary that we have had this complete inaction and unwillingness to have the matter come to a head, where the people can see the issue by itself, where it does not have to be attached to a matter such as this, where it might or might not be confused with other issues, but where it could be passed upon on its merits, so the needed protection could be given to the people of the several States and the State governments could be given back needed power to protect their own people.

Mr. President, I do not complain of any unkindness done to me by the members of the committee. I simply complain of the lack of action, the lack of ever doing anything. For instance, I find that I engaged in a colloquy with my good friend the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] on this subject as long ago as 1954. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will listen, because I hope he will remember that even in those far off days he agreed with the Senator from Florida that legislation was needed in this field; that the local public utilities were entitled to be protected; and he even said he would try to help work something out.

I quote the colloquy from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, as shown in my remarks as they have been printed in the RECORD. They appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 100, part 5, page 6113. I quote first the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts:

I know the Senator from Florida is entirely sincere in his desire to permit the States to protect themselves in cases of emergency. I believe the Federal Government has such authority under the Taft-Hartley Act, and that, therefore, the States should have it.

The Senator's philosophy and mine are completely at one in that matter.

I continue to quote from the statement of my distinguished friend, the Senator from Massachusetts, and I do not believe he has changed his mind:

I would not object if the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH]——

That was the amendment pending at the time—were drawn in language sufficiently specific to provide for State action in a case involving a public utility employer whose work involved the lives of the people, but not in a field as broad as that defined in the Florida statute.

I quote once more from the statement of my distinguished friend from Massachusetts, at that same place and in the same RECORD:

I should like to join the Senator from Florida in attempting to ascertain whether we can agree upon amendatory language which would really give the States the right to deal with genuine emergencies, under language drawn with sufficient care so that it will not permit the States to stray over into a wide area which hitherto has been under the protection of the Federal act.

Last year, when we were having hearings before the subcommittee headed by the Senator from Massachusetts—and it is the first committee that has given me the courtesy of a hearing, and I am appreciative of it—the Senator raised the same point. Because he raised the point, I cut off several of the fields included in the original amendment, and I cut the amendment down to its present coverage, which certainly cannot be said to cover anything more than those activities which have to do with the vital activities and lives of people. I read the amendment again:

Nothing in this Act or the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, shall be construed to nullify the provisions of any State or Territorial law which regulate or qualify the right of employees of a public utility to strike, or which prohibit strikes by such employees.

(2) As used in this subsection the term "public utility" means an employer engaged in the business of furnishing water, light, heat, gas, electric power, or passenger transportation services to the public.

I do not see how that list could be cut down further in a field relating to the daily livelihood, the actual lives, of the people, the men, women, and children who are served by public utilities that operate in these fields.

I remind the Senate that the public utilities which serve in these fields are given licenses or franchises by the States in which they serve; that they are regulated by the States in which they serve; that they are given their licenses and franchises in order to serve the public; that they are required to serve the public; that no lockout or shutdown should be permitted.

The question is whether the purpose of the State in granting a franchise to a water or a power company to serve a particular area of a State shall be nullified by the employees walking out and refusing to render service.

Mr. President, I do not want to labor this question at any great length, but I do want the Senate to understand that we are not talking about some academic question. We have had in recent years—at least last year and this year—two very serious public utility strikes in our State, the State of Florida, in which the State has found itself completely helpless in moving to have those necessary services rendered to our people. They followed a bus strike in the city of Miami, when the Governor tried to use compulsory arbitration. The case was carried to the Supreme Court of our State, and the court held, as I suspect it had to hold, that it must follow the Supreme Court in the Wisconsin decision, and that, therefore, it must hold our State law to be inoperative.

So in the two recent strikes, the bus strike in Jacksonville last year, which lasted 83 days, and the Gulf Power Co. strike in northern Florida, which ended only this week after lasting 30 days, the people were left helpless to be protected by their State law or any power of the State, because there is not any power given to the State, under the Taft-Hartley Act, to provide protection, because the protection therein provided is limited to national emergencies.

I want to refer briefly to the distressing situation in the Jacksonville bus strike last year. It lasted 83 days. It drove out of business a number of small businesses which had existed for the purpose of serving the sailors from Mayport, the great carrier base, when they would leave and come into the city of Jacksonville. Since there were no buses running, the carriers decided to berth at either Norfolk or Newport News. Senators can realize what would happen under these circumstances to a whole community and to the places of business which had existed and thrived on the rendering of good and needed services to the servicemen of our Nation.

It was a sad commentary, I repeat, on the inadequacy of our laws for Federal and State operation that the strike had to drag itself out over 83 days, until everyone was simply worn out by it, and many good people were broke, and the community as a whole suffered severely.

Mr. President, in my principal speech I have included an editorial from the Tampa Tribune, which I will not go through at this time. I hope Senators will read the editorial, which will give some understanding of the distress which followed from the strike and the feeling of frustration which our people felt because they were completely unable, due to inaction of the Congress of the United States, to do anything at all about it.

Mr. President, since then, another strike, the Gulf Power strike, has taken place, within the last few days, and I want to make some reference to that strike. First, I should like to read from a news article from the Pensacola Journal, written 3 days after the strike commenced, about a month ago:

Violence and threats of violence, sabotage and attempts at sabotage, have marked the short period since members of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers struck the Gulf Power Co. in an effort to gain union control of foremen and supervisors.

I shall return to that point later.

A bomb scare; threat of personal injury to an unaffected woman employee; attempts to short circuit powerlines, some of which have been successful, causing blackouts; the beating of a telephone company repairman who crossed a picket line to do his job; threats against store operators who receive power bill payments as a public service. These are some of the incidents which occurred in the first 3 days of the strike.

I go back to the statement that the strike affected only foremen and supervisors. The sole question was whether under its contract the union had the power to affect the activities of the foremen and supervisors, of whom there were 65. Seven of the 65 sided with the union. Fifty-eight of the 65 refused to have anything to do with the strike or with the union, and helped to keep the powerplants running for all that large section of my State which lies west of Tallahassee.

Mr. President, there was no question about wages, there was no question about hours, there was no question about fringe benefits, and there was no question about working conditions. The sole question was whether the supervisors, who really represent the employer, could be controlled by the union under its contract. Mr. President, that is a shabby excuse for a strike which caused this great damage to my State. Mr. President, I am happy to observe my distinguished junior colleague on the floor, because he knows of the distress which has been caused by this strike, which terminated only a few days ago.

Mr. President, just prior to the end of the strike there was an editorial published in the Pensacola News-Journal, written by a friend of labor, a very liberal man named Marion T. Gaines. Everyone who knows Mr. Gaines knows of his liberality and humanity and his great service not only in a number of civic and State fields, but in other fields. I shall not read the entire editorial, because it is too long, but I shall read a few of the paragraphs from it, so that Senators may observe how this man, friendly as he is to labor, felt about the unconscionable thing which was done to him and to the hundreds and thousands of people who reside in that section of the State.

The title of the editorial, which was published in the Sunday, April 5, issue of the Pensacola News-Journal, is "Loss of Power Endangers Life, Health, Property."

Mr. President, that is what we are talking about when we refer to public utility strikes. I read from the editorial:

Dynamiting and sawing of powerline poles, endangering electric service to widespread areas including military installations, has caused concern to industries, institutions and individuals whose very lives may be imperiled and whose property losses could mount enormously if the sabotage proves as effective as apparently intended.

The cutting of a conveyor belt to stop the big steam powerplant near Chattahoochee, the blasting of a heavy voltage pole and an attempt to dynamite another are no little misdemeanors. They threatened the complete shutdown of the power pool which supplies this whole northwest Florida area, including Eglin Air Force Proving Ground—

Which is the greatest such installation we have for defense—

the Naval Air installations—

At Pensacola, the Annapolis of the Air—and the numerous industries that depend on power.

That is how careless, that is how thoughtless, and that is how blind are the actions of these people who dare to ignore their obligation to the public.

Mr. President, anyone can read the whole editorial if he wishes to. I simply do not care to take time to read it all.

I read another excerpt:

Loss of power at a dairy meant that 170 milk cows had to suffer until service was restored, to say nothing of the potential damage to the dairyman's business.

There were numerous freezers, in which meat is stored, which became inoperative, and I read a short paragraph in regard to that:

Homes with freezers would lose much food, babies would be denied milk, newspapers and radio stations would be unable to function, persons undergoing operations in hospitals would be endangered, city and private water supplies would be imperiled if pumps stopped, fire hazards would be increased, loss of sewerage service might affect public health—all of these and more could come to pass if a large area were without electric power for any length of time.

Fortunately—and I want to make this clear—the strike failed to knock out any great area at any one time, though it did knock out limited areas for various periods of time, because of sabotage and property destruction and the general unwillingness to show any responsibility to the public which was exhibited by the strikers.

Mr. President, I close by reading one short closing paragraph:

Such lack of regard for fellow citizens' lives and property is criminal irresponsibility meriting drastic punishment and should be met with every possible safeguard even if vigilance committees have to go into action to prevent such awful contingencies.

Mr. President, the author of this editorial is not in favor of vigilantes, and the speaker at this moment is not in favor of vigilantes. I have opposed mob action or anything like that all of my life, and I shall continue to do so. However, the author of the editorial is bringing to our attention the fact that such irresponsibility, such waste, and such an abominable attitude toward responsibilities to the public will, just as surely as we are standing in this Chamber, bring mass action by outraged citizens unless something is done about it.

Who can do anything about it, Mr. President? No one other than the Congress of the United States can do anything. The Governor of the State and the mayor of a city may meet violence when it occurs by punishment, or by safeguarding any place which seems to be threatened, but they are without authority to keep things running. As a result of the passage of the act which we passed and by the interpretation of the Supreme Court construing the act, the States are now completely helpless to take care of themselves in this very vital field.

Mr. President, in closing let me say that this is not merely a question of the passage of a labor law. It is not a mere question of whether we shall restore States rights to the place where they ought to exist, so that they can be exercised. It is not a question of mere service to great segments of our people. This is a question relating to the philosophy of our Nation. Will this Nation sit still and watch a group of people who are without regard for the health and safety of the general public overlook entirely their heavy responsibility in cases of this kind? Will the Nation leave the States helpless, as the Nation is already helpless, to do anything in this field?

Mr. President, much as I have disliked to take the time of the Senate for this presentation, I felt it was necessary. If this proposal should be defeated—and I hope it will not be defeated—I hope the committee will decide to give us a hearing, and I further hope it will bring to the floor a substantive proposal, where the matter can be considered on its merits. The committee has not been willing to do this in 8 years. I do not know of any way available to me, or to any other Senator, to bring attention to this deplorable and un-American situation other than by presenting this amendment to the bill.

Mr. President, I hope the amendment will be agreed to.

EXHIBIT 1

STATEMENT BY SENATOR HOLLAND

I offer these amendments in the earnest hope that finally Congress will act to fill this particular legal void—or labor-management no man's land—which fails to supply any method, Federal or State, to assure the continued operation of local public utilities. This dangerous and unexpected situation was created on February 26, 1951, by a strained interpretation, by the U.S. Supreme Court, in its divided decision in the so-called Wisconsin case, construing the legislative intent in the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act.

In less than 3 months after that divided Supreme Court decision was handed down, a bipartisan effort was begun in the Senate to correct the unfortunate situation created thereby. Republican Senators Wiley, of Wisconsin, and Hendrickson, of New Jersey, together with Democratic Senators Robertson, of Virginia, and I, introduced, on May 23, 1951, Senate bill 1535 of the 82d Congress. Unfortunately that bill never saw the light of day, but died in the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee without being accorded a hearing.

In the following Congress, the 83d, a corrective proposal was again before the Senate Committe on Labor and Public Welfare in an omnibus labor bill, S. 2650, which was considered by the committee, and was favorably reported. However, it will be recalled that, due in large part to the fact that three FEPC amendments were pending, under a unanimous-consent agreement limiting debate, the Senate, by a vote of 50 to 42, recommitted that bill. Although I found much to approve in Senate bill 2650—particularly in the section dealing with strikes in public utilities—I voted with the majority to recommit the bill, because of the unfavorable parliamentary situation which required the consideration of FEPC legislation under a gag rule.

Senate bill 2650, as reported from the Senate committee, contained the following language:

"(c) Nothing in this act shall be construed to interfere with the enactment and enforcement by the States of laws to deal in emergencies with labor disputes which, if permitted to occur or continue, will constitute a clear and present danger to the health or safety of the people of the States."

During the debate on that measure, I questioned at length the senior Senator from New Jersey, Mr. Smith, then chairman of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, concerning the purpose of that proposed language. I specifically asked the distinguished Senator from New Jersey if it were his understanding that that provision was designed effectively to return to the States the power, authority, and jurisdiction to deal under State laws, and under machinery provided under State laws, with work stoppages, strikes, threatened strikes, lockouts, or anything which would tend to bring about a stoppage of the rendition of services by public utilities to the people of States or communities within States. The Senator from New Jersey replied:

"In preparing this particular paragraph the committee felt that utilities certainly would be included, because utilities usually could affect the health or safety of the people."

In his January 11, 1954, message to the Congress on labor-management relations, President Eisenhower called attention to the problem at hand and recommended correction in the following manner:

"The act should make clear that the several States and Territories, when confronted with emergencies endangering the health or safety of their citizens, are not, through any conflict with the Federal law, actual or implied, deprived of the right to deal with such emergencies. The need for clarification of jurisdiction between the Federal and State and Territorial governments in the labor-management field has lately been emphasized by the broad implications of the most recent decision of the Supreme Court dealing with this subject."

Of course, the President was referring to the decision of the Supreme Court in the Wisconsin case.

On June 18, 1955, in the 1st session of the 84th Congress, Senator ROBERTSON and I again introduced a bill, S. 527, designed to correct this situation. Again our proposal received no attention.

Last year Senator ROBERTSON and I again introduced a bill, S. 3692, but no action was taken on it. During the debate on labor legislation last year we offered an amendment to correct this situation. It was defeated, not, I think, on its merits, but because many Senators, though recognizing the need for the amendment, felt that the bill then pending should not contain controversial Taft-Hartley amendments.

This year I introduced Senate bill 632 on this subject, thus making this the fifth Congress in a row that such a proposal has been before the Congress, though the problem is still with us.

As I stated earlier, this amendment was made necessary by the interpretation of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended by the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, by the Supreme Court of the United States in the so-called Wisconsin case (Amalgamated Association of Street Electric Railway and Motor Coach Employees of America, Division 998, et al. v. Wisconsin Employment Relations Board, 340 U.S. 383, 71 S. Ct. 359, 95 L. ed. 354), dated February 26, 1951. The net result of the majority opinion in that case was that a Wisconsin statute which prohibited strikes against public utilities, and provided for compulsory arbitration of labor disputes after an impasse in collective bargaining has been reached, was invalid, because it was held to be in conflict with the National Labor Relations Act, as amended.

I have studied the case rather carefully; and I find myself in complete agreement with the strong dissenting opinion written by Mr. Justice Frankfurter, and joined in by Mr. Justice Burton and Mr. Justice Minton. In other words, the Court was not unanimous in its decision; and the three Justices I have mentioned strongly dissented from the majority opinion, and held that the States had not been precluded by the Taft-Hartley Act from their right, under their police powers and their statutes, to deal with threatened stoppages of public utility services.

I feel—as did the principal Senate author of the act in question, the late Senator Robert A. Taft—that the majority of the Court came forward with a highly strained interpretation of the intent of Congress in the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act of 1947, and one which was never anticipated by its sponsors. Senator Taft made no secret of his complete disagreement with the majority opinion, and personally expressed himself strongly to me on the subject on several occasions. His comments in this regard were of particular interest to me in view of the fact that both the majority and the dissenting opinions refer to some of the same comments made by Senator Taft during the 1947 debate, in support of their interpretation of the legislative history of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Also, it is clear from the record that another coauthor of the bill, former Representative Hartley, had a completely different interpretation of the intent of the bill from that ascribed to it by the Supreme Court. I quote the following from page 6383 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 4, 1947, from the debate which occurred at that time in the House of Representatives:

"Mr. KERSTEN of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

"Mr. HARTLEY. I yield.

"Mr. KERSTEN of Wisconsin. I wish to compliment the gentleman on the very fine exposition he is making of the conference report. I would like to ask the gentleman about that portion which pertains to the validity of State laws. Wisconsin and other States have their own labor-relation laws. We are very anxious that disputes be settled at the State level insofar as it is possible. Can the gentleman give us assurance on that proposition, so that it is a matter of record, that that is the sense of the language and of the report?"

He is speaking of the conference report which became the final act after the President's veto had been overridden.

"Mr. HARTLEY. That is the sense of the language of the bill and of the report. That is my interpretation of the bill, that this will not interfere with the State of Wisconsin in the administration of its own laws. In other words, this will not interfere with the validity of the laws within that State.

"Mr. KERSTEN of Wisconsin. And it will permit as many of these disputes to be settled at the State level as possible?

"Mr. HARTLEY. Exactly."

It is difficult for me to understand how anyone could conceive of Congress intending to preempt for the Federal Government a field of such vital importance to the general public—which had been entered by many local and State governments—without providing a substitute for local procedure, under an act which contained in its declaration of policy the statement—and I now quote from the declaration of policy in the Taft-Hartley Act—"and above all recognize under law that neither party has any right in its relations with any other to engage in acts or practices which would jeopardize the public health, safety, or interest"; and also the words—and I quote again from the policy statement of the Taft-Hartley Act—"and to protect the rights of the public in connection with labor disputes affecting commerce." In my opinion, the majority opinion of the Supreme Court went completely contrary to the expressed declaration of policy in the act, without specific language in the body of the act to justify such a departure; and by this interpretation the Supreme Court accomplished in part what the act was trying to prevent, by declaring void all protective State laws dealing with strikes in public utilities and thereby permitting the public health and safety to be placed in jeopardy during public-utility strikes.

Congress made provision for threatened and actual strikes which would "if permitted to occur or continue, imperil the national health or safety," and provided authority for the President of the United States to set in motion investigatory and judicial processes which would at least prevent a work stoppage for a period of 80 days, during which conciliation, mediation, arbitration, and continued collective bargaining could operate to effect a settlement of the dispute. However, in the opinion of the majority of the Supreme Court, it left under the law a situation where the health, safety, and general welfare of the same people can be jeopardized without restriction when they are affected in small groups—that is, on a State or local level rather than a national level.

The dissenting opinion by Mr. Justice Frankfurter, concurred in by the other two justices already mentioned, states clearly what I believe to be not only the proper interpretation of the intent of Congress in this regard, but the only reasonable and logical interpretation. Speaking for the minority of the Court Mr. Justice Frankfurter stated:

"But the careful consideration given to the problem of meeting nationwide emergencies and the failure to provide for emergencies other than those affecting the Nation as a whole do not imply paralysis of State police power. Rather, they imply that the States retain the power to protect the public interest in emergencies economically and practically confined within a State. It is not reasonable to impute to Congress the desire to leave States helpless in meeting local situations when Congress restricted national intervention to national emergencies."

Florida is one of the States which has had its laws dealing with this subject declared invalid as a result of this decision of the Supreme Court.

In 1947, by a vote of 33 to 0 in the State senate, and 74 to 12 in the house, the Florida Legislature passed a law requiring compulsory conciliation and arbitration when a stalemate has been reached in the collective bargaining process between employer and employee of a public utility, as defined in the act.

Briefly, the Florida law defines the term "public utility employer" as an employer engaged "in the business of rendering electric power, light, heat, gas, water, communication, or transportation services to the public of this State," and then sets up a procedure to be followed when the collective bargaining processes reach an impasse and stalemate, which includes:

First. The appointment by the Governor of a conciliator who must effect a settlement within 30 days after appointment—an additional 15 days may be allowed by the Governor.

Second. If the conciliation effort is unsuccessful the Governor may appoint an arbitration board which must hand down its decision within 60 days after appointment—the Governor may for good cause extend that period 30 days.

Third. Within 15 days after the date of an order of the arbitration board, either party may petition the circuit court for a review of such order.

Fourth. Thereafter, any interested party may appeal to the Supreme Court of Florida.

Those were reasonable conditions, and they were designed to be fair and reasonable to all concerned, and particularly to the general public, who have such a vital stake in having a continuance of such services as light, power, heat, gas, and the like.

The Governor may proceed with the action stated only after concluding that the dispute, if not settled, "will cause or is likely to cause the interruption of the supply of a service on which the community affected is so dependent that the hardship would be inflicted on a substantial number of persons by a cessation of such service."

From and after the filing of a petition for the appointment of a conciliator, and until and unless the Governor shall determine that the failure to settle the dispute with respect to which such petition relates would not cause severe hardship to be inflicted on a substantial number of persons, no interruptions of work and no strikes or slowdowns by the employees, and no lockout or other work stoppage by the employer, are permitted, until the statutory procedure has been exhausted or during the effective period of any order issued by the board of arbitration pursuant to the law.

I think Senators will be interested in the origin of the language contained in the Florida law, because it shows a willingness to work together on the part of the representatives of the public, unions, and employers—a willingness which I wish existed at this level of Government.

After a hearing had been held before a senate committee of the State Legislature of Florida on this subject, the committee requested labor and public utility officials to get together and come up with language for a bill, which was mutually satisfactory, and the bill which was unanimously passed by the senate, and passed by an overwhelming majority in the house, as I have indicated, was drafted at a conference participated in by the chief counsel of the State federation of labor and the State president of the American Federation of Labor.

It is comforting to know that reasonable men from labor and management can still sit down and come up with effective and mutually satisfactory programs for the protection of the public health and safety when properly encouraged to do so, and that is exactly what happened with reference to this Florida law. With such cooperation from public-spirited representatives of labor and management being exhibited concerning this subject in my State, it was indeed discouraging to have a U.S. Supreme Court decision result in our law being declared invalid by our State supreme court.

The supreme court of Florida, which rendered its decision on May 5, 1953, declaring invalid the Florida public utilities arbitration law, based its conclusion entirely on the decision of the U.S. Supreme Court in the so-called Wisconsin case.

Mr. President, I call attention to two tables which were printed in the labor hearings last year and also in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 13, 1958. I have been advised by the Library of Congress that these tables are still accurate, based on the latest information available to the Library.

I shall not read these tables, but they show that 17 States—plus Hawaii—have somewhat similar laws on this subject. Table 6 is entitled "Regulation of Disputes in Public Utilities, etc." Table 7 is entitled "Compulsory Mediation and Arbitration."

I include two tables to be printed in the RECORD in connection with this statement.

Of interest in table 6 is disclosure of the fact that even since the Wisconsin case two States, realizing the need for some kind of machinery to protect the public in such matters—Virginia in 1952 and Maryland in 1956—have enacted State laws regulating disputes in public utilities cases.

The treatment of this subject in these laws varies greatly. Some of them ban strikes and lockouts under a statutory procedure for compulsory arbitration, as in Florida; some provide for seizure and operation by the State; one permits no strikes until 60 days after written notice of intention to strike to a board of mediation and the other party; others do not ban strikes but provide penalties for picketing and sabotage, or provide for mediation of disputes; and various other methods are employed to handle the problem—the methods which are acceptable to the people of the particular State, as enacted in laws passed by the State legislature.

Different States have different methods for handling such matters, but certainly they should be permitted to take jurisdiction over labor-management problems in a local field of such vital concern to the local people.

[1] The U.S. Supreme Court in decisions in 1923 and 1925 declared that it is unconstitutional to fix wages by compulsory arbitration in the meatpacking industry. However, the act may still apply to the railroad and public utilities industries.
[2] Act unconstitutional, in opinion of State attorney general.
[3] If no agreement reached, a public hearing panel is established which must make recommendations for settling the dispute.

I have presented the basic facts as I understand them concerning the no man's land in connection with preventing stoppage of service by public utilities, and without reargueing the Wisconsin case, it is perfectly clear to me that the major proponents of the Taft-Hartley Act never intended any such result when that act was passed. Regardless of that fact, however, the basic problem is with us—it is serious—and it demands early attention.

The problem has been demanding early attention for 8 years. The Senator from Florida, along with other Senators, has been endeavoring to correct this problem for 8 years. We finally brought it to the floor last year under circumstances which made favorable action impossible.

I think it should be said in complete justice to the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee, the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], that in a former debate on this subject on the floor he expressed sympathy with our problem and a willingness to help solve it. We hope that sympathy and willingness will show themselves in the attitude of the distinguished Senator as a leader today.

I desire to read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 100, part 5, page 6113, from the debate upon a measure amending the Taft-Hartley law in that year. I shall quote two paragraphs from the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, with the full understanding that any Senator has the right to quote the entire statement. I am not seeking in any way to embarrass anybody. I simply want to show there is sympathy, but when it comes to favorable action we have not been able to get any.

I read this paragraph, as a quotation from the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts:

"I know the Senator from Florida is entirely sincere in his desire to permit the States to protect themselves in cases of emergency. I believe the Federal Government has such authority under the Taft-Hartley Act, and that, therefore, the States should have it."

The Senator's philosophy and mine are completely on all fours as to that. I, too, think the States should have the power. I agree completely with the statement then made by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts. I continue to quote:

"I would not object if the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. Smith] were drawn in language sufficiently specific to provide for State action in a case involving a public utility employer whose work involved the lives of the people, but not in a field as broad as that defined in the Florida statute."

A little later in the same debate in another paragraph there is a statement which shows the considered judgment of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts at that time, and I believe his judgment is the same at this time:

"I should like to join the Senator from Florida in attempting to ascertain whether we can agree upon amendatory language which would really give the States the right to deal with genuine emergencies, under language drawn with sufficient care so that it will not permit the States to stray over into a wide area which hitherto has been under the protection of the Federal act."

The subcommittee headed by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts was the first committee in 7 years gracious enough to allow the Senator from Florida the opportunity to be heard upon this measure. I express my grateful thanks to the Senator for that consideration. Unfortunately, however, nothing came of it.

During the course of the hearings, the Senator from Massachusetts expressed again his feeling that the Florida law might be a little broad. Senators will find that statement in the colloquy which took place.

In the effort to meet the views of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, the Senator from Florida redrafted the amendment proposed by him and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON] to the labor bill last year, so as to leave out some matters which perhaps are not as vital, such as the operation of a bridge, the operation of a tunnel, sanitation and communication services. Nevertheless, the amendment was defeated, not on its merits, but as I stated earlier, because of tactical reasons.

The amendments proposed today have again been prepared to meet the major objections of the Senator from Massachusetts. The amendments as now proposed cover what seems to the Senator from Florida to be the mere skeleton or the mere essence of what is required in any civilized community in order that the public interest may be safeguarded. That essence is stated in the amendments now pending in the following words:

"Nothing in this Act or the Labor-Management Relations Act, shall be construed to nullify the provisions of any State or Territorial law which regulate or qualify the right of employees of a public utility to strike, or which prohibit strikes by such employees.

"As used in this subsection the term 'public utility' means an employer engaged in the business of furnishing water, light, heat, gas, electric power, or passenger transportation services to the public."

To me that is the mere essence of services which are taken for granted and are completely vital to the functioning of a civilized community.

In my State we have had some experience with this situation. I regret to have to so report to the Senate. I have already mentioned that in a case passed upon by the Florida Supreme Court, the United States Supreme Court decision in the Wisconsin case was followed in such a way as to knock out the Florida statute. I think our court was correct in its action. After all, the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States was binding. When we reach the time when we do not so regard it, we shall be drifting toward a dangerous situation.

I again remind Senators that the Supreme Court decision was not a unanimous one on the part of the Court, but that there were able Justices on each side. If anything, the opinion of the dissenting or minority Justices is even stronger and more completely acerbic in wording than the opinion of the majority of the Court in that case.

That particular case arose in the city of Miami, and grew out of the local transit system strike, a strike which resulted in the very great hurt of the city and its people, but particularly to the hurt of people who work with their hands and who have to patronize the public-utility transportation system, not having cars of their own in which to go to their places of work.

I have had repeatedly made to me by humble citizens of my own State both within unions and outside of unions—and I certainly agree with them—the point that the people of humble background economically and the people who work with their hands, many of whom do not have cars of their own and could not move out of the city, if there should be a stoppage of power, light, electricity, or gas, but would have to continue to live in their humble surroundings, would be the ones worse hurt if there were a stoppage or a shutdown of any of these public utilities.

During the debate on this question last year, I called attention to the fact that the city of Jacksonville, Fla.—the second largest in the State—was then in its 81st day of a strike in its bus system. The strike finally ended after being in effect for 83 days. I called attention at that time to an editorial in the Tampa Tribune indicating how seriously our people were affected by this situation and also showing, I think, the feeling of the majority of our people, that the State should be allowed to deal effectively with such interruptions of these vital services.

I attach to this statement excerpts from an editorial, published in the Tampa Tribune, entitled "Make 'Em Give It Back, Senator."

The Senator from Florida did not so plan it, but again this year when the Senate debate on labor legislation began, we had in progress in Florida a major strike against a public utility which illustrated clearly the need for action in this field. I am glad to say that strikers went back to work day before yesterday, April 22, after the strike had been in progress for 30 days. This was a strike of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers against the Gulf Power Co., which has its headquarters in Pensacola, Fla.

There was no issue regarding wages or working conditions. The sole issue was whether the union could compel the company to recognize the union as the representative for foremen. Incidentally, of 65 first line supervisors (including forman) 58, or about 90 percent, stayed on the job. It was a bitter strike. After the first 3 days of the strike the Pensacola Journal made the following comment in an editorial on the subject:

"Violence and threats of violence, sabotage and attempts at sabotage have marked the short period since members of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers struck the Gulf Power Co. in an effort to gain union control of foremen and supervisors.

"A bomb scare; threat of personal injury to an unaffected woman employee; attempts to short circuit power lines, some of which have been successful, causing blackouts; the beating of a telephone company repairman who crossed a picket line to do his job; threats against store operators who receive power bill payments as a public service. These are some of the incidents which occurred in the first 3 days of the strike."

Subsequent to that time we saw headlines such as "Two More Gulf Poles Wrecked by Blasts—Saboteurs Use Dynamate, Fail To Sever Lines." (Pensacola News-Journal, April 5, 1959.)

Those poles were on a 110,000-volt power line. A complete blackout in the county would have resulted had the lines been severed by the explosion, and the fallen wires would have endangered the very lives of people in the area. A package of dynamite was discovered wrapped around a third pole in the area but fortunately it failed to explode.

I also attach to this statement an editorial from the Pensacola News-Journal of April 5, 1959, which I think sums up this situation briefly, tersely, and fairly.

Had not the U.S. Supreme Court in the 1951 ruling held that the Congress had preempted this entire field, this strike—and the bus strike last year in Jacksonville—could have been prevented and the matter handled under the Florida public utilities arbitration law which I described earlier in my remarks. Certainly the Congress has a duty to the general public to correct this abominable situation, which, in my opinion, in the opinion of a minority of the Supreme Court, and in the opinion of the major sponsors of the Taft-Hartley Act was never intended. I hope the pending amendments will be adopted.

"[From the Tampa Morning Tribune, May 3, 1958]

"MAKE 'EM GIVE IT BACK, SENATOR

"A strike which has shut down Jacksonville's transit line for 38 days points up a neglected congressional duty which Florida Senator SPESSARD HOLLAND is trying to persuade Congress to perform.

"Florida and nine other States formerly had laws requiring arbitration of labor disputes affecting public utilities and transportation systems. But in 1951, in a case arising in Wisconsin, the U.S. Supreme Court held that Congress, in passing the Taft-Hartley law and the National Labor Relations Act, had 'closed to State regulation the field of peaceful strikes in industries affecting commerce.'

"Whether this was the intent of Congress, we don't know. But the fact remains that in the ensuing 7 years Congress has done nothing to restore to the State the power to deal with strikes affecting public utilities.

"Senator HOLLAND has vainly introduced the necessary bill in three pervious sessions of Congress. Undismayed, he again submitted one the other day in cooperation with Senator A. WILLIS ROBERTSON, of Virginia.

"If Florida had its old law in effect, the shutdown of the Jacksonville bus system presumably could have been avoided. The Governor could have invoked procedures requiring labor and management to submit their differences to arbitration and keep the buses running in the meantime.

"As matters stand, the State can do nothing. Neither, apparently, can the city of Jacksonville.

"A bus shutdown, as Tampa knows from past experience, can cause great public inconvenience and economic loss. But it's nothing compared to the public dangers of a strike in electric, gas, telephone, or water systems.

"There's no excuse for strikes of this kind, where the innocent public is the chief sufferer. Labor and management both ought to have enough sense of responsibility to arbitrate their differences, if they can't agree. Since they sometimes fail their responsibility, the State should have power to compel arbitration.

"Congress ought never to have taken this power from the States. But since, in the Supreme Court's view, it did, it should put an end to 7 years of procrastination and give back to the States what is rightfully theirs."

"[From the Pensacola New-Journal, Apr. 5, 1959]

"LOSS OF POWER ENDANGERS LIFE, HEALTH, PROPERTY

"Dynamiting and sawing of powerline poles, endangering electric service to widespread areas including military installations, has caused concern to industries, institutions, and individuals whose very lives may be imperiled and whose property losses could mount enormously if the sabotage proves as effective as apparently intended.

"The cutting of a conveyor belt to stop the big steam powerplant near Chattahoochee, the blasting of a heavy voltage pole and an attempt to dynamite another are no little misdemeanors. They threatened the complete shutdown of the power pool which supplies this whole northwest Florida area, including Eglin Air Force Proving Ground, the naval air installations and the numerous industries that depend on power.

"Stoppage of the continuous operation at Chemstrand would cost that nylon manufacturing plant hundreds of thousands of dollars.

"Loss of power at a dairy meant that 170 milk cows had to suffer until service was restored, to say nothing of the potential damage to the dairyman's business.

"One individual called the News-Journal to say he had arisen late because his electric alarm was cut off, he had no hot water to shave or bathe as his water was pumped and heated by electricity, his refrigeration was out and his food and milk might spoil, and he had no lights.

"Homes with freezers would lose much food, babies would be denied milk, newspapers and radio stations would be unable to function, persons undergoing operations in hospitals would be endangered, city and private water supplies would be imperiled if pumps stopped, fire hazards would be increased, loss of sewerage service might affect public health—all of these and more could come to pass if a large area were without electric power for any length of time.

"The hardships and perils are too great to contemplate fully, yet they are incurred every time someone breaks a powerline, or saws a pole or cuts an important belt in a system geared to serve northwest Florida.

"Such lack of regard for fellow citizens' lives and property is criminal irresponsibility meriting drastic punishment and should be met with every possible safeguard even if vigilance committees have to go into action to prevent such awful contingencies."

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I am prepared to yield back all but 2 minutes of my time, if the Senator from Florida is prepared to yield back his time.

Mr. HOLLAND. I reserve 2 minutes only.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Florida has expired.

Mr. HOLLAND. Then I yield back my remaining time. [Laughter.]

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I must reluctantly oppose the amendment offered by my friend from Florida. This is an extremely complicated subject.

Many of the examples cited by the Senator caused great inconvenience to the people of the areas involved, but in my opinion they are not comparable to the difficulties which the Nation would face by reason of a major disruption of service in an industry essential to the economy of the country. Yet the Taft-Hartley Act did not provide that there should be any qualification of the right of employees of public utilities to strike, or that there should be compulsory arbitration of disputes in these industries.

If the carriers do not operate in Jacksonville, that is an inconvenience; but every strike involves inconvenience. I would not be willing to see such an amendment adopted on the floor of the Senate on the basis of the case of the 170 cows whose milk went out by reason of a stoppage of electric power.

They could have been milked by hand. I do not believe that that case warrants acceptance on the floor of the Senate of what is in effect a measure for compulsory arbitration, particularly when the courts have the power to act in cases in which the health, safety, and basic welfare of the citizens of the State are at stake. The courts have been given by the States the power to seize industries to protect the public health and safety.

I have agreed, as chairman of the subcommittee, that there will be 1 or 2 days—or perhaps more—of hearings within the next 40 days. Whatever the opinion of the subcommittee may be, the measure will be reported to the full committee for a vote upon it and other related amendments in this field.

On that basis I hope the Senator from Florida will be satisfied.

Mr. HOLLAND. What is the attitude of the chairman of the full committee on this question?

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL] has agreed to that procedure.

Mr. HOLLAND. For 8 years we have been trying to get such a measure out of committee, but even during the incumbency of my distinguished friend from Alabama and my equally distinguished friend from Massachusetts, we have never been able to succeed. I hope this means that we shall have action. I hope, however, that the Senate will take the matter out of the hands of the committee now by taking favorable action on this very simple amendment, to restore to the States the power to handle, under their own laws, these relatively few vital industries.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield 30 seconds to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER].

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, as the ranking minority member of the subcommittee I will lend my assistance toward expediting action upon this proposal. I realize, as does the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee, that bringing such a measure to the floor of the Senate could open up the Taft-Hartley Pandora's box.

I will lend every effort to see that the activity is confined to this single piece of legislation, and I am sure that my Republican colleagues will go along with me in that statement.

Mr. HOLLAND. May I ask the distinguished Senator whether or not the Pandora's box would be opened if the Senate were to adopt the amendment today?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Let me say to the Senator from Florida that I am in sympathy with his situation. My State has a law to control this activity. I believe that the proposed legislation should be a little more carefully drafted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Arizona has expired.

All time on the amendment has expired or been yielded back.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, have the yeas and nays been ordered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They have not.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. May we see if enough Senators are present to order the yeas and nays.

Mr. HOLLAND. I think that would be preferable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida withdraw his suggestion of the absence of a quorum?

Mr. HOLLAND. I will, if there are enough Senators present to order the yeas and nays.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Will the Senator from Florida agree to withdraw his suggestion of the absence of a quorum?

Mr. HOLLAND. I withdraw the request for a quorum call, with the understanding that an effort will be made to have the yeas and nays ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the Holland amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND]. On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] is absent on official business.

I also announce that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. BIBLE] is absent because of a death in his family.

I further announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR] is absent because of illness.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. BIBLE] would each vote "nay."

Mr. KUCHEL. I announce that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] is necessarily absent.

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CARLSON] is absent on official business.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] is necessarily absent, and if present and voting would vote "nay."

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL] is detained on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 64, as follows:

So Mr. HOLLAND's amendment was rejected.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I move that the Senate reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I move that the motion be laid on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I ask Senators to remain on the floor of the Senate. The chairman of the subcommittee tells me he expects that three or four amendments will be offered, and that he does not anticipate any controversial amendments will be offered from now on. I should like to have the yeas and nays ordered on the passage of the bill. I hope we may have a rollcall within a matter of minutes.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I ask that an amendment I have at the desk be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from North Carolina will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 59, line 7, it is proposed to strike out "thirty" and insert in lieu thereof "forty-five."

At the end of line 7, it is proposed to insert "receipt of notice of the filing of the."

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, the amendment merely makes a change in the minimum time for the holding of an election after the receipt of notice of the filing of a petition for an election from 30 days to 45 days, being an extension of 15 days. The amendment makes it definite that the time is to be counted from the date of the notice of the filing of the petition.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I accept the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina and yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I call up my amendment which is at the desk, and I ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. At the end of the bill it is proposed to add a new section, as follows:

SEC. . Section 10 of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof a new subsection as follows:

"(m) Whenever it is charged that any person has engaged in an unfair labor practice within the meaning of subsection (a) (3) or (b) (2) of section 8, such charge shall be given priority over all other cases except cases of like character in the office where it is filed or to which it is referred and cases given priority under subsection (l)."

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, the amendment is short. It would accord to cases of individual discrimination, either union inspired or employer inspired, and defined as unfair labor practices under subsections (a) (3) or (b) (2) of section 8 of the Taft-Hartley Act, the same priority of treatment with reference to time as is accorded at present to cases of secondary boycott under section 10 (l) of the act. Incidentally, the Senate yesterday accorded such priority of time treatment to the recognitional picketing cases, which would arise under the Prouty amendment.

The amendment would give priority treatment by the Board offices in cases where an individual, either by employer discrimination or union discrimination, has been deprived of a job and a paycheck. At present, a vast majority of these cases are left hanging on the vine for a period, sometimes amounting to years. These cases deal with individuals out of work, and not with companies who are the subject of economic coercion, as in the secondary boycott or recognitional picketing situation. These cases deal with an individual who has been deprived of a paycheck as a result of an unfair labor practice, not with a case of a group of individuals, currently employed, who are seeking better employment conditions, as in a representation case, which is also by Board policy accorded some type of priority treatment.

If we are to accord priority treatment by the Board in cases involving companies, which are better able to withstand economic coercion than is an individual; if we are to accord priority treatment in cases where employees are being currently paid, but desire improved employment conditions through representation, then why not accord to the cases of individuals who are without job or paycheck the same priority treatment in terms of time.

Mr. KENNEdy. Mr. President, I accept the amendment. I am prepared to yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MUNDT. I call up my amendment designated "4–21–59—E" and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 38, line 5, it is proposed to strike out "factual statements of issues."

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, before speaking on the amendment, I should like to say, in response to several inquiries I have had from Senators as to the significance of the word "teller" in my amendment to the elections section of the bill amendment which was adopted earlier, providing for the appointment of tellers. So as to make the legislative history complete, Black's Law Dictionary gives the following definition:

Teller: One who numbers or counts. An officer of a bank who receives or pays out money. Also one appointed to count the votes cast in a deliberative or legislative assembly or other meeting.

It was in that latter connection that the word "teller" was used.

With respect to the amendment now under consideration, I have discussed the matter with the Senator from Massachusetts. On page 38, line 5, there is an exemption of the prohibitions against the use of labor union money for campaign purposes. Such a factual statement of issues would be manifestly unfair if such money were employed in political campaigns, where one side could utilize union funds to campaign for itself, while the other side could not. It would be like legalizing the franking privilege of Senators for political purposes.

I think, from a conference I have had with the chairman of the subcommittee, we can develop that that was not the original intention of the committee, and the language can be clarified by modification.

Mr. KENNEDY. The purpose of the language is to provide, not information of one kind or another involving candidates, but rather information regarding the dates of elections, whether the dues may be changed, and amendments to the constitution by by-laws.

In order that there may be no doubt about it, I wonder if the Senator would be willing to change the amendment which strikes out "factual statements at issue" and to insert after "issues" on line 5 the words, "not involving candidates."

Mr. MUNDT. That is perfectly satisfactory to me. What I am trying to prevent is the absence of fair play in union elections. Since the language was used in the section and the title of the bill dealing with elections, I assumed it dealt with that subject. If we have the legislative history that the use of labor union money is to be solely for the purpose of factual issues dealing with internal union affairs and with union matters not involving candidacies, I will accept the suggestion of the chairman of the committee and modify my amendment accordingly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from South Dakota is modified accordingly.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment, as modified, offered by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT].

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask that an amendment which I have at the desk be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 23, line 14, after "Act" it is proposed to insert "pertaining to the filing of reports or disclosures."

On line 15, after "hereunder," it is proposed to insert "pertaining thereto."

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, the amendment merely clarifies that the injunctive powers of the Secretary of Labor in this bill are confined to compelling the filing of reports. The amendment was prepared with the help of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS]. I think it is satisfactory. I ask the Senate to accept it. If there is no opposition, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, subsection (d) of section 108 on page 21 of the bill provides that the individual who is required to sign reports under the reporting provisions of title I "shall be personally responsible for the filing of such reports and for any statement contained therein."

I can understand how the fixing of this responsibility upon an identifiable individual will promote the timely filing of truthful reports as required by the act.

I can also understand the necessity and propriety of imposing criminal penalties upon such an individual who, with evil motive and guilty knowledge, fails to file such reports, or files reports containing false statements. Subsections (a), (b), and (c) of section 108 on page 20, impose criminal penalties for such misconduct.

In my view, the words "willfully" and "knowingly" in these penalty provisions would preclude criminal conviction for the honest or unintentional errors or omissions of that individual, although guilty knowledge or willfulness is not included in the language of subsection 108(d) itself.

Is that also the understanding of the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator from Kentucky is correct. The sole purpose of section 108(d) is to make clear that the individuals required to sign reports are subject to prosecution when they willfully violate sections 108 (a), (b), or (c). This also applies to similar provisions in the trusteeship title.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass? Four minutes remain to the proponents of the bill; 36 minutes remain to the opponents.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield me 5 minutes?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, now that we are approaching the final vote, I wish to express my appreciation to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] for the very gentlemanly and kind way in which he treated me and my staff throughout this procedure.

I also wish, inasmuch as they are in the Chamber, to thank Dr. Cox and his staff for the help which they have given us during these days.

I would be remiss in my duty to my conscience if I did not pay my particular respects to Mr. Michael Bernstein, the chief of staff of the Republican side of the committee, and also to Jim Constantine, who has been here on behalf of the National Labor Relations Board. They have provided invaluable help.

I have enjoyed working with the Senator from Massachusetts and his staff. We have not always agreed, but we still, nevertheless, remain friends and know each other better. I hope he feels that that is as advantageous to him as I certainly feel it is to myself.

Mr. President, for more than 2 years the McClellan committee has revealed, almost daily, to the horrified gaze of the public, a shocking picture of corruption, racketeering, and dictatorship in some segments of the labor-management field, and a high potential for such misconduct in many of those areas which are still uncorrupted. The American public demanded effective measures to halt these dangerous conditions and trends, and the U.S. Senate proceeded to develop legislation. It labored long and mightly; and, like the proverbial mountain, it brought forth the proverbial mouse, although, Mr. President, I will say that this mouse has, today, a great deal more muscle than it had when it was born. The bill, as now developed by this body, in terms of its effect on the evil conditions it professes to cure, is like a fleabite to a bull elephant. It not only omits provisions for even the slightest additional control of the flagrant evils of the secondary boycott, but in many of its provisions it does not accomplish what it gives the appearance of seeking to do. Even if unintended, the end result of this bill in its present form will be to mislead the American public into the false belief that adequate measures have been adopted to cope with the evils they abhor.

Mr. President, I do not choose to be a party to this deception. I shall vote against the bill; and I shall regard it as my duty, not only as a Senator, but also as an American citizen, to utilize every possible opportunity to enlighten the public about how they have been deceived.

Mr. President, the American public may have been deceived momentarily; but I do not believe they can be fooled for long.

In closing, again I wish to pay tribute to the chairman of our committee, the distinguished senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN]. I am sorry the bill, as it now stands, does not deal effectively with the evils which the Senator from Arkansas has so courageously shown—during his 2 years of labor as chairman of the McClellan committee which has been investigating these rackets, and during which time the committee has spent nearly $1 million in its work—to exist.

If the bill reflected even the minimum of what we suggested last year, in our interim report, I could vote for this bill.

Mr. President, it is difficult for me to say this; I want the chairman of my committee to understand why I say it, and I want all other Members of the Senate to understand why I say it: But I believe that now, after 2 years of labor, that we have not produced a more effective bill than this one, we should give serious consideration to whether it is wise to proceed further with the investigation—by means of what we know as the McClellan committee—of such activities.

I have hoped that we would develop a bill which would amount to much more than this one does.

Let me say that I very greatly appreciate the conscientious work which has been done on the bill by all Members of the Senate. But I believe the bill falls far short of what was expected by the American people, except in respect of certain provisions of the bill which deal with certain small areas of the labor field.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MONRONEY in the chair). Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I do not want this debate to close without paying tribute to two distinguished Senators; I refer to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN]. There are many others whom I should mention; but these two Senators, in particular, have fought hard in the interest not only of the public, but also of the rank-and-file union members. The program of these Senators has not been adopted; but I hope their efforts have not been in vain.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, we are coming to the end of a long-hard road. We are almost at the end of it because Members of the Senate have been helpful and cooperative.

I rise to express my great admiration for the industry and the intelligence of the able chairman of the subcommittee, Mr. KENNEDY, who held long hearings, brought the bill to the floor, and explained it and defended it to each Member of the Senate. Our thanks are due also to the able and distinguished chairman of the committee [Mr. HILL], who is always prudent and always working for his country.

I also wish to express my great admiration for the magnificent contribution made on this entire subject by the distinguished senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN]. I seriously doubt that there would have been any bill, except for the revelations made by the committee headed by Senator MCCLELLAN. I know this bill is stronger because of him.

I also wish to express my appreciation to the other members of his committee, both the majority members and the minority members, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. CHURCH], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS], and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART]. They have rendered a great service to the American people, and I know they will continue to do so.

Congratulations are due to the assistant minority leader [Mr. KUCHEL] and his associates for the careful work they did in drafting an amendment which made a major contribution to the effectiveness of this legislation.

Mr. President, this bill is not the first labor bill that a Congress has considered, nor, I predict, will it be the last.

Finally, Mr. President, all this work has been made possible because of the dedicated efforts of a group of staff members who have done an outstanding job in this field. I refer to Professor Cox, to Mr. Dungan, to the minority staff member who was associated with Senator Goldwater, and to Mr. Merrick. I wish to commend all of them for their outstanding work.

Mr. President, during our discussions and deliberations we have not always agreed; but we have been able to disagree without being disagreeable.

I believe the Senate is to be commended for its action; and I hope that shortly the bill will go to the other body.

Mr. President, I promised to yield for a moment to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE]; and I now yield to him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee is recognized.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I have watched, listened, and to a reasonable extent, participated in this debate, which I think will be an historic debate, for the reason that this bill, in my view, has a good prospect of becoming the law of the land.

I have been impressed with the breadth of the talent which has been demonstrated by the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY]. I have also been impressed with his knowledge of this vexatious problem and with his knowledge of the legislative history of the previous efforts to deal with it. I have also been impressed with his grasp of the proper methods, as well as the improper ones—with his ability to differentiate between proper and effective methods, on the one hand, and improper and ineffective methods, on the other.

I saw Mr. KENNEDY win his spurs as a Member of the House of Representatives. I believe he had already won his spurs in this Chamber long before this. But certainly he has done so now; he has won his spurs as an effective, productive leader of the U.S. Senate.

Likewise, Mr. President, I wish to pay tribute to the distinguished senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN]; to the distinguished senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN], the coauthor, with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], of the bill; to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER]; to the Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL]; to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. CHURCH]; and to other Senators whom I could name.

Mr. President, this debate and our deliberations have been fruitful. We have now brought to the point of passage a bill which, in my opinion, is better than many of us expected we could achieve.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes to the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa is recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, because I expect to vote for the passage of this bill, and because my vote may be misunderstood, I think I should state in a very few words why I shall vote for the bill.

I shall vote for the bill, although it contains a very small amount of good—which has been placed in it on the floor of the Senate. The small amount of good which the bill contains is on the plus side of the ledger.

Mr. President, I am not a member of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare or of the McClellan committee. I was not associated with the studies which preceded the bill. But, so far as I am concerned, when the bill came to the floor of the Senate, it was, in my opinion, mistakenly labeled a labor-reform bill. In my judgment, then it was not at all a labor-reform bill. Instead, it was merely a glossing over of ulcers which exist in certain sections of labor; and it would have accomplished nothing. It did not inhibit in any material way, so far as I could see, the glaring abuses disclosed by the arduous efforts of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN], in the course of the long hearings his committee held. That bill was a subterfuge, according to my interpretation of its terms; and it did nothing to reach the evils which exist today.

In my judgment the bill now before us does very little more; and if, today, it is to be denominated a labor-reform bill, that is just as much a mistaken denomination as it was on the day when the bill came from the committee.

But the bill now contains one or two provisions—and they were put into it on the floor of the Senate—which I believe provide just a little bit of an approach to the beginning of an attempt to solve some of the outstanding and glaring evils that exist.

In my judgment, it is too bad that the Senate of the United States has not faced up to this issue squarely and has not taken the responsibility to enact legislation to deal with the corruption and the autocracy which today exist in unions that control the destiny of the workingmen.

In the interest of the laboring man himself, this bill fails to meet adequately those requirements. I think it is too bad, I think it is tragic; but because there is a little "plus" in this bill, I expect to vote for it—not because I am deluded for one moment into thinking it is a labor-reform bill, or even begins to approach the requirements of a labor-reform bill, as disclosed in the hearings which have been held by the McClellan committee for the past couple of years.

I had hoped we would seize this opportunity to write a bill which would be in the interest of the laboring people and in the interest of the public in general. I feel that not only have we fallen far short of that objective, but have not even approached it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Iowa has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota is recognized for 2 minutes.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I said in my part of the debate on April 20, before we got to the amendment stage of this bill, that there were two ways in which the Senate could approach this very grievous labor-reform problem. One was for the Senate to take legislative action which would empower the Government with new authority to restrict and restrain some of the improper practices which have been disclosed by the McClellan committee. The other was to give the trade-union members themselves the democratic tools empowering them to get good and law-abiding and honest officers, and to get rid of dishonest officers and get rid of improper union practices. I said that at this juncture of history I preferred to employ this second tactic.

The Senate has moved a long way, by adopting amendments on the floor, toward strengthening the hand of honest officials of unionism and the rank-and-file members of unions, who, in the main, want good unions and desire that they operate appropriately.

The Senate has moved, at a snail's pace, and only a very short distance, toward enacting a new law which would give the Government power to remedy improper practices. However, I do feel that in the more than 30 amendments which have been added to the bill from the floor of the Senate we have moved in the direction of giving important new democratic tools to rank-and-file union members, with which I hope they may be able to do a good job of cleaning up the improper practices which we as legislators have not undertaken to do by way of legislative mandate.

Some very significant amendments have been adopted from the Senate floor. The one relating to the bonding of union officials has made a great contribution to the elimination of some of the improper practices. The amendment establishing a fiduciary relationship as between fiscal officers of unions and the other union members was a Trojan step forward. In this connection, may I commend the Senator from Massachusetts, the chairman of the subcommittee, the majority leader, and other Senators, who have given us an entirely different atmosphere this year in which to legislate, as against a year ago.

Senators will remember that a year ago there was a stubborn adamancy against accepting amendments from the floor of the Senate. There was a determination to force through the Kennedy-Ives bill as it was reported from committee, and it passed in that form. It lacked merit and appeal to such an extent that it never got out of the House committee on the other side of the Capitol.

We approached the bill as legislative carpenters this time. I welcome the cooperative attitude of the majority leader and the chairman of the committee in recognizing that there were some suggestions from outside the committee room which should be offered and adopted. Over 30 times in this debate the Senate expressed itself affirmatively in relation to amendments offered on the floor, and I think, in the main, constructively and mostly in the direction of strengthening the rights of individual union members in this country. As a consequence of this floor action, the bill we are now about to approve is very substantially a better and more effective measure than the Kennedy-Ives bill of a year ago. In the main, it is the individual union member who has been abused. In the main, it is he who has been hurt by improper practices and by union labor leaders who are in certain instances corrupt or arrogant.

Mr. President, since we have moved in the direction of strengthening the hands of rank and file union members, I shall vote for this bill on the final rollcall.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky is recognized for 2 minutes.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, I know Senators wish to vote, and I shall not speak at length. I take the floor only because it has been said here, and I suppose it will continue to be said, that this bill represents nothing. As one member of the labor committee, I feel I would be unfair to myself, and to my colleagues on the committee on this side of the aisle who worked faithfully on the bill, and believe the bill represents something, if I did not say that I disagree categorically with such statement.

Mr. President, of course, fault will be found with the bill. It does not include everything that either labor or management wants, and undoubtedly it contains provisions that they do not like; but we are dealing with a difficult subject—and the public interest as well. After weeks of discussion and effort, we brought out the best bill we could.

I may say that it is not by speeches which simply assert that the bill is bad, that we have been able to accomplish any results. It is by tireless work, and efforts to negotiate, that it has been possible to improve and develop a fair bill. I make this statement in view of the charge which has been made.

I point out that it was chiefly through the efforts of those of us on this side of the aisle who are not so extreme that we were able to get into the bill provisions relating to picketing, fiduciary relationship, no man's land, and even the bill of rights which was finally agreed upon. Those are some of the provisions that many Senators wanted in the bill, but I point out that they were included in the bill as a result of the effort of some of us who were a little more moderate. And they were accepted generally by both Republicans and Democrats.

Having made that statement, Mr. President, I wish to pay my respects and express my appreciation to the members of the staff on both sides of the aisle who worked with us. I wish to pay my respects also to our colleague, the ranking member of our committee, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] for his conscientious work and his knowledge in this field. And also to our minority leader, for his helpfulness and reasonableness during the debate.

Finally, I pay my respects to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] for his leadership. He did his best to bring to passage an effective and fair bill. He made concessions when he believed them reasonable and just. I believe, after listening to the debate and the discussions in committee, that he knows more than any of us about the law, and the reasons for it.

The bill before the Senate does advance the cause of union democracy. It does provide most effective remedies against corruption, whether by unions or management. We have even made some advances in respect to the Taft-Hartley Act. Out of self-respect and in the name of honesty, these things must be said.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I yield one-half minute to the Senator from New York.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York is recognized for one-half minute.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I merely desire to join my colleague in the sentiments he has expressed. I think he has bespoken for those of us on this side of the aisle who adopted a moderate, working attitude which produced this bill.

I may say to those who wanted a bill which would have required a policeman for every union member, if they think it thorough, they will realize that we now have a bill which can be enforced and invoked, and which will not be a Volstead Act.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield me a half minute?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield a half minute to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I hope the millions and millions and millions of housewives and other Americans who listened to and viewed on their television sets during the past 2 years the McClellan committee investigations will be happy with the bill in its present form. I think they are the ones we ought to take into consideration. I think they are the ones who are interested.

We have spent a couple of million dollars on that investigation. The able Senator from Arkansas worked as hard as any human being could possibly work in respect thereto. I simply want to invite the attention of the Senate to the fact that the people listened to and viewed for 2 years that investigation, and I hope, after the action of the Senate today, they are going to be happy.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote! Vote!

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, if Senators will bear with me for a moment, I have a few remarks to make.

Mr. President, in 1917 when thousands, yes, hundreds of thousands, were urging the President of the United States to permit Theodore Roosevelt to take a division of troops to Europe, Woodrow Wilson finally turned down the request. The then President turned down the request with a very short, eloquent statement, when he said on that occasion, "The business in hand is undramatic."

The business of fashioning a labor bill is undramatic. I echo the sentiment of my distinguished friend from Kentucky. This brings to mind an expression used by a celebrated Boston lawyer in the course of the McCarthy hearings. I refer of course to Joe Welch of Boston. Seldom a day went by that he did not say, "Well, I suppose we will have to continue to plow the long, hard furrow."

In no labor bill is there anything particularly dramatic. But the long, hard furrow has to be plowed, and somebody has to do the work.

I join in testimony to the value of the efforts of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY]. He has the most disarming way of saying "No" of any human being I have ever met. He has been a very effective chairman of the subcommittee. He has been gracious, but he has been firm. We who serve on that subcommittee know of his firmness, because there is very little we got into the bill in committee. Therefore, it became our responsibility on the floor of the Senate to make the case, as boldly and as vigorously as we could.

I hope Senators will not mind if we take a little of the credit today. That is in the best spirit of forbearance which marks the two-party effort in this Senate.

In saying these things, I pay tribute to the majority leader. I presume untutored eyes and untutored ears, looking down on this body last night, might have had some misgivings about what took place, but there was a great restraint on the part of the majority leader, and I must compliment him for it. I can only say to those who look down upon us, in those moments when we so vigorously assert the inner spirit, it brings to mind that old poetic couplet:

> All discord, harmony not understood:
> All partial evil, universal good.

So if the proceedings seem discordant at the moment, they are harmonious nevertheless; it is only that untutored minds do not quite understand that kind of harmony.

I salute the majority leader. I thank the majority leader for his restraint, under rather difficult conditions, which made it possible for us to come back and in great felicity of spirit complete our labors.

We are at the end of the road. We take a little credit. Of some 32 amendments, 15 or 16 have been offered from this side. Some good has been done by preserving the right to sue in the hands of a member, not an officer, of a labor union; by establishing the principle with respect to recognitional picketing; by softening the amendment offered by my distinguished friend from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN] and by mitigating a few of the severities to make it palatable to the Senate by a rather overwhelming majority. That all constitutes a step forward.

I utter the hope that as the bill goes to the House it will not repose in limbo somewhere for 40 days, but will be referred quickly to the appropriate committee of that body. I express the hope that there may be further refinement and further improvement, to meet the hopes and the needs of the country, and that there will yet be enacted into law in this Congress an adequate labor bill.

We speak very often of what labor wants and of what management wants. The great challenge before this body is not what labor wants or what management wants, but it is what the country wants and needs.

Mr. RUSSELL. The public interest.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes, sir. It is the community interest which is involved.

I am glad to say that in all the discussion I think that one thought has been constantly in the minds of all Senators.

We are now prepared to dispose of this bill in the Senate, in the hope that before the present session runs out we shall have made a distinct contribution in this field to the common cause by having the bill enacted into law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Do the Senators yield back the balance of their time?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield back the time remaining to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has been yielded back.

The bill having been read the third time, the question is, Shall it pass? On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] are absent on official business.

I also announce that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. BIBLE] is absent because of a death in his family.

I further announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR] is absent because of illness.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. BIBLE] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] would each vote "yea."

Mr. KUCHEL. I announce that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CARLSON] is absent on official business.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] are necessarily absent.

If present and voting, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CARLSON], and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] would each vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 90, nays 1, as follows:

So the bill (S. 1555) was passed.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that in the engrossment of the bill the Secretary of the Senate be authorized to make clerical and technical corrections in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MORSE. I also ask that the bill be printed as it passed the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CONSTRUCTION OF MODERN NAVAL VESSELS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business which will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (H.R. 3293) to authorize the construction of modern naval vessels.

WITHDRAWAL OF FOREIGN TROOPS FROM GERMANY AND EAST EUROPE

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD an Associated Press dispatch from the Washington Evening Star of April 25, 1959, outlining a statement which I made to the Associated Press and other press associations, as well as to representatives of radio broadcasting companies. My statement dealt with a plan which the Western Powers might well offer to Russia in respect to the Berlin situation.

I ask unanimous consent that the Associated Press dispatch, entitled "Plan Offered by CAPEHART on Troop Issue," be printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PLAN OFFERED BY CAPEHART ON TROOP ISSUE

Senator CAPEHART, Republican of Indiana, yesterday offered a Western program for negotiations on Berlin calling for withdrawal of all foreign troops from Germany and East Europe.

He proposed that the North Atlantic Treaty Organization countries offer to defend both Germany and Russia if either is attacked by the other.

Senator CAPEHART, a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, told a reporter he has not offered his proposals for possible consideration at the foreign ministers and summit conferences but he likely will do so.

He suggested:

1. Western powers remove their troops from West Germany in exchange for the withdrawal of Soviet troops from East Germany, Poland, Czechoslovakia and other satellites.

2. Both East and West Germany agree to forego nuclear weapons arming.

3. The NATO countries agree that if Germany is attacked by Russia, they will go to Germany's aid and that if Russia is attacked by a rearmed Germany, the Western allies will defend Russia.

"On the basis of such an agreement," Senator CAPEHART said, in an interview, "we might then well consider a trade program with Russia."

He said that if his suggestions could be agreed upon at the coming negotiations the way would be opened not only for the reunification of Germany, but greater freedom throughout Eastern Europe.

"We could end up with every one of those countries having their own kind of government," Senator CAPEHART said.

NATIONAL RAILROAD FREIGHT CAR SUPPLY

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, yesterday the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON] introduced the bill (S. 1789) which is designed to insure the adequacy of the national railroad freight car supply by allowing the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix compensation to be paid by one railroad to another for the use of freight cars.

Under the terms of the bill, the Commission must give consideration to the level of freight car ownership and to other factors affecting the adequacy of the national freight car supply. Compensation for the use of such cars under the present law, and its interpretation by the courts, can include only the bare costs of ownership. This bill would either allow compensation to include a fair return on value, or be computed on the basis of value of use of freight cars, or upon any other reasonable basis of compensation as in the judgment of the Interstate Commerce Commission will provide just and reasonable compensation to freight car owners, contribute to sound freight car service practices and encourage the acquisition and maintenance of a freight car supply adequate to meet the needs of commerce and the national defense.

It is, in my opinion, unfortunate that a bill of this sort is necessary. The railroads are constantly complaining that they are not in a position to compete ratewise with other forms of transportation but periodically they find themselves unable to take promptly the business offered them. To the credit of the western railroads, it may be said that they are much more provident about their freight car supply than are the railroads in the East.

This bill will put into play the inexorable force of economics to encourage eastern railroads to return the cars to their owners in the West rather than pay per diem charges reflecting the value of the use of the equipment. Return of such equipment promptly to the West will help alleviate the shortages of cars with which lumber shippers of Oregon periodically are confronted.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business for the consideration of nominations beginning with the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

CHAIRMAN, JOINT CHIEFS OF STAFF

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Gen. Nathan F. Twining to be Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

IN THE ARMY

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Gen. Lyman L. Lemnitzer to be Chief of Staff of the Army for a period of 2 years.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Maj. Gen. Leonard Dudley Heaton to be Surgeon General, U.S. Army.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Maj. Gen. Ralph Thomas Nelson to be Chief Signal Officer, U.S. Army, and as major general in the Regular Army of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

THE RETIRED LIST

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Gen. Maxwell Davenport Taylor to be a general.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Lt. Gen. James Dunne O'Connell to be a lieutenant general.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

REGULAR AIR FORCE

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Maj. Gen. Bernard A. Schriever to be assigned to positions of importance and responsibility designated by the President in the rank of lieutenant general.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Rear Adm. Roy A. Gano to be a vice admiral while serving in certain positions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Adm. Arleigh A. Burke, to be reappointed as Chief of Naval Operations, for a period of 2 years.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President be notified of the nominations confirmed today.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the President will be so notified.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of legislative business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of legislative business.

SECOND SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATION BILL, 1959

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 197, H.R. 5916, the second supplemental appropriation bill of 1959.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (H.R. 5916) making supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1959, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Texas.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

PROGRAM FOR NEXT WEEK

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I announce that there will be no debate on the appropriation bill today.

On Monday we expect to have a yea-and-nay vote on the treaty on the Executive Calendar. We also expect, if it is agreeable to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and to the senior Senator from Oregon, to discuss the Luce nomination. The chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations has indicated that he would be prepared to discuss that nomination on Monday. Therefore I should like to have Members of the Senate to be on notice that there will be yea-and-nay votes on both matters.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I shall be ready to discuss the nomination on Monday. I should like to request the majority leader to give consideration to assisting me, if he is inclined to do so, to have a yea-and-nay vote on the Luce nomination.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. In addition, Mr. President, there will be a meeting of the policy committee on Monday, and probably other proposed legislation, such as the railroad retirement bill, will be called up for action next week.

Mr. President, before I conclude I wish to express my deep appreciation to the distinguished minority leader, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], for his generous and genuine statement about me earlier today. I appreciate working with him, and I am grateful that we have in the minority leadership such an able and understanding person.

NUCLEAR TEST BANS

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, there has just appeared on the news ticker of the United Press the following news story:

Moscow.—Soviet Premier Khrushchev has written a personal letter to President Eisenhower calling for a halt of "all tests of nuclear weapons," Tass News Agency said tonight. It reported that the message was handed to the U.S. State Department in Washington yesterday by Soviet Ambassador Mikhail Menshikov.

The message was an answer to a note Eisenhower sent to the Soviet Premier April 13 appealing personally to Khrushchev to help get the deadlocked nuclear talks in Geneva back on a working basis.

Eisenhower wrote that if Moscow was unwilling to go along with "on-site inspection" of possible violations of a test ban treaty, it might accept as a first step toward a complete ban the cessation of nuclear weapons tests in the atmosphere to the height of 30 miles.

"We should not flinch before the difficulties attached to agreement on a test ban," Khrushchev wrote.

"We should muster strength of will and show an appreciation of the need to conclude an agreement providing for the stopping of all tests of nuclear weapons—in the atmosphere, underground, under water and at great altitudes," the letter said.

Mr. President, at this point I interject the comment that the position of the United States has been made quite plain at Geneva. We are in favor of a test ban on nuclear explosions in the atmosphere, underground, under water, and at great altitudes. We have asked only that such a ban be policed by a reasonable detection and control system, to give protection against covert violations. If the Soviet Premier is really sincere in wishing to obtain this ban, he can obtain it readily enough. All he need do is instruct his negotiator, whose intransigence is responsible for the stalemate at Geneva, to stop demanding a veto power over the activities of the proposed international control commission. All he need do is to instruct his negotiator to cease objecting to a reasonable kind of on-site inspection which the technicians agree is necessary in order to determine whether a given subterranean disturbance is a nuclear explosion or an earthquake. All he need do is simply to make it plain that he does not continue to insist upon obstructing the work of this commission with impossible redtape.

If he does so, he can have an all-out ban on all types of nuclear explosions.

The position of the United States and Great Britain has altered in no particular in this regard, and I believe that in his heart the Soviet Premier knows it.

I continue to read from the dispatch:

The Soviet Premier said his Government considers that the stopping only of nuclear explosions made at heights of up to 50 kilometers as suggested by the President of the United States of America will not solve the problem. The objective of preventing the manufacture of new and more destructive types of atomic weapons would not be achieved in that case.

Mr. President, I should like to interject another comment. If ever a strawman excuse was given, this is it. In the first place, the all-out ban which the Russians say we must attempt to achieve, and which we are willing to achieve, if possible, has nothing at all directly to do with the manufacture of atomic weapons. It is a non sequitur. If the Soviet Premier is worried that continued underground tests and spatial tests might contribute to the development of weapons of greater power, then let me ask: What greater power is needed than the power we have already achieved in 10-, 15-, and 20-megaton bombs?

The fact of the matter is that we are at Geneva not for the purpose of trying to reach an agreement upon the manufacture of nuclear weapons; we are there for the purpose of putting an end to nuclear tests. This, as I have indicated, is not relevant as an excuse for refusing to accept the proposal of the President.

I continue to read from the dispatch:

Khrushchev's note said atomic explosions at heights of more than 30 miles "would poison the air and the soil by contaminating with radioactive fallout the vegetation which forms part of the food of animals and finds its way into man's organisms * * *."

He said, therefore, the people of the world would be justified in condemning an agreement to end tests only under the 30-mile limit as "an unfair deal."

That is the end of the dispatch. Everybody in this field knows that the kind of nuclear tests which contribute in a substantial way to the pollution of the air are those which occur within the limits of the President's proposal.

I am not discouraged or dejected by the reply of the Soviet Premier. I think it is noteworthy that he did not reject out of hand the President's proposal. I think it is significant that he has left the door open for further negotiations upon this proposal or possible acceptable alternatives.

Moreover, I think we should expect the Soviet Premier to get all the propaganda value he can from any proposal offered by the United States and Great Britain. We must be mindful of the fact that a conference of foreign ministers is ahead, and also a summit conference.

I hope the President of the United States will persist in attempting to achieve this limited test ban, if no other is available, and that he will utilize the opportunities presented in the coming Foreign Ministers Conference and summit conference to this end. I feel that there is reason to believe that we may yet achieve the kind of agreement with the Soviet Union, backed with a trustworthy inspection and control system, which will stop the poisoning of the air.

It was this proposal which I made to the State Department 6 weeks ago. It is this proposal which has now been adopted. We have made our position clear at Geneva, and I hope that before the year is out we will have made that first great step forward to end pollution of the air and toward the establishment of controls throughout the world upon which we can base more extended agreements toward peace in future years.

DECLINE OF QUALITY RADIO AND TELEVISION PROGRAMS

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senate to the approaching death, on June 1, of an entertainment program which has delighted American radio and television audiences for 30 years, the Voice of Firestone. This quality program has again become the victim of the munbo-jumbo cult of TV ratings.

Five years ago, the Voice of Firestone was unceremoniously kicked off NBC as a result of the microscopic samplings of the rating services, but found a home in prime time on the ABC network, which at that time was trying to build a quality audience for its advertisers.

Mr. Harvey Firestone, its manager, insisted that if an advertiser was willing to pay his own money for a quality program to advertise a quality product, censorship through TV ratings and subservient network officials would not deter him.

But despite this determination of an experienced advertiser to advertise his product with a program he thought worthy and apparently profitable to his company, the desires of the advertiser and of the public get short shrift, because the TV rating services rate close to the Sermon on the Mount on Madison Avenue in importance.

Now ABC, apparently prosperous with its two-gun westerns, its "Maverick," and whodunits, seems to have gone trigger-happy along with NBC and CBS for the blood and thunder which fatten the batting average in the daily TV rating services.

It will be remembered that in the last Congress I raised the question whether the television programs which were being made available to the public were not the slaves of the so-called rating services.

During the hearings conducted by the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce on the general subject of television ratings, I referred to the importance of this "numbers game" and the baleful influence it had on the programing which was being made available to the general public.

As we all know, the holders of the television licenses are mandated, when given their licenses, to operate in the public interest, convenience, and necessity. I know it is extremely difficult for anyone to define with any specificity the full scope of the words "public interest." I shall not attempt to define that phrase at this point, nor am I overlooking the fact that in this country we have a system of radio and television which is superior to that of any other nation in the entire world. However, I cannot help referring to a recent talk made by one of America's most competent radio and television commentators, Edward R. Murrow, who said he could "find nothing in the Bill of Rights or the Communications Act which says that they—licensees—must increase their net profits each year, lest the Republic collapse." The most recent announcement from the networks indicates the financial success which they have enjoyed during the past year. Therefore, it was with a great sadness that I read last week of the arbitrary action of ABC, and the two other networks, CBS and NBC, in refusing to make a half hour of prime evening time available so that the Voice of Firestone could be televised during the next season.

The feeling of the people, I think, is best reflected in the heading of an article by the highly respected Jack Gould of the New York Times, who referred to the Voice of Firestone program and called it the "Victim of Ratings."

Mr. Lawrence Laurent, the competent radio-television reporter for the Washington Post, and who certainly cannot be classified as antibroadcasting, referred to the cancellation of Voice of Firestone as "the news which will sadden every music lover who possesses a television receiver."

Newsweek magazine this week heads its comment with reference to the Voice of Firestone program and the networks as, "No time for quality."

In looking at the television schedule, I noted that ABC, desirous of building its ratings on Monday nights, has decided to substitute a Dixieland detective show called "Bourbon Street Beat" for Voice of Firestone.

I find it difficult to believe that the three networks cannot find time in the prime evening hours for a program of the type symbolized by the Voice of Firestone.

In 1957, after extensive hearings with regard to television network practices, a staff report was prepared for the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. In discussing the problem of regularly scheduled public affairs programs appearing on the various networks, it was stated:

It can be seen at a glance how little of these (public service) programs fall into the peak viewing hours and what a high percentage are presented in the off-peak hours on Sunday. Here again it would seem that the networks have an obligation to present some of these very fine programs in periods when most people will be available to watch them.

It is recognized that the field of programing is a difficult and sensitive one, but it is the ultimate measure of whether a station operates in the public interest. Certainly it is not very constructive merely to cry "censorship" whenever it is suggested that the level of programing can be improved. The essence of censorship is either prior restraint to prevent the publication or broadcasting of disfavored opinion or entertainment, or the enforced publication or broadcast of favored opinion or entertainment. Are Voice of Firestone and various other types of public service programs to remain the victims of the fallacy of chasing audience ratings at the expense of program quality?

When the television networks and the other licensees accepted their licenses from the FCC, they assumed the responsibility of operating in the public interest. It appears to me that the present level of operation is geared to a mumbo-jumbo of ratings.

For 75 million viewers this is censorship by the small, infinitesimal, and doubtful sampling of a Madison Avenue created czar.

Thus the laws of the Nation and the rules of the FCC for public service responsibilities are reversed and negated because the network presidents supinely bow to this fictitious god which tells America what it may hear and see.

In the April 22, 1959, issue of Variety, George Rosen, a leading radio and TV writer, refers to the programs to be made available by the networks next season as follows:

Most depressing aspect of the new schedules (a lot of it, of course, will be subject to change between now and September preem time) is the Johnny-one-note programing content. There may (and then again may not) be a sleeper or two among the lot, but overall there's little to quicken the pulse or excite the imagination. Here and there a potentially promising situation comedy or the Ford-sponsored "Fabulous 30" on NBC and the reserving of Friday, 8:30 to 9:30, for "every week at the same time," specials, but drama series crops up on NBC or CBS; there's in the main, it looks like the fading 1958–59 season all over again, but in spades, with a superabundance of westerns and action shows.

The titles of the new ones pretty much speak for themselves—NBC's "Laramie," "River Boat," "Five Fingers," "Black Cat," "Whispering Smith," "Wichita Town," "Bonanza," "Johnny Staccato," "Jeopardy."

At ABC it's "Alaskan," "Bourbon Street Beat," "Adventures in Paradise," "Hawaiian Paradise," "Cry Fraud," "Bronco."

At CBS the diet is slightly more variegated, with such entries as "Peck's Bad Girl," "June Allyson Show," the new Sunday at 10 team up of Jack Benny and George Gobel, "Dobie Gillis," "Hennesey," "Dennis the Menace," "Twilight Zone," and an hour version of "Lineup."

But allowing for a few promising exceptions, 7:30 to 11, 7 nights a week, is hardly calculated to give television that image which, even now, the industry is trying so desperately to achieve.

It speaks for itself.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD the following editorials and articles:

An article entitled "ABC Turns a Deaf Ear to Voice of Firestone," from the Washington Post of April 16, 1929; an editorial entitled "Networks' Blunder," from the Akron Beacon Journal, April 16, 1959; an article entitled "Victims of Ratings," written by Jack Gould and published in the New York Times of April 19; an article entitled "No Time for Quality," published in Newsweek magazine; and the article entitled "Hot Race for That TV Loot," which was written by George Rosen and was published in the April 22 issue of Variety.

There being no objection, the editorial and the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post and Times Herald, Apr. 16, 1959]

ABC TURNS A DEAF EAR TO "VOICE OF FIRESTONE"

(By Lawrence Laurent)

The bluest and saddest musical notes of this sad and blue television season were sounded this week in Akron, Ohio. The news, which will sadden every music lover who possesses a television receiver is that the "Voice of Firestone"—age 30 years—will disappear after its June 1 broadcast.

A spokesman for Firestone said: "We deeply regret that we have been forced to discontinue the "Voice of Firestone" because we sincerely believe TV viewers have appreciated quality programing and have looked forward to our half hour of music with great pleasure."

He added: "Apparently, the American Broadcasting Co., which has carried the 'Voice of Firestone' for the past 5 years, does not agree with our opinion."

The sponsor said the program is being withdrawn because no suitable network time is available. An announcement from the Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. adds: "Presentation by TV networks were heard by Firestone this week but no suitable evening time period was offered."

"The Voice of Firestone" was a Monday evening fixture on NBC radio for 25 years. It was the first commercially sponsored musical program to be televised on a regular basis.

Five years ago, NBC wanted to shift the program out of its 9 p.m., Mondays, time slot. Firestone shifted the program, instead, to ABC–TV, and there the program has remained. It has been television's only regularly offered program of the finest music of our heritage.

ABC–TV wanted the program moved to a different time period. The network, caught up in the industry's frenzy for higher and higher audience ratings, hopes to substitute an adventure program in the time period. Reports in the trade indicate that the Firestone Co. was offered only one time period: A place in the intellectual ghetto of Sunday afternoon, the time when the smallest possible audience is able to watch a television program.

This sad story illustrates once more the fallacy of chasing audience ratings at the expense of program quality. Usually, the networks blame advertising agencies and sponsors. In this case, however, ABC–TV can blame only itself. The sponsor is quite happy with his audience: Small, intelligent, loyal and of high quality.

Just last month in Chicago, Robert Sarnoff appeared before the National Association of Broadcasters and proposed an industry-wide campaign to win greater prestige for the television industry. As a result, a committee has been formed, a budget is being prepared and a lot of money will be spent to change the public's opinion of TV.

Since the industry is a rich one, it can be assumed that the campaign will have some effect. Maybe we'll all come to love the television box as we once loved the entire motion picture industry.

Maybe if our eyes and ears are assailed often enough, we'll even learn to respect an industry that has no time for a sponsored program such as the "Voice of Firestone."

NETWORKS' BLUNDER

For almost as long as there has been entertainment on the air there has been a program sponsored by Firestone.

It won't seem quite the same after June 1 when the Firestone musical half hour on Monday nights will end. The founder of the firm started Firestone on radio way back in 1928 and for the entire 30-year period the company has held to a high standard of musical excellence, in radio and later in television.

The action of the networks in denying the Firestone program prime evening time can't help but place the top brass of TV in a peculiar light with many viewers. The rubber company was using the program to present the Firestone name and products to the Nation. The program must have been doing what the company executives regarded as an adequate job from the sales standpoint, for they were perfectly willing to continue to pay for one of the preferred, and expensive, time segments on the TV evening schedule.

But the fact that the sponsor and the viewers were in agreement on the program's value and quality apparently carried no weight with the network currently airing the "Voice of Firestone" or with the two competing networks. Ratings are all that count.

We regret the passing of the "Voice of Firestone." But we shall watch with interest to see what kind of shoot-'em-up horse opera or who-dunnit the TV people come up with to replace a program dedicated to good music.

VICTIM OF RATINGS—"VOICE OF FIRESTONE" SUCCUMBS TO HARSH ECONOMICS OF TELEVISION INDUSTRY

(By Jack Gould)

It is one of the more prevalent assumptions in television that sponsorship holds the solution to almost all problems. The theory goes that if only enlightened advertisers would see the wisdom of catering to specialized audiences and do their part in appealing to the minority as well as majority groups the whole shape of TV could be changed and evening schedules would blossom with more diversified fare.

Last week this happy theory was knocked into a cocked hat when the three major networks turned a deaf ear to the appeal of "The Voice of Firestone" for a half-hour of prime evening time in which to offer its concert program next season.

WILLING

It was not enough that the Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. was willing to pay the going rate for the time on the air and was satisfied with the smaller audiences its type of presentation attracts. Rather the company in effect was told that it must conform to the inevitable pursuit of ratings in the principal evening hours or settle for less important periods, such as late afternoon or early evening on Sunday, as proposed by the National Broadcasting Co. and Columbia Broadcasting System, or 10:30 p.m. Mondays as suggested by the American Broadcasting Co.

The Firestone concern wanted a half hour in prime time, which is generally considered by advertisers to run from 7:30 to 10:30 p.m. When it became obvious last week that such a period would not be forthcoming the company decided to withdraw "The Voice of Firestone" after a run of 31 years on radio and TV.

This is not the first instance of scheduling difficulty for "The Voice of Firestone." In 1954 the program was dropped unceremoniously by NBC. Then the presentation found a haven with ABC, where it has been seen this season at 9 p.m. on Mondays. A few weeks ago ABC decided that "The Voice of Firestone" had to get out of the way again.

GOAL

Admittedly, "The Voice of Firestone" always has been the subject of considerable discussion. Its programing approach has been formal and stiff, though much less so this year than in the past. But the program also has been the only weekly half-hour on TV that regularly offered top concert artists; often it has been pleasant and effortless listening. The Firestone concern at least asked only one privilege: to serve a chosen segment of the total audience at the best possible hour. As an ideal goal for corporate behavior in TV that seems hard to beat.

But that such a standard is not sufficient to survive contemporary television is also abundantly clear. The trials of "The Voice of Firestone" vividly illustrate the practical workings of TV, particularly at a time when competition among the three networks is becoming more intense.

The real reason for the sustained cold shoulder toward "The Voice of Firestone" is the abiding fear of networks that even one program with a comparatively low rating may do harm to an entire evening's schedule.

If part of the potential audience is lost by one program, they argue, it means a smaller carryover to the succeeding program and, by extension, to the one following thereafter. Also, if the viewer strays to another channel he may be very hard to win back; once tuned to a rival station, he may find several shows, not merely one, that he likes.

VIEWERSHIP

In other words, there may be cases where a single advertiser is willing to settle for a smaller audience in the evening, but he cannot do so without possibly affecting the size of the audiences for other advertisers not so inclined. And from the standpoint of the networks, they are concerned with the circulation, or total viewership, for many programs, not just one.

It is such concern for contiguous circulation that explains more than any other single fact why the ways of TV often seem baffling to the layman. So long as it is necessary to avoid the prospect of even a single soft link in a chain of programs, there is a built-in, automatic limitation on what type of programing can be done in an evening schedule.

The consequences of this approach to programing—not weighing the individual show as an entity but as part of a complex mosaic—is readily apparent. No single presentation can break very far out of the established pattern of popularity without theoretically dragging other shows down with it. The overall pressures for a sustained audience of great size at all times, accordingly, dictate adherence to sameness.

These pressures, far from lessening, are increasing. The ABC network, which has less diversity and programing and does less public service than either CBS or NBC, has enjoyed this season a literally fantastic increase in its total audience. Next year it intends to step up its quota of adventure and mystery programs and there are some within the industry who would not be surprised if it moved into the No. 1 position in terms of the size of its week-long following.

SITUATION

Were such a development to occur, both NBC and CBS would be hard put not to respond more vigorously with similar programing. At a time when television is under substantial fire for the general level of its programing, the industry actually is in the middle of a competitive three-network situation that might allow less leeway, not more, in programing diversity.

In many ways "The Voice of Firestone" stands as something of a symbol of perhaps the foremost problem confronting TV: how to find even just a little time within the prime evening viewing hours for the minority programing common to Sunday afternoon. If it's ever to be done with predictability and regularity it's a fair guess that 90 percent of the criticism of the medium would evaporate overnight.

[From Newsweek, Apr. 1959]

NO TIME FOR QUALITY

In its brief 10 years, television has become strewn with more toppled monuments than 20 centuries brought to Rome's forum. One of the most venerated of all came tumbling down last week when the "Voice of Firestone" ended 30 years on radio, 11 on television. This particular monument-wrecking job was crueler than most since Firestone was happy with its program, and eager to carry on.

But ABC–TV, anxious to build jumbo ratings on Monday nights, had decided to substitute a Dixieland detective show called "Bourbon Street Beat" for Firestone's Bach and Beethoven. They skipped the courtesy of informing Firestone of their plans before they were announced in the press. Understandably indignant, the rubber company, which had changed networks five years ago after a similar snub from NBC, asked the two other networks what they could do for them. The best CBS and NBC could offer was time on Sunday afternoon, long known as "TV's Intellectual Ghetto."

The Firestone program's exit speech (their last show will be on June 1) was a blend of honey and bitters: "We deeply regret that we have been forced to discontinue the 'Voice of Firestone' because we sincerely believe television viewers have appreciated quality programing and have looked forward to our half hour of music with great pleasure. Apparently the American Broadcasting Co., which has carried the 'Voice of Firestone' for the past five years, does not agree with our opinion."

It all lent a certain poignance to the brave words of the program's director, A. J. McGinness, a few months ago: "Quality will be around long after the last rating decimal point has vanished."

[From Variety, Apr. 22, 1959]

HOT RACE FOR THAT TV LOOT

(By George Rosen)

As the three major television networks go into the home stretch on sale of program availabilities for next season there is something like $100 million in time-program revenue still to be realized. That represents 20 hours of sponsorless segments in the 7:30 to 11 nighttime area. ABC still has 5½ hours unsold; CBS has 2¾ hours unsold; NBC has 11¼ hours remaining to be sold.

The networks are way ahead of last year and it's a pretty safe bet that they'll all be dangling the SRO banner long before the new semester opens. But from here on in it'll be a highly competitive battle for the still uncommitted sponsor dollar. One thing's for sure—to grab off that remaining $100 million the networks will become less particular about what show goes in where, so long as that cash register is ringing.

NBC's major problems are Saturday and Sunday nights, which combined account for nearly 5 hours of still open time. Widest open night on ABC is Monday, with 1¼ hours still to be sold. CBS, best off among the webs, is the only one sold clean two nights of the week—Monday and Saturday.

Most depressing aspect of the new schedules (a lot of it, of course, will be subject to change between now and September preem time) is the johnny-one-note programing content. There may (and then again may not) be a sleeper or two among the lot, but overall there's little to quicken the pulse or excite the imagination. Here and there a potentially promising situation comedy or drama series crops up on NBC or CBS; there's the Ford-sponsored "Fabulous 30" on NBC and the reserving of Friday, 8:30 to 9:30, for every week at the same time specials, but in the main it looks like the fading 1958–59 season all over again—but in spades, with a superabundance of westerns and action shows.

The titles of the new ones pretty much speak for themselves—NBC's "Laramie," "River Boat," "Five Fingers," "Black Cat," "Whispering Smith," "Wichita Town," "Bonanza," "Johnny Staccato," "Jeopardy."

At ABC it's "Alaskan," "Bourbon St. Beat," "Adventures in Paradise," "Hawaiian Paradise," "Cry Fraud," "Bronco."

At CBS the diet is slightly more variegated with such entries as "Peck's Bad Girl," "June Allyson Show," the new Sunday at 10 teamup of Jack Benny and George Gobel, "Dobie Gillis," "Hennessey," "Dennis the Menace," "Twilight Zone," and an hour version of "Lineup."

But allowing for a few promising exceptions, 7:30 to 11, 7 nights a week is hardly calculated to give television that image which, even now, the industry is trying so desperately to achieve.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I move that the Senate now adjourn until Monday, at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 1 minute p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, April 27, 1959, at 12 o'clock meridian.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Expanded Program of Education

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN A. CARROLL OF COLORADO
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, April 25, 1959

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a statement prepared by me relating to Senate Concurrent Resolution 24, submitted by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. MCGEE], providing for an expanded program of education on an international level.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR CARROLL

This week the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. MCGEE] submitted a concurrent resolution calling for an expanded program of education on an international level. I was most happy to be one of the sponsors of the resolution as I feel that it is one of the surest and most economical methods of insuring peace in this troubled world. The same resolution has been introduced in the House by Congressman BYRON JOHNSON, of my home State.

The Fulbright program has been immensely effective in bringing about a greater understanding between people in various countries, but the success of the plan only indicates it should be expanded and we should encourage the development of colleges and technical institutions of higher learning outside the continental United States.

In this regard I want to point out the sixth annual dinner meeting of the Institute of International Education will be held in Denver, Colo., April 27.

This institute administers the exchange student program between the United States and foreign countries and at the meeting students from 20 different foreign countries who are attending Colorado schools will be in attendance.

The speakers will be two members of the institute's board of trustees, the Honorable CHESTER BOWLES, of Connecticut, and Miss Blanche Thebom, widely known prima donna.

Representative BOWLES, who has had a distinguished career in foreign service, knows at first hand of the great amount of good that can be accomplished by the student exchange program. He served this country well when Ambassador to India and did much to smooth the relations between countries. Miss Thebom also has been active in the program and I am happy that they will be able to attend the meeting in Colorado.

Thousands of Americans have participated in the educational exchange program and nationals from over 70 countries have come here to study and broaden their knowledge of how the free world operates.

We have made most commendable progress, but I, along with many others, feel that this country should encourage the United Nations Organization to go even further in the educational program. No appropriation will be necessary as the plan can be financed out of unconvertible foreign currency. I can think of no way these funds could be used to better advantage.

It will afford this country an opportunity of taking a constructive leadership in bringing about better understanding between nations.

Since the international educational exchange program was started in 1938 thousands have participated. From experience in my own State, I know the thousands who have participated in the educational program have done much to improve our foreign relations. But an expanded program would multiply these benefits many fold.

Representative BOWLES will take this message back to Colorado; and I am certain that the Institute of International Education will accept with enthusiasm a move to expand the educational program that is so effective in bringing about understanding, faith, and peace between nations.

Day Care for Children When Mothers Must Work

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JACOB K. JAVITS
OF NEW YORK
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, April 25, 1959

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, on March 5 I introduced the Day Care Assistance Act of 1959, S. 1286, to authorize a program of Federal aid for the day care of children outside the home. Hundreds of thousands of children throughout the Nation will continue to be the chief losers so long as we fail to recognize that providing suitable day care for the children of working mothers is a national problem which urgently requires Federal aid to activate State and local efforts in this field and to back up the outstanding voluntary programs now in effect. Until a Federal program such as the one contemplated in my bill is enacted, we are not looking after the needs of these children in households where economic necessity forces the mother to work outside the home. In cases where adequate adult supervision is not available, children are often exposed to influences which may lead to juvenile delinquency and the serious rise in youth crime.

An article appeared in the May issue of Parents Magazine dealing with the question of working mothers and the need for day care for children, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DAY CARE FOR CHILDREN WHEN MOTHERS MUST WORK—A CALL FOR FEDERAL AID TO HELP SOLVE A NATIONAL PROBLEM

(By JACOB K. JAVITS, U.S. Senator from New York)

Seventy years or so ago, half the women in this country never held a job in their lives. Today, 9 out of every 10 women in the United States will have worked at some time or another during their lifetimes. What's more, over half of today's workingwomen are married. This last statistics means that about 3 million children under the age of 6 have mothers who work; 3,500,000 more children between the ages of 6 and 11 also have mothers who work outside their homes.

Despite our current 7 million working mothers; despite the fact that our national economic trend points to a more likely increase than decrease in their numbers, our social trend is to disapprove of working mothers, to view them with alarm. Opinion surveys among both women and men show an overwhelming majority in favor of the concept that a mother's place is in the home. Psychologists—and the whole battery of social scientists who work in the field of child development—agree. Children under 3, they say, need their mothers' personal care. All children, they add, need the care, the guidance, the warmth, the feeling of being wanted that mothers have immemorially provided. As a parent myself, I believe in the importance of a mother's care for a young, growing child. On the other hand, and again drawing from personal experience, I know that in many homes, due to modest circumstances or the death or physical inability of a husband, it is necessary for the mother to work. I came from such a home myself. No amount of moralizing about the mother's place can override the harsh necessity that faces great numbers of families in the United States where the mother is obliged to be away from home and to work.

The concern of the Federal Government with the welfare of our children has been long established. It dates from the establishment of the Office of Education a little less than a century ago, the establishment of the Children's Bureau in 1910 and of the Women's Bureau in 1920.

This concern matured into a more material expression with the enactment of the aid to dependent children program in the Social Security Act of 1935. To keep needy children in their own homes as much as possible, the program provides aid for those who are living with relatives but are deprived of normal support and care. It was hoped thereby that a widow would not find it necessary to leave her children behind in order to earn money for their support, but could remain home to care for them. The Federal dependent children program has since been supplemented by other programs, such as railroad retirement, old age and survivors insurance, and veterans' benefits designed to provide benefits for the orphaned child. But these programs are insufficient—particularly in the face of the rising cost of living. The average monthly payment per family in the aid to dependent children program is $105; the widow of a veteran with two children receives as little as $122 monthly. No wonder so many women seek employment to supplement these subsistence payments.

But what of the millions of children of working mothers? Their care and supervision varies from that given by other members of the family to almost none at all.

To meet the needs of the very young child of the working mother, there was established in Philadelphia in 1927 the first program of family day care. Under this program the child is placed in the home of a foster mother (who often has children of her own of like age) and returned to his own mother at the end of the working day. The program operates under a system of supervision and controls, all carefully checked. Family day care was slow to catch on at first, but during World War II, when defense requirements drew so many women into the labor force, some 90 communities had family day-care programs. However, for the most part these programs were makeshift and died out after the war.

The most firmly established and widespread programs are those instituted for the care of preschool children at the age when they develop a group consciousness and can be cared for within a group—the years from 3 to 6. In this category are the nursery schools and day-care centers. Nursery schools usually provide care for only half a day or, when a full day is provided, cover normal school hours. Their pupils are not necessarily all children whose parents absolutely require supplemental care for them. Nursery schools can serve working mothers in a part-time job, but the woman with full-time employment must go elsewhere.

The day-care center or day nursery, however, has as its primary function, according to the Department of Labor, provision of good group care and supervision of children in need of supplemental parental care during the day because their own parents are unable to care for them due to employment, sickness, or for some other reason. Today there are day-care centers throughout the United States. All but six States—Maine, Nevada, Oklahoma, South Dakota, Vermont, and Wyoming—have laws providing for their licensing. Many of the States with licensing laws, though, do not provide adequately for their enforcement or else have statutes which do not meet what is regarded as minimum standards today. In some half-dozen States, State financial assistance is given. My community, New York City, helps to support 115 day-care centers operated by 74 private agencies at a cost of $4.5 million annually.

The Federal Government at the present time has no program of support for child-care centers, although the concept of such support is not by any means new. It was accomplished with some success during the depression and the war years when young mothers in the greatest numbers were in the labor force.

In 1945 a program which received part of its operating costs from Federal funds was operating in 395 communities in 46 States. Hawaii, and the District of Columbia. The program expired at the end of hostilities and was not revived until the Korean war crisis. In 1951 the Defense Housing and Community Facilities and Services Act included day-care centers in its definition of community facilities and services. But no funds were appropriated and the effort did not get off the ground.

While these programs indicate congressional recognition of the important and helpful role of day-care centers, they are not the only programs with Federal support that have been undertaken. Others include those day-care centers at the Atomic Energy Commission facilities at Oak Ridge and Los Alamos and in local housing projects financed by the Public Housing Administration. In addition, the Congress in 1954 permitted working mothers to deduct expenses for the care of their children up to $600 annually in computing their income tax. Furthermore, the Federal Government has for years made grants not only for aid to dependent children but also for maternal and child health, child welfare, crippled children's services and a National School Lunch Program.

In recognition of the need for day-care centers in our present social order, I sponsored last year the Day Care Assistance Act to make annual grants to assist in providing facilities and services for children needing day care outside their homes. I have reintroduced this measure, somewhat revised after study by experts in day care, in the current 86th Congress. It would make such care available not only to children of working mothers but also to children requiring special attention because they are mentally or physically handicapped or lacking adequate home care.

Legislation of this type is long overdue. In sponsoring it, I am not, of course, advocating that mothers of young children be encouraged to work, but many of these mothers have no other choice. To turn our backs on this fact is to do a disservice to our national future. To wait until a national emergency arises before we give recognition to the need would be folly. The Federal Government has an obligation to work cooperatively with the States and municipalities to provide day care for the overwhelming majority of children for whom such care is not available. The time to discharge this obligation is now.

SENATE

MONDAY, APRIL 27, 1959

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Thou art the true home of our souls, whence we sprang, to whom we belong, where alone we are altogether understood, and in whose love and fellowship we may renew our strength.

At the beginning of another week, comfort us, we beseech Thee, with a vivid awareness of the spiritual verities by which we are surrounded, that we may be stripped of pride and made humble and penitent.

May we walk with Thy light on our ways, making our darkness visible, that in Thy light we may see light, and by Thy grace face our tasks as public servants forgiven, cleansed, and empowered.

In a world full of the clamor of the violent, the boasting of the arrogant, and the agony of tortured peoples, make us valiant in a day when the hearts of many turn to water.

As undefeated souls, may we sustain the shocks of these volcanic days, master their handicaps, and at last make even the wrath of men to serve Thee.

In the Redeemer's name. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, April 25, 1959, was dispensed with.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

FINAL REPORT OF NATIONAL ADVISORY COMMITTEE FOR AERONAUTICS—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT (S. DOC. NO. 6)

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on Aeronautical and Space Sciences:

To the Congress of the United States:

In compliance with the provisions of the act of March 3, 1915, as amended, which established the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, I transmit herewith the Forty-fourth and Final Annual Report of the Committee for the fiscal year 1958. This report covers the activities of the Committee through the close of business September 30, 1958, when it was superseded by the National Aeronautics and Space Administration.

The National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics is to be commended for its many contributions to the progress of aeronautical science in the United States and for the spirit of teamwork in aeronautics it has inspired among leaders in science, the military and industry. I wish also to acknowledge at this time the excellent work and dedication of the Committee's research staff who, over the years, have given unstintingly of their talents in a manner which reflects credit upon them and all other civil service personnel of the United States.

DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 27, 1959.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Bartlett, one of its reading clerks, announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bill and joint resolution, and they were signed by the President pro tempore:

H.R. 2589. An act for the relief of Elizabeth Lucie Leon (also known as Lucie Noel); and

S.J. Res. 19. Joint resolution authorizing the Architect of the Capitol to present to the Senators and Representative in Congress from the State of Alaska the official flag of the United States bearing 49 stars which is first flown over the west front of the United States Capitol.

COMMITTEE MEETINGS DURING SENATE SESSION

On request of Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, and by unanimous consent, the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations of the Committee on Government Operations was authorized to meet during the sessions of the Senate today and tomorrow, April 28, 1959; and the Subcommittee on Juvenile Delinquency of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare was authorized to meet during the session of the Senate today.

LIMITATION OF DEBATE DURING MORNING HOUR

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, under the rule, there will be the usual morning hour; and I ask unanimous consent that statements in connection therewith be limited to 3 minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The following reports of committees were submitted:

By Mr. EASTLAND, from the Committee on the Judiciary, without amendment:

H.R. 1535. An act for the relief of Sister Mary Damion (Maria Saveria D'Amelio), Sister Maria Tarcisia (Maria Giovanna Fenuta), and Sister Mary Regina (Maria Lizzi) (Rept. No. 226); and H.R. 1727. An act for the relief of Dimitrios Kondoleon (also known as James Kondolous (Rept. No. 227).

By Mr. EASTLAND, from the Committee on the Judiciary, with an amendment:

S. 178. A bill for the relief of Wong Bick Quon (Maria Wong) (Rept. No. 223);

S. 199. A bill for the relief of Stanislawa Siedlecka (Rejman) (Rept. No. 224); and

S. 593. A bill for the relief of Angelinas Cuacos Steinberg (Rept. No. 225).

By Mr. HART, from the Committee on the Judiciary, without amendment:

S. 548. A bill granting the consent of Congress to a Great Lakes Basin Compact, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 231).

By Mr. ANDERSON, from the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, without amendment:

S. 1197. A bill to amend the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended (Rept. No. 230); and

S. 1228. A bill to amend Public Law 85-590 to increase the authorization for appropriations to the Atomic Energy Commission in accordance with section 261 of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 229).

REPORT ENTITLED "TRADING WITH THE ENEMY ACT" (S. REPT. NO. 228)

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, from the Committee on the Judiciary, pursuant to Senate Resolution 232, 85th Congress, 2d session, as extended, I submit a report entitled "Trading With the Enemy Act," prepared by the Subcommittee to Examine and Review the Administration of the Trading With the Enemy Act. I ask that the report may be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be received and printed, as requested by the Senator from South Carolina.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. ELLENDER (by request):

FURTHER OPPOSITION TO MEMBERSHIP OF COMMUNIST CHINA IN UNITED NATIONS

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 26), which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Whereas the Congress, from time to time, has previously, by the adoption of resolutions and by other means, expressed its opposition to the admission of Communist China as a member of the United Nations or as a member of any of its specialized agencies; and

Whereas a failure to reiterate currently its expression of such opposition might be erroneously interpreted by some as a relaxation on the part of the Congress of its opposition to such admission of Communist China: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it continues to be the sense of the Congress that the Communist regime in China should not be admitted to membership in the United Nations or any of its specialized agencies as the representative of China, because the Congress is convinced that such admission would impair the effective functioning of the United Nations and would be contrary to the aims, principles, and provisions of the Charter of the United Nations.

RESOLUTION

Mr. JAVITS (for himself and Senators ALLOTT, BEALL, CASE of New Jersey, COOPER, KEATING, PROUTY, and SCOTT) submitted a resolution (S. Res. 109) establishing a Select Committee on Consumers, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL DEPOSIT INSURANCE ACT, RELATING TO ELIMINATION OF PAYMENT OF CERTAIN PREMIUMS

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I introduce a bill to amend the Federal Deposit Insurance Act to eliminate the payment of premiums on deposits of trust funds by fiduciary banks in uninsured banks, and ask that it be appropriately referred.

Mr. President, I have introduced this bill at the suggestion of the Connecticut Bankers Association to correct an inequitable provision contained in the Federal Deposit Insurance Act.

Under the present law, fiduciary banks which deposit trust funds in uninsured banks must include such funds in their deposits and must pay premiums to the FDIC on them. This makes no sense, because the FDIC in practically all cases will not pay the losses if the uninsured bank closes.

In Connecticut, deposits in Connecticut mutual savings banks are a legal investment for trust funds. Some wills specifically require that trust funds be held in mutual savings banks. Since many Connecticut mutual savings banks are not insured by FDIC, this means that the fiduciary banks must pay premiums on deposits in these uninsured banks, without getting any benefit from the premiums.

Connecticut banks have been protesting for many years. The FDIC has recognized the inequity, and the financial institutions bill of 1957—S. 1451, 85th Congress—revised the provisions of the law to eliminate this injustice. The Senate approved this provision when it passed that bill, but the bill died in the House.

The bill I have introduced would make the same changes which were adopted by the Senate in the financial institutions bill.

I ask that this bill be considered promptly by the Banking and Currency Committee and by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 1789) to amend the Federal Deposit Insurance Act to eliminate the payment of premiums on deposits of trust funds by fiduciary banks in uninsured banks, introduced by Mr. BUSH, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

AMENDMENT OF COMMUNICATIONS ACT OF 1934, RELATING TO COMMUNITY ANTENNA TELEVISION SYSTEMS

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, by request, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend the Communications Act of 1934 in order to impose certain requirements on community antenna television systems. I ask unanimous consent that the letter from the Chairman of the Federal Communications Commission, requesting the proposed legislation, together with an explanation of the proposed amendments, may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the letter and explanation will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 1801) to amend the Communications Act of 1934 in order to impose certain requirements on community antenna television systems, introduced by Mr. MAGNUSON, by request, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The letter and explanation presented by Mr. MAGNUSON are as follows:

FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION,
Washington, D.C., April 22, 1959.

HON. WARREN G. MAGNUSON,
Chairman, Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: The Commission has brought to a conclusion the formal inquiry inaugurated last year to review the problems associated with the use of community antenna television systems (CATV's) and television repeater services operating in the UHF and VHF frequency bands.

Our study of these problems has been based on the comments filed in the docketed inquiry, testimony by interested parties in hearings conducted during 1958 by the U.S. Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and the report on those hearings prepared by counsel to the committee. After carefully weighing all the conflicting proposals urged on the Commission, it has been decided to recommend the adoption of legislation which would require CATV systems to obtain the consent of the originating station for the redistribution to CATV subscribers of programs broadcast by such originating stations; and in addition requiring CATV stations to carry the programs of television stations assigned to communities in which the CATV serves subscribers. Formal recommendations to this effect are being submitted separately in accordance with established procedure. For your convenience there are enclosed copies of these legislative recommendations, together with an explanatory statement and copies of the report and order with which the formal inquiry (Docket No. 12443) has been terminated.

Would you kindly inform the Commission if any additional comments or information are desired.

By direction of the Commission.

JOHN C. DOERFER,
Chairman.

EXPLANATION OF PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO SECTIONS 3 AND 325(A), AND PROPOSED NEW SECTION 330 OF THE COMMUNICATIONS ACT OF 1934, AS AMENDED (47 U.S.C. 153, 325(A) AND 330)

The residents of numbers of smaller cities and communities in relatively remote or mountainous areas are unable to receive full network and non-network television program services directly from existing regular television broadcast stations. Our means employed for bringing television program services to such places is the community antenna television system (CATV).

Typically, a CATV system picks up incoming television signals on a receiving antenna located at a favorable reception point, amplifies them and distributes them by wire or cable to the homes or places of business of paying subscribers. Not counting additional CATV systems serving very small groups of subscribers, there are over 550 known systems delivering the programs of one or more distant television systems to an estimated one and a half to 2 million subscribers.

Insofar as CATV systems distribute to subscribers programs broadcast by television broadcast stations located elsewhere, they perform a function basically similar to that performed by television repeater stations, which rebroadcast, for the benefit of a local community, television programs on which local residents are unable to get satisfactory direct reception. The repeater stations, which transmit signals by radio, come directly within the provision of section 325(a) of the Communication Act of 1934, as amended, which imposes the statutory requirement that a station rebroadcasting programs of another broadcast station first obtain the consent of the originating station. The Commission believes that, consistent with the basic purposes of the foregoing legislation, it would appropriate and desirable that Congress impose the same requirement on CATV systems, which perform an essentially similar service. This could be accomplished by the adoption of suggested Amendment No. 2 attached hereto, which closely follows the language of the present section 325(a) of the Communications Act relating to rebroadcasts by broadcast stations.

Amendment No. 1, attached, would add a statutory definition of community antenna television systems to section 3 of the act, and would exclude from the scope of such definition facilities which serve fewer than 50 subscribers or which consist essentially of master antenna systems for apartment houses or groups of apartment houses. The definition would also expressly exclude facilities used for the distribution by wire of subscription television programs or other closed circuit programs which are not in the first instance broadcast for free reception by all members of the public within the range of the originating station.

The Commission also recommends the adoption of Amendment No. 3 attached hereto, which would require that, upon request by the licensee of a regular broadcast television station assigned to a city or community in which a CATV system serves local subscribers, the CATV system carry the programs broadcast by such local television station. The attached draft of suggested language provides also that the Commission may prescribe the time within which CATV systems shall comply with such requests by locally assigned regular television broadcast stations, and standards ensuring that the reception of such programs by subscribers to the CATV system be reasonably comparable in technical quality to the programs provided by the CATV systems from other sources.

Amendment No. 3 is intended to afford local television stations an improved opportunity to maintain their services despite the competition for local audiences offered by local CATV systems. The adoption of such a requirement has been strongly urged by broadcasters whose ability to provide a local television broadcast service both to patrons of local CATV systems and to viewers outside the areas served by CATV systems (and therefore dependent on the local TV broadcast station) is said to be adversely affected by the CATV operations. Apart from the fact that CATV systems are typically able to bring in multiple network program services which cannot be furnished on the same basis by the local television station, it appears that direct reception of local television broadcast stations by subscribers to CATV systems is made more difficult in the usual case by the necessity of an additional switching operation to receive local broadcast signals. This switching operation is in addition to the normal operation of switching channels on television receivers.

It has, moreover, been noted in the case of some CATV systems which carry the signals of local stations that the picture of the station so carried is degraded and therefore compares unfavorably with the technical quality of the programs transmitted by the CATV systems from distant stations. The proposed draft of amendment No. 3 (new sec. 330(b) of the act) would empower the Commission to promulgate standards which would as nearly as possible equalize the technical quality of reception of programs of local and distant stations distributed by CATV systems.

A detailed statement of the problems and circumstances underlying the legislative recommendations transmitted herewith may be found in the attached copy of the Commission's Report and Order of April 13, 1959, in Docket No. 12443, which was a formal "Inquiry Into the Impact of Community Antenna Systems, TV Translators, TV Satellite Stations, and TV Repeaters on the Orderly Development of Television Broadcasting."

PROPOSED LEGISLATION RELATING TO INTERSTATE COMMERCE

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, by request of the Interstate Commerce Commission, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a series of bills relating to interstate commerce. I ask unanimous consent that the recommendation and justification accompanying each bill be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bills will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the recommendations and justifications will be printed in the RECORD.

The bills, introduced by Mr. MAGNUSON, by request, were received, read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committe on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, as follows:

S. 1802. A bill to amend section 208(c) of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended.

(The recommendation and justification accompanying Senate bill 1802 are as follows:)

RECOMMENDATION No. 2

This proposed bill would give effect to legislative recommendation No. 2 of the Interstate Commerce Commission as set forth on page 136 of its 72d annual report as follows:

"We recommend that section 208(c), which automatically gives special or charter service rights to common carriers by motor vehicle, be amended to make it inapplicable to carriers issued certificates in the future."

JUSTIFICATION

The attached draft bill would require future applicants for authority to operate as a common carrier of passengers by motor vehicle to show a need for charter service instead of acquiring the right to perform such service as an incident to obtaining a certificate to transport passengers over a specified route.

Under the present provisions of section 208(c) of the Interstate Commerce Act, any regular route motor common carrier of passengers may transport, under a certificate issued pursuant to part II of the act, special or chartered parties "to any place" under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Interstate Commerce Commission. The Commission has interpreted the phrase "to any place" to mean "to any place or point in the United States," the Commisison being of the view that the language of the statute precludes it from specifying with particularity the destination of such special or charter parties. Ex parte No. MC–29, Regulations Governing Special or Chartered Party Service (29 M.C.C. 25).

Section 208(c) is, moreover, silent with respect to origin territory. However, in interpreting the section in this respect and in prescribing rules and regulations thereunder, the Commission sought to clarify the term origin territory by stating in Ex parte MC–29, supra, that a common carrier of passengers by motor vehicle subject to the rules promulgated under section 208(c) may transport special or charter parties (1) which originate at any point or points on the regular route or routes or at any off-route point or points, authorized to be served by such carrier, or (2) which originate at any point or points within the territory served by its regular route or routes. At present, section 208(c) is applicable to regular route operations between fixed termini which have been authorized under the first proviso in section 206(a) or under section 207(a) of the act.

During the early years of motor carrier regulation there appeared to be no necessity to limit the expansion of special or charter operators enjoying "incidental" charter rights. In recent years, however, abuses have been observed. Because of this provision in the law, carriers have frequently sought authority to perform passenger service over short regular routes for the sole purpose of securing the incidental charter rights from points on their routes to all points in the United States. Some carriers, in fact, conduct only token operations over their authorized routes in order to retain the right to perform such nationwide charter service. As a result of these and other abuses there now exists a surplus of charter operators, all to the detriment of sound conditions in this branch of the motor carrier industry.

The amount of regularly scheduled intercity bus business has been declining steadily for a number of years. It has therefore become increasingly necessary for the carriers performing such services to supplement their income by expanding their charter operations. In many instances the maintenance of their financial stability depends on their ability to do so.

Enactment of this proposed amendment should serve to strengthen the regular route motor carrier passenger business by requiring future applicants to show a need for the service of transporting special or charter parties instead of acquiring such right automatically upon obtaining authority to transport passengers over a specified route. Further dilution of available business could thereby be controlled by the Commission. It should be emphasized, however, that the proposed change would in no way affect the operation of presently authorized carriers.

S. 1803. A bill to amend section 212(a) of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended.

(The recommendation and justification accompanying Senate bill 1803 are as follows:)

RECOMMENDATION No. 3

This proposed bill would give effect to legislative recommendation No. 3 of the Interstate Commerce Commission as set forth on page 136 of its 72d annual report to Congress as follows:

"We recommend that section 212(a) be amended in the following respects: (1) to make motor carrier operating authorities subject to suspension, change, or revocation for willful failure to comply with any rule or regulation lawfully promulgated by the Commission; (2) to make the revocation procedure therein prescribed conform to the procedure provided in section 410(f) of the act by eliminating the term "willfully" in the first proviso; and (3) to provide that the Commission may, upon reasonable notice, suspend motor carrier operating authorities for failure to comply with insurance regulations issued by it pursuant to section 215 thereof."

JUSTIFICATION

The purpose of the attached draft bill is to subject motor carrier operating authorities to suspension, change, or revocation for willful failure to comply with any rule or regulation lawfully prescribed by the Commission and to provide uniformity between parts II and IV of the Interstate Commerce Act with respect to revocation procedure. It is also designed to permit suspension of motor carrier operating rights, upon notice, for failure to comply with the Commission's insurance regulations.

The present language of section 212(a) of the act precludes the Commission from suspending or revoking a certificate except for failure to comply with the provisions of part II "or with any * * * regulation of the Commission promulgated thereunder * * *." This language has been found to be unduly restrictive upon the Commission's enforcement powers. For example, regulations prescribed under the Transportation of Explosives Act are not regulations promulgated under any provision of part II of the Interstate Commerce Act. The Commission is therefore powerless to suspend or revoke the certificate of any carrier for violating the Explosives Act or any regulations prescribed thereunder, regardless of how willful the violations may have been. However, by changing the words "promulgated thereunder" to "lawfully promulgated by the Commission," as proposed, the Commission would be able to revoke or suspend certificates for willful or continued noncompliance with any of its lawful rules and regulations. Enactment of this recommended amendment would thus enable the Commission to cope more effectively, in the public interest, with serious violations of any of its applicable rules or regulations and not only those promulgated under part II of the Interstate Commerce Act.

Under the first proviso of section 410(f) of the act, the permit of a freight forwarder may be revoked if the holder thereof fails to comply with an order of the Commission commanding compliance with the provisions of part IV, a rule or regulation issued by the Commission thereunder, or the terms, conditions, or limitations of its permit. Under the corresponding provision in section 212(a), however, the failure of a motor carrier to obey such compliance order must be shown to have been willful before its certificate or permit may be revoked. In such revocation proceedings, two hearings are necessary, one to establish that a willful violation has occurred, after which a compliance order is entered, and a second to establish willful disobedience of the compliance order. Once disobedience of a compliance order is established, a further showing of willfulness should not be required. Proof of disobedience should be sufficient. This proposed change would not eliminate a second hearing, but would merely change the quantum of proof required.

Under the second proviso in section 212(a) motor carriers' and brokers' operating authorities may be suspended, upon notice, but without hearing, for failure to comply with brokerage bond regulations and tariff publishing rules. It does not, however, provide for suspension on short notice for failure to maintain proof of cargo, public liability, and property-damage insurance under section 215. As indicated, section 410(f) is a counterpart of section 212(a) and contains a provision similar to the second proviso of section 212(a). The second proviso in section 410(f), however, provides for suspension on short notice of freight forwarder permits for failure to comply with the cargo insurance provisions under section 403(c) and the public-liability and property-damage insurance provisions under section 403(d).

There is even more reason from the standpoint of the traveling and shipping public to require motor carriers to keep their cargo and public-liability and property-damage insurance in force than there is to require freight forwarders to keep their insurance alive. It is therefore desirable in the public interest that the Commission have the authority to suspend motor carrier rights, on short notice, when insurance lapses, or is canceled without replacement, until compliance is effected. The prospect of such action by the Commission should act as a deterrent to violations of this nature. An investigation under section 204(c) is not a satisfactory answer to the problem since such a proceeding may be somewhat lengthy and the public may be adversely affected should losses occur while it is pending.

The amendments proposed in this draft bill would enable the Commission to administer the enforcement provisions of part II of the act more effectively.

S. 1804. A bill to amend part III of the Interstate Commerce Act to authorize the Interstate Commerce Commission to revoke, amend, or suspend water carrier certificates or permits under certain conditions.

(The recommendation and justification accompanying Senate bill 1804 are as follows:)

RECOMMENDATION No. 4

This proposed bill would give effect to Legislative Recommendation No. 4 of the Interstate Commerce Commission as set forth on page 137 of its 72d annual report as follows:

"We recommend that part III of the act be amended by adding after section 312 a new section (312a) containing provisions for revocation of water-carrier certificates or permits for nonuse."

JUSTIFICATION

The purpose of the attached draft bill is to grant the Interstate Commerce Commission specific authority to revoke water carrier certificates and permits for nonuse. It would also specifically authorize the Commission, in its discretion, to amend or revoke, in whole or part, a certificate or permit upon the application of the holder thereof.

At present, a number of water carrier operating authorities are not being used. The existence of such dormant certificates and permits is a deterrent to the institution of new operations and makes it difficult for the Commission to determine to what extent duplicating new authorities should be granted. While water carriers should have reasonable protection against the loss of their operating rights where abnormal or special conditions have hindered the continuance of operations or the resumption thereof following the war, it is not in the public interest that unused operating authorities remain in effect indefinitely.

Part III of the Interstate Commerce Act, however, does not specifically provide revocation authority and procedure such as are found in parts II and IV thereof. In this connection, the Supreme Court, in United States v. Seatrain Lines, Inc., 329 U.S. 424, indicated that the Commission does not have the authority to revoke water carrier certificates or permits, in whole or in part, once they have become effective and the time for requesting rehearing or reconsideration has expired.

Accordingly, this proposed measure would give the Commission specific authority to determine upon the facts in each case whether the public interest would be served by the revocation of a certificate or permit for nonuse. It would also make certain the Commission's power to revoke a water carrier's operating authority if tendered by the holder for cancellation.

The authority sought is limited to the revocation of certificates and permits only in those cases of willful failure to operate or upon application of the holder. It is not contemplated that authorities would be revoked without allowing a reasonable period of time for the institution or resumption of service.

S. 1805. A bill to amend the Clayton Antitrust Act and the Federal Trade Commission Act with respect to the applicability thereof to contract carriers subject to the Interstate Commerce Act, and for other purposes.

(The recommendation and justification accompanying Senate bill 1805 are as follows:)

RECOMMENDATION No. 5

This proposed bill would give effect to Legislative Recommendation No. 5 of the Interstate Commerce Commission as set forth on page 138 of its 72d annual report as follows:

"(a) We recommend that section 10 of the Clayton Antitrust Act (15 U.S.C., sec. 20) be amended so as to increase the limitation on exemption from competitive bidding to a more realistic amount in the light of present-day conditions.

"(b) We also recommend that section 11 of the Clayton Act (15 U.S.C., sec. 21) be amended to provide that the Commission's jurisdiction shall include contract carriers as well as common carriers subject to the Interstate Commerce Act, and that section 8 thereof (15 U.S.C., sec. 19), relating to interlocking directorates, be amended to make the exemption therein apply to all common and contract carriers subject to the Interstate Commerce Act to the same extent that it now applies to common carriers subject to parts I and II thereof.

"(c) In addition, we recommend that sections 5(a)(6), 6(a), and 6(b) of the Federal Trade Commission Act (15 U.S.C., secs. 45(a)(6), 46(a), and 46(b)), relating to unfair trade practices, investigations and reports, respectively, be amended so as to make the common carrier exemptions therein provided applicable also to contract carriers subject to the Interstate Commerce Act."

JUSTIFICATION

The attached draft bill would amend the Clayton Antitrust Act to make the exemption in section 8, which relates to interlocking directorates, apply to all common and contract carriers subject to the Interstate Commerce Act to the same extent that it now applies to common carriers subject to parts I and II thereof. The limitation on exemption from competitive bidding in section 10 would be increased from $50,000 to $200,000, and the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission under section 11 would be extended to include contract as well as common carriers subject to the Interstate Commerce Act. The proposed measure would also amend the Federal Trade Commission Act so as to make the common carrier exemption in sections 5(a)(6), 6(a), and 6(b), which pertain to unfair trade practices, investigations, and reports, respectively, applicable also to contract carriers subject to the Interstate Commerce Act.

Except where transactions involve $50,000, or less, in the aggregate in any 1 year, section 10 of the Clayton Act requires that dealings in securities and supplies, and contracts for maintenance and construction, between common carriers and other corporations having directors or certain officers or agents in common, shall be subject to competitive bidding, and that detailed statements of such transactions shall be filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission. The Commission, in turn, is required, after investigation or hearing, to report suspected violations to the Attorney General.

The $50,000 limitation on the exemption from competitive bidding has remained unchanged since this section was first enacted in 1914. In view of the increase in the cost of materials, labor, and supplies which has occurred since that time, the Commission is of the opinion that the amount of the exemption should be increased to a figure more in keeping with present-day conditions. The Congress itself recognized the desirability of updating statutes in this respect when it enacted Public Law 85-135 (85th Cong., 1st sess.) providing increased penalties for violations of certain safety and other laws administered by the Commission. The Commission also took cognizance of this situation when, effective January 1, 1956, it changed the basis of classification for class I railroads for statistical purposes from carriers having $1 million or more in average annual operating revenues to those having $3 million or more in such revenues. Similarly, the bases of classification for class I, II, and III motor carriers of property were increased by the Commission, effective January 1, 1957.

Under section 11 of the Clayton Act, the Commission's jurisdiction extends only to common carriers subject to the Interstate Commerce Act. Therefore, under the present provisions of this section, jurisdiction over the acquisition by one corporation of stock in another corporation, when the effect would be to substantially lessen competition, would be in the Federal Trade Commission where contract carriers are involved. At the same time, the Interstate Commerce Commission would have jurisdiction under section 5 of the Interstate Commerce Act over the establishment of control of two or more carriers.

The standards prescribed and used under section 5 of the Interstate Commerce Act in determining whether or not a proposed transaction should be approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission are different from those used by the Department of Justice and other agencies in determining whether or not any violations of the Clayton Act or other antitrust laws have been committed. This is necessarily so because a regulated industry is involved, such regulation itself having been provided for the purpose of protecting the public interest. Inasmuch as the Interstate Commerce Commission has jurisdiction over various activities and practices of contract carriers, including the issuance and transfer of operating rights, it seems logical and appropriate that it should also administer the Clayton Act with respect to such carriers.

Section 8 of the Clayton Act, which prohibits interlocking directorates under the conditions set forth therein, exempts rail and motor common carriers from the application of its provisions, but it does not exempt water common carriers, freight forwarders, or motor and water contract carriers from the application thereof. A similar situation arises under section 5(a)(6), 6(a), and 6(b) of the Federal Trade Commission Act which exempts common but not contract carriers from the provisions thereof respecting unfair trade practices, investigations, and reports. In order to afford all carriers subject to the Interstate Commerce Act similarity of treatment under the aforementioned provisions of the Clayton Act and the Federal Trade Commission Act, it is urged that the two latter-named acts be amended as proposed in the draft bill.

S. 1806. A bill to revise title 18, chapter 39, of the United States Code, entitled "Explosives and Combustibles."

(The recommendation and justification accompanying Senate bill 1806 are as follows:)

RECOMMENDATION No. 6

This proposed bill would give effect to legislative recommendation No. 6 of the Interstate Commerce Commission as set forth on page 139 of its 72d annual report as follows:

"We recommend that the Federal statutes commonly known as the Transportation of Explosives Act (18 U.S.C., secs. 831–835) be completely rewritten in the light of important developments relating to this subject which have occurred in the 36 years since the last revision of these statutes, and in this connection recommend that they be amended so as to include specifically radioactive materials and etiologic agents and be made to apply to contract and private carriers as well as common carriers."

JUSTIFICATION

The attached draft bill would amend the Federal statutes, commonly known as the Transportation of Explosives Act, so as to include specifically radioactive materials and etiologic agents; would make the act applicable to contract and private carriers as well as to common carriers; and would delete the word "knowingly" from present section 835 and substitute therefor a more effective standard of proof.

During the past several years there has been a continuous trend toward greater use of motor carriers in the transportation of explosives. Along with this trend there has been a tremendous increase in the production and transportation of radioactive materials and etiologic agents. While the Transportation of Explosives Act does not specifically mention radioactive materials, the Commission has prescribed regulations covering materials of this nature by classifying them as "poisons."

The Commission has not prescribed any regulations governing the transportation of etiologic agents. Technically, etiologic agents, such as live viruses, bacteria, and other such substances which can cause disease, are not poisons, since toxic material (poison) per se is not a living organism. Parke, Davis & Co., in its comments to the American Drug Manufacturers Association in 1957 suggested that appropriate regulations respecting the packaging and labeling of shipments of etiologic agents be drafted and adopted by either the Civil Aeronautics Board or Interstate Commerce Commission. It is understood that the Civil Aeronautics Board and the U.S. Coast Guard are of the view that shipments of etiologic agents should be regulated, but that this Commission should establish the rules therefor, since both of these agencies adopt the rules and regulations formulated by the Commission respecting shipments of explosives and other dangerous articles.

The Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, Public Health Service, caused to be published in the Federal Register, volume 22, No. 32, page 954, February 15, 1957, an amendment to the interstate quarantine regulations relating to the interstate transportation of etiologic agents. While this amendment relates to the jurisdiction of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, the attached draft bill would make clear the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission in the transportation of such commodities by amending the act so as to include specifically radioactive materials and etiologic agents in the list of dangerous commodities.

The proposed bill would also make the act applicable to contract and private motor carriers in addition to its present application to common carriers, and would thereby eliminate the anomalous situation of having motor common carriers subject to maximum penalties of $10,000 or 10 years' imprisonment, or both, for violations, while subjecting private and contract carriers to a maximum possible penalty of only $500, under section 222(a) of the Interstate Commerce Act, for the same violations.

Under the proposed amendment, the provisions of the statute relating to packing, marking, etc., of explosives, and other dangerous articles would be made applicable to shippers tendering goods to interstate carriers regardless of whether the shipments are destined for movement in interstate, intrastate, or foreign commerce. In addition, the proposed amendments are intended to make the provisions which are applicable to carriers apply also to all shipments of dangerous articles, including intrastate shipments handled on interstate vehicles or commingled with interstate traffic. This is to protect interstate passengers, employees of interstate carriers, and the facilities of interstate carriers from the hazards of misdescribed or improperly packed, marked, or prepared dangerous articles so moving in intrastate commerce as well as in interstate commerce.

The present provisions of the act respecting the transportation of explosives on vehicles of common carriers of passengers would be extended by the proposed bill to include all for-hire carriers of passengers by land, and the provisions exempting specified quantities of various articles would be changed so as to authorize the Commission to prescribe the kind, amount, and the conditions under which such articles may be carried on such vehicles. The proposed bill would also eliminate the privilege of carrying unlimited quantities of small arms ammunition in or on passenger vehicles, the Commission being of the view that the presence of such items in substantial quantities in buses is undesirable because of the danger of fire in the event of an accident.

Section 833 of the act now contains an absolute prohibition against the transportation of liquid nitroglycerin and other similarly dangerous commodities by common carriers, but contains no such prohibition against the transportation thereof by contract or private motor carriers. The proposed revision is not intended to restrict the transportation of such commodities, or of radioactive materials, or etiologic agents, to any particular class of carrier or persons, but would strictly limit and regulate the transportation thereof (except as to certain shipments of radioactive materials by or under the direction or supervision of the Atomic Energy Commission or the Department of Defense) by providing that such commodities shall not be transported except under such rules and regulations as the Commission shall prescribe. And, in this connection, the Commission would be granted authority to determine what explosives constitute "other similarly dangerous explosives."

Under the proposed revision, the existing provisions of section 834, relating to the marking of packages containing explosives and other dangerous articles, would be extended to the tendering of such articles to all carriers by land and water, and to all persons, carrying such articles upon any interstate carrier by land, including private, as well as common and contract carriers. The present reference in this section to section 832 would be changed to proposed new section 834 in order to correct an error apparently made in recodifying the act. (Compare 18 U.S.C. 1946 ed., sec. 385, with 18 U.S.C. 1952 ed., sec. 834.)

The provisions of present section 835 (section 834 in the draft bill) would be revised so as to include specifically radioactive materials and etiologic agents, and so as to provide that the Commission may avail itself of the services, advice, and assistance of carrier and shipper associations and the departments and agencies of State and local governments.

Regulations for protection against hazards created by explosives or other dangerous articles with respect to water carriers are provided for in 46 U.S.C. 170.

In addition to the foregoing, the proposed bill also would eliminate the word "knowingly" from present section 835 (section 834 in the draft bill), and would substitute therefor the words "being aware that the Interstate Commerce Commission has formulated regulations for the safe transportation of explosives and other dangerous articles." The standard of proof presently required to support a conviction for a violation of the Commission's regulations makes it extremely difficult to prosecute what have been termed "public welfare offenses." Such offenses are not necessarily the result of an affirmative intent but fall more within the category of those relating to neglect where the law requires care, or inaction where it imposes a duty to act.

In Boyce Motor Line, Inc. v. United States, 342 U.S. 337, the Supreme Court reviewed the sufficiency of an indictment for a felony violation brought under section 835 of the act. The Court stated at page 342:

"The statute punishes only those who knowingly violate the regulation. This requirement of the presence of culpable intent as a necessary element of the offense does much to destroy any force in the argument that application of the regulation would be so unfair that it must be held invalid. That is evident from a consideration of the effect of the requirement in this case. To sustain a conviction, the Government not only must prove that petitioner could have taken another route which was both commercially practicable and appreciably safer (in its avoidance of crowded thoroughfares, etc.) than the one it did follow. It must also be shown that petitioner knew that there was such a practicable safer route and yet deliberately took the more dangerous route through the tunnel, or that petitioner willfully neglected to exercise its duty under the regulation to inquire into the availability of such an alternative route."

In many prosecutions under this statute misdemeanor violations arise out of the failure to properly placard vehicles carrying dangerous cargo. The use of the words "culpable intent" in the above quotation has been relied upon by defense attorneys and to some extent by the courts as requiring the establishment of some mental element or affirmative intention to evade the law in addition to knowledge of the facts.

In St. Johnsbury Trucking Co. v. United States, 220 F. 2d 393, a conviction resulted after trial in the district court wherein it was shown that there was no affirmative intention to violate the regulation but that the failure to placard the motor vehicle arose because of the failure of a rating clerk to attach a warning label to the shipping document which he, in turn, passed on to the billing clerk for preparation of a freight bill and delivery receipt. Clearly there was knowledge of the fact that (1) the vehicle was carrying 3,350 pounds of wet electric storage batteries and (2) it was not placarded. The following statement appeared in the opinion rendered by the district court:

"Thus, considering the purposes of section 835, the particular offense requires no element of criminal intent. United States v. Behrman, 258 U.S. 280; United States v. Baliant, 258 U.S. 250."

The circuit court set aside the verdict and remanded the case, holding that the above-mentioned quotation was in conflict with the decision of the Supreme Court as quoted from the Boyce case. The circuit court said:

"This statement [of the Supreme Court] conflicts with the statement of the trial court in the instant case that '* * * the particular offense requires no element of criminal intent.' It may be true that 'culpable' and 'criminal' are not identical in meaning, but it is clear that the trial court erroneously interpreted 18 U.S.C. 835 as requiring no element of culpable or blamable intent and thus committed reversible error."

The concurring opinion of Chief Judge Magruder contains the following statements:

"If it be thought that the indicated requirement of proof will seriously hamper effective enforcement of the Interstate Commerce Commission regulations, the answer is that Congress is at liberty to fix that up by striking out from 18 U.S.C. 835 the prescribed element of mens rea—'knowingly'—as applied to violation of regulations of the sort here involved. That is to say, Congress could convert the offense into what sometimes has been called a 'public welfare offense,' requiring no element of guilty knowledge or other specific mens rea, by providing that whoever, by himself or by agent, transports explosives, poison gas, flammable solids, or other dangerous commodities without the safeguards which may be prescribed by a lawful regulation of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be guilty of a public offense and subject to penalty. See the discussion in Morissette v. United States (342 U.S. 246, 252–260 (1952)).

"If a statute provides that it shall be an offense 'knowingly' to sell adulterated milk, the offense is complete if the defendant sells what he knows to be adulterated milk, even though he does not know of the existence of the criminal statute, on the time-honored principle of the criminal law that ignorance of the law is no excuse. But where a statute provides, as does 18 U.S.C. 835, that whoever knowingly violates a regulation of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be guilty of an offense, it would seem that a person could not knowingly violate a regulation unless he knows of the terms of the regulation and knows that what he is doing is contrary to the regulation. Here again the definition of the offense is within the control and discreation of the legislature."

The deletion of the word "knowingly" in section 835, in the interest of the greater good, places the burden of acting at hazard upon a person otherwise innocent but standing in responsible relation to a public danger. Whatever the intent of the violator, the potential danger to society remains the same, whether the violation is brought about by haphazard, careless conduct, or whether it is prompted by an evil purpose. Mere removal of the word "knowingly" from the present wording of the statute would impose an absolute liability upon the carrier. Because of the added peril inherent in the transportation of the commodities concerned, statutory creation of an absolute liability does not seem unreasonable. However, the language recommended by the Senate Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee in its Report No. 281, dated May 2, 1957, and substituted by the Senate in passing S. 1491 during the 1st session of the 85th Congress, has been incorporated in the attached draft bill. While the Commission is still of the view that simply deleting the word "knowingly" from this section of the statute is more desirable, it believes the substitution therefor of the words "being aware that the Interstate Commerce Commission has formulated regulations for the safe transportation of explosives and other dangerous articles" is a substantial improvement over the present provisions.

The definition of the word "person" in section 831 includes copartnerships. This would reaffirm the 5-to-4 decision of the Supreme Court in United States v. A. & P. Trucking Co. (358 U.S. 121 (decided Dec. 8, 1958)), and thus settle once and for all the question of whether a partnership entity may be criminally liable under the Transportation of Explosives Act.

The proposed bill would also add new provisions to the act which would clarify the duties and powers of the Commission with respect to the administration and enforcement thereof.

S. 1807. A bill to amend section 5(10) of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, to change the basis for determining whether a proposed unification or acquisition of control comes within the exemption.

(The recommendation and justification accompanying Senate bill 1807 are as follows:)

RECOMMENDATION NO. 8

This proposed bill would give effect to legislative recommendation No. 8 of the Interstate Commerce Commission as set forth on page 141 of its 72d annual report as follows:

"We recommend that section 5(10) be amended so as to make gross operating revenue, instead of the number of vehicles owned or operated, the basis for determining whether a proposed unification or acquisition of control is exempt from the provisions of section 5."

JUSTIFICATION

The attached draft bill is designed to provide a more reliable criterion for determining whether a proposed unification or acquisition of control comes within the exemption of subsection (10) of section 5 of the Interstate Commerce Act.

One of the tests for determining whether a proposed transaction is exempt from the requirements of section 5 is whether or not the aggregate number of motor vehicles owned, leased, controlled, or operated by the parties, for purposes of transportation subject to part II of the act exceeds 20. In applying this test, numerous questions have arisen concerning, for example, (a) vehicles that are used in intrastate commerce, exempt transportation, or private carriage, but which are available or suitable for regulated interstate service, (b) equipment of noncarrier affiliates, (c) vehicles leased for short periods, (d) disabled vehicles, and (e) combinations of vehicles. The time and effort expended in establishing the number on which jurisdiction depends, where the question is close, has proved disproportionate to the benefit intended to be allowed by the exemption. It has proved virtually impossible in many instances to check whether the exemption was applicable to transactions purportedly consummated under the exemption, and subsequently questioned as improperly exempted.

Gross operating revenues of carriers would be a definite and practical basis for the exemption. The figures would in most cases be readily ascertainable from the annual reports which all for-hire carriers, with certain exceptions, are required to file, and from the quarterly reports which such carriers with average gross revenues of $200,000 or more are required to file. As of June 30, 1958, there were 3,538 of the latter and 15,062 with average gross revenues of less than $200,000 per annum. On the basis of a limited study, the Commission is of the opinion that the use of $250,000 as the measure for the exemption will correspond roughly with the present measure in paragraph (10).

S. 1808. A bill to amend section 222(b) of the Interstate Commerce Act with respect to the service of process in enforcement proceedings, and for other purposes.

(The recommendation and justification accompanying Senate bill 1808 are as follows:)

RECOMMENDATION NO. 9

This proposed bill would give effect to Legislative Recommendation No. 9 of the Interstate Commerce Commission as set forth on page 141 of its 72d annual report, as follows:

"We recommend that section 222(b) be amended to enable the Commission in enforcement proceedings to obtain service of process upon motor carriers and to permit the joining of any other necessary party without regard to where the carrier or other party may be served."

JUSTIFICATION

The purpose of the attached draft bill is to provide the Interstate Commerce Commission with a more effective means of enforcing the motor carrier provisions of the Interstate Commerce Act.

Section 222(b) of the Interstate Commerce Act authorizes the Commission to institute proceedings to enjoin unlawful motor carrier or broker operations or practices in the U.S. district court of any district in which the carrier or broker operates. Rule 4(f) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, however, limits the service of process in such proceedings to the territorial limits of the State in which the court sits.

Many of the carriers against whom it is necessary to seek injunctions do not hold operating authority from the Commission and have not, of course, designated an agent for the service of process as required by section 221(c) of the act. The operations of such carriers are frequently widespread and it is often desirable to institute the court action in the State where the greatest part of their services are performed. This is usually the most convenient place for the majority of persons involved, including necessary witnesses. The illegal operator, himself, however, may avoid service of process by remaining outside of the State and by not stationing within its borders anyone qualified to receive service on his behalf.

In many cases the Commission has found that a large shipper is the person primarily responsible for the conduct of unauthorized operations over wide areas by a large number of independent owner-operators or small carriers. It is therefore frequently desirable, and often of critical importance, that such other persons, in addition to the carrier, be enjoined from participating in further violations of the law or the Commission's regulations thereunder. In some instances, however, the Commission has been unable to obtain service of process upon both the carrier and the shipper because they were not located within the territorial limits of the same State.

Under the ruling of the court in I.C.C. v. Blue Diamond Products Co. (192 F. 2d 43) the Commission is precluded from proceeding against a shipper without proceeding against the carrier. The Commission does not disagree with the principle of that case, but it is of the view that it should be able to institute a civil action against a carrier in any district in which it operates and to join in such action any shipper, or other persons participating in the violation, without regard to where the carrier or such other person may be served. An injunction against one or several relatively small carriers without the shipper or such other person being named permits the shipper or other person to continue his unlawful activities by using individual truckowners or small carriers against whom no action has been instituted. The Commission is of the view in this connection that it would be desirable to provide directly in section 222(b) sufficient authority to include in such actions, in addition to the carrier, any shippers or other persons participating in the commission of the violation, without having to resort to other statutes or theories as authority to do so.

The problem presented has been particularly troublesome in the efforts of the Commission to control so-called pseudoprivate carriage, i.e., for-hire carriers claiming, without basis, to be engaged in private transportation for the purpose of evading the economic regulation to which common and contract carriers are subject. The operations involved are often extremely widespread, e.g., from Louisiana to Nebraska, from New York to Missouri, and the unlicensed operator may be domiciled at any place between the origin and destination areas, or even beyond those areas. The headquarters of the responsible shipper, on the other hand, may be located in New York City or New Orleans and it may be possible to serve him only at those points or at a place other than where the physical operations of the carrier are conducted. Thus, because of the inability of the Commission, under present law, to get both the responsible shipper and the small carrier before the court, its effort at effective enforcement is, in many cases, thwarted.

The proposed amendment would make more effective the original intent of Congress in enacting section 222(b), and would be of substantial aid to the Commission in coping with the pseudoprivate carriage problem, the seriousness of which was recognized by the Congress when as part of the Transportation Act of 1958 it amended section 203(c) of the Interstate Commerce Act so as to spell out more clearly what constitutes bona fide private carriage.

S. 1809. A bill to repeal section 303(b) of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, relating to the water-carrier bulk commodity exemption, and for other purposes.

(The recommendation and justification accompanying Senate bill 1809 are as follows:)

RECOMMENDATION NO. 10

This proposed bill would give effect to Legislative Recommendation No. 10 of the Interstate Commerce Commission as set forth on page 142 of its 72d annual report to Congress as follows:

"We recommend that section 303(b) relating to the water-carrier bulk commodity exemption be repealed, but with provisions preserving the rights of those carriers presently engaged in such operations under the exemption."

JUSTIFICATION

The attached draft bill would enable the Interstate Commerce Commission to regulate domestic water transportation more effectively in the public interest by repealing the so-called bulk commodity exemption in section 303(b) of the Interstate Commerce Act. It would also provide "grandfather" rights for those carriers presently engaged in operations under the exemption.

Improved navigation facilities on the Nation's rivers have made them important water highways for low cost transportation of goods in commerce when speed in transit is not a controlling factor. New and improved methods of providing service are being introduced continuously, with a growing trend toward the utilization of vessels having higher cargo capacities and greater power. The size of barge-tows on inland waterways has increased steadily. For example, on the Columbia River, where tows formerly consisted of one or two barges, tows comprised of 6 to 12 barges are not now uncommon. Not only are barges being built larger, they are also being designed and constructed to accommodate commodities requiring specialized handling, such as those requiring unusually high or low temperatures, and those having caustic or other characteristics requiring specially lined tanks.

It is probably not generally realized, but, despite the substantial operations involved, domestic water transportation is for the most part exempt from economic regulation by the Interstate Commerce Commission. It has been estimated that only about 10 percent of the tonnage shipped by water in the domestic trade is subject to regulation. Private carriers are not subject to regulation by the Commission and should not become so unless shippers are to be deprived of the opportunity to transport for themselves. However, the many exemptions in the act leave the greater part of all domestic water transportation free from regulation. The most important of these is the bulk commodity exemption in section 303(b), under which the transportation of commodities in bulk by water carriers is exempt when the cargo space of the vessel in which such commodities are transported is being used for the carrying of not more than three such commodities. This exemption does not apply when nonexempt commodities are transported in the same vessel or tow as bulk commodities.

Bulk commodities transported in the domestic trade under this exemption consist mainly of grain and grain products, coal and coke, ore, sand, gravel and stone, phosphate rock, salt, and sulfur. A substantial portion of the tonnage handled by the regulated barge carriers is comprised of these commodities. Often such traffic is moved in tows containing nonbulk commodities because the carriers seldom find it economically feasible to segregate tows to exclude nonexempt commodities. For that reason the bulk-exemption is not applicable and the regulated carrier must, among other things, adhere to its published tariff rates.

The unregulated carriers need only examine the published tariffs of the regulated carriers in order to determine how low they must place their quotations to the shipper in order to obtain the traffic. The regulated carriers, on the other hand, have no ready means of ascertaining the rates charged by the exempt carriers, since those carriers need not publish their rates. This, of course, places the regulated carriers at a distinct competitive disadvantage. A natural result of these conditions is instability of rates.

Further, it should be pointed out that rail and water rates, particularly in the case of inland waterways, are not separate but are intermingled in very complex, competitive relationships. This means that shippers and carriers lack a firm basis for resolving the differences which develop among them when one group of carriers is able to change its rates at will and vary them from shipper to shipper.

The public interest in stable, reasonable, and properly regulated rates cannot find expression in the complete absence of control of a large part of the bulk-carrying trade. Enactment of the proposed legislation would provide a means of correcting these undesirable conditions, and would also constitute an important step toward achieving broad equality of treatment of carriers of the various modes.

S. 1810. A bill to repeal the provisions of section 5 of the act of July 28, 1916, as amended, relating to the furnishing of information to the Postmaster General by the Interstate Commerce Commission with respect to revenue received by railroad from express companies for the transportation of express matter.

(The recommendation and justification accompanying Senate bill 1810 are as follows:)

RECOMMENDATION NO. 11

This proposed bill would give effect to Legislative Recommendation No. 11 of the Interstate Commerce Commission as set forth on page 143 of its 72d annual report as follows:

"We recommend that section 557, title 39 of the United States Code, under which the Commission, from time to time, is requested to furnish the Postmaster General with information as to the revenue received by railroad companies from express companies for services rendered in the transportation of express matter, be repealed."

JUSTIFICATION

The attached draft bill would repeal certain provisions of section 5 of the Railway Mail Service Pay Act which have become obsolete. Under these provisions, codified as 39 U.S.C., sec. 557, the Postmaster General is required to request, from time to time, from the Interstate Commerce Commission, information with respect to revenue received by railroad companies from express companies for services rendered in the transportation of express matter. He is also authorized, in his discretion, to arrange for the transportation of other than first-class mail at rates not exceeding those so ascertained and reported to him.

These provisions were enacted by the Congress in 1916 for the purpose of preventing rate discrimination by the railroads against the Government in the transportation of the mails. At that time there existed several competing railway express companies, each of which maintained separate contractual relations with the railroads. Reimbursement to the railroads was based upon a specific rate structure. Today, however, railway express operations are conducted on an entirely different basis.

The end of Federal control of the railroads and express companies in 1920 was followed by a series of changes in the status of railway express, resulting finally in the establishment of a single express agency, Railway Express Agency, Inc., under the ownership and control of a large number of railroads. The express company acts as the railroads' agent, and the transportation of express matter over their lines is not now and has not for many years been performed under a system of rates, the rate structures formerly utilized in determining the amounts to be paid by railway express to the railroads having been discontinued. What the railroads now receive from the express agency is not a rate, but a share of the returns from a business, the amount varying with business conditions and the effectiveness of competition. These changes in the organization and operation of the Express Agency and in the relationship between the agency and the railroads made the statutory provisions in question obsolete.

The Postmaster General has nevertheless, on several occasions, requested from the Commission information as to the revenue received by the railroads from the Railway Express Agency and the rates, as ascertained, for services rendered in the transportation of express matter. The request is not merely for the gross revenue received from express service, or even the gross revenue plus car-miles, car-foot-miles, or ton-miles of service performed, but is, in effect, a request for the Commission to construct something in the nature of an abstract "rate" by translating revenue received into rates based on units of service. In declining to grant such a request in 1949 the Commission took the position that, in view of the present organization and operation of the express agency, section 557 of title 39 does not place upon it the duty or mandate to make an investigation and study of the present operation of the railroads and the express agency in connection with the transportation of express matter, and the revenues derived therefrom, for the purpose of formulating rates, and that the section does not contain any direction to the Commission from the Congress that it should do so. The same request was considered in 1954 and the Commission arrived at the same conclusion. The Commission has, however, furnished, or expressed willingness to furnish, all the information it has concerning the revenue receipts of the railroads from railway express.

Even if an investigation were undertaken by the Commission to determine the amount of express matter carried by the railroads in any given period of time upon a space, weight, or other basis, and its relation, by units of service or otherwise, to the revenue received therefor from Railway Express, the information derived would only reflect, or be reportable as, the result of operations during a selected prior period, and would have no prospective application or effect. The data obtained, though it be related to amounts of service performed in selected units of service, would not result in an ascertainment of rates charged by the railroads for service on behalf of Railway Express. Such an investigation would, moreover, be a major undertaking requiring considerable time, and the information derived would be based on figures and facts of record in respect of which significant changes may have occurred in the interim.

Repeal of these provisions of section 5 would remove from the books an obsolete law under which the Commission is requested to make available information which it does not have and which it cannot feasibly obtain.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, by request of the Interstate Commerce Commission, on behalf of myself and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL], I introduce, for appropriate reference, two bills relating to interstate and foreign commerce. I ask unanimous consent that the justification and recommendation relating to each bill may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bills will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the justification and recommendation will be printed in the RECORD.

The bills, introduced by Mr. MAGNUSON (for himself and Mr. SCHOEPPEL), by request, were received, read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, as follows:

S. 1811. A bill to amend section 1(14)(a) of the Interstate Commerce Act, to provide an incentive for construction and maintenance of an adequate national supply of freight cars.

(The justification accompanying Senate bill 1811 is as follows:)

JUSTIFICATION

The attached draft bills, submitted in the alternative, would enable the Commission to deal more effectively with problems arising from freight-car shortages.

The freight-car supply situation has been a serious problem in this country for a number of years. While the shortages have not been as severe in the last 2 years as in some others, the Commission nevertheless believes it imperative that the ownership of such equipment be increased and maintained at a level which will meet the needs of the shipping public during normal times and provide a reasonably adequate supply during periods of emergency.

Besides inadequate car ownership, one of the greatest contributing factors to this unhealthy situation has been the failure of some carriers to utilize the existing fleet of equipment efficiently. During periods of critical shortages the Commission has resorted to every means at its command to cope with the problem. Insofar as shippers and receivers are concerned greatly stepped-up demurrage charges have helped to insure prompt loading and unloading. Such action, however, offers no solution to the problem as it arises during that phase of car movement and handling when the equipment is in the hands of the carrier.

Since the earning value of the average freight car greatly exceeds the current per diem charge of $2.75, some of the carriers have found it cheaper to rent cars than to own them. These carriers, therefore, have no economic incentive to provide their fair share of an adequate car supply. If the advantages of renting equipment could be made less attractive during times of car shortage, there would be a greater willingness on the part of every railroad to make its just and equitable contribution to the national car fleet.

Some time ago the Commission attempted to take the profit out of "renting" equipment by imposing a penalty per diem charge which it believed would furnish a pecuniary spur to deficit railroads to acquire a sufficient number of cars to at least take care of their own loading obligations. However, a three-judge district court in Palmer v. United States (73 F. Supp. 63, (1947)) held that the use of the word "compensation" in section 1(14)(a) of the act, which authorizes the Commission to fix reasonable compensation for the use of cars, precluded it from establishing a per diem charge in excess of any purported reasonable recompense to the owner.

The first alternative draft bill would overcome the effect of this decision by amending section 1(15) of the Interstate Commerce Act so as to authorize the Commission, during periods of car shortage, or threatened car shortage, to direct the assessment of special charges on one or more deficient carriers. These charges, payable to the owning carrier, would be in addition to its per diem or other regular charges then in effect, and would be in such amount as in the Commission's opinion are reasonably calculated to relieve the shortage or threatened shortage by promoting the expeditious movement, distribution, interchange or return of such equipment, and by encouraging adequate ownership of freight cars by each carrier.

If this bill is enacted the Commission, after a study, could adopt a car ownership formula. Once this formula was adopted, the Commission would be in a position to prescribe a level of ownership for deficit carriers. If their ownership was not raised to the prescribed level within a reasonable time they would become subject to the penalty per diem charges in the event of another car shortage.

The second alternative proposal would amend section 1(14)(a) of the act so as to require the Commission in establishing the compensation to be paid for the use of any vehicle subject to per diem charges, based on time or detention as distinguished from mileage, to prescribe maximum reasonable compensation for the use thereof as an incentive for construction and maintenance of an adequate supply of such vehicles. The Commission would also be required to include as a factor in making such a determination, the earning power or value of the use of such vehicles which is lost by the owner thereof when used or appropriated by others. This proposed amendment would thus authorize the Commission to fix per diem rates which give due regard to the necessity of providing an incentive to every railroad to procure and maintain a sufficient car supply at all times, a power which the court in Palmer v. United States, supra, held that it did not have under the present provisions of section 1(14). Such a provision would be of substantial assistance to the Commisison in alleviating freight car shortages by providing it with a means of eliminating the owner's loss, the user's gain, and providing an incentive for increased car ownership. The ultimate objective under either of the alternative proposals is an overall increase in the total inventory of freight cars.

S. 1812. A bill to amend section 1(15) of the Interstate Commerce Act, so as to aid in alleviating shortages of railroad freight cars during periods of emergency of threatened emergency, and for other purposes.

(The recommendation accompanying Senate bill 1812 is as follows:)

RECOMMENDATION NO. 1

This proposed bill would make effective Legislative Recommendation No. 1 of the Interstate Commerce Commisison as set forth on page 135 of its 72d annual report as follows:

"We recommend (a) that section 1(15) be amended so as to authorize the Commission to direct the assessment of penalty per diem charges as an aid in alleviating shortages of railroad freight cars during periods of emergency or threatened emergency, or (b) that section 1(14) be amended so as to authorize the Commission to include as a factor in determining the amount of per diem charges, the earning power or value of the use of the vehicle lost to the owner when used or appropriated by others."

AMENDMENT OF SECTIONS 2322 AND 2323 OF TITLE 28, UNITED STATES CODE

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, by request of the Interstate Commerce Commission, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend sections 2322 and 2323 of title 28, United States Code. I ask unanimous consent that the recommendation and justification of the bill, prepared by the Interstate Commerce Commission, be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the recommendation and justification will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 1813) to amend sections 2322 and 2323 of title 28, United States Code, introduced by Mr. MAGNUSON, by request, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The recommendation and justification presented by Mr. MAGNUSON are as follows:

RECOMMENDATION NO. 7

This proposed bill would give effect to legislative recommendation No. 7 of the Interstate Commerce Commission as set forth on page 140 of its 72d annual report, as follows:

"We recommend that chapter 157, title 28, of the United States Code entitled 'Judiciary and Judicial Procedure,' be amended so as to provide that suits to set aside Commission orders shall be brought against the Commission instead of the United States, with the right of the Government, through the Attorney General, to intervene in any case."

JUSTIFICATION

The attached draft bill would amend title 28 of the United States Code so as to provide for more effective defense of Interstate Commerce Commission orders in the Federal courts.

Under existing statutes providing for judicial review of the Commission's orders by three-judge district courts, the United States, represented by the Department of Justice, is the statutory defendant. The Commission has a statutory right ot intervene in such actions, and it does so regularly through its own attorneys.

In most cases, attorneys for the Department and for the Commission file a joint brief and share the oral argument in court. In recent years, however, the Department of Justice has refused to defend some of the Commission's orders, and in others, has attempted to confess error against the Commission. It has been computed that since 1932 the Department has actively opposed the Commission's position in 13 cases and has confessed error in 13 others.

During the last 3 years, the Department has opposed the Commission in the district court in two cases, one of which involved unusual circumstances. However, there have been recent cases in which attorneys of the Department and of the Commission have successfully defended the Commission's orders and then afterward, upon appeal to the Supreme Court, the Department has reversed its position and attacked the order. Such a reversal of position occurred, for example, in Alleghany Corp. et al. v. Breswick & Co. (353 U.S. 151 (1957)), which involved ar important order of the Commission.

At the beginning of a judicial review proceeding the Commission carefully considers the views expressed by the Department of Justice, and in a number of cases the Commission has, upon the joint recommendation of its attorneys and the attorneys for the Department, reopened a proceeding. However, the orderly defense of the Commission's orders is seriously embarrassed when the Department of Justice joins in attacking such orders for the first time in the Supreme Court.

The Commission is of the view that the Congress expected the Department of Justice to defend the Commission's orders instead of performing the judicial function of deciding whether they are right or wrong. It is recognized, of course, that the Department has a primary responsibility for administration of the antitrust laws, the application of which differs in some respects from the regulatory concepts of the Interstate Commerce Act. In addition, the Department is often required to represent before the Commission and the courts the interests of the United States as the largest shipper in the country. In other crucial cases, the Department apparently finds it embarrassing to defend the Commission's orders against the opposition of the Department of Agriculture, which, under the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938 (7 United States Code 1291), is charged with representing the interest of farmers with respect to "rates, charges, tariffs, and practices relating to the transportation of farm products."

At the same time, however, the Commission, as an independent agency responsible to the Congress, is bound to apply in its decisions the National Transportation Policy, which the Congress has made overriding in the administration of the Interstate Commerce Act. It is the Commission's view that its decisions based upon that policy should not be reviewed by an executive department which is charged by the law with the administration of other and sometimes conflicting policies.

Accordingly, under the proposed amendment, the Commission would be entrusted with the defense of its own orders in the courts. At the same time the Department of Justice would be permitted to intervene in any case involving the review of a Commission order.

AMENDMENT OF TITLE 18, UNITED STATES CODE, RELATING TO REDUCTION OF SENTENCES OF IMPRISONMENT IMPOSED UPON CERTAIN PERSONS

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference, a bill to amend section 3568 of title 18 of the United States Code to give credit to persons who have been unable to afford bail for time served prior to sentencing in criminal cases in which the law imposes a mandatory minimum jail penalty.

Most persons would not believe that there is a law in this country today under which a poor person who is found guilty of certain crimes is required to serve more time than a wealthy person who is arrested at the same time for the same crime and who is found guilty and equally culpable. But that is the case.

Section 3568 of the Federal Criminal Code states that "the sentence of imprisonment of any person convicted of an offense in a court of the United States shall commence to run from the date on which such person is received at the penitentiary, reformatory, or jail for service of said sentence." In effect, this means that the sentence must run from date of imposition of sentence.

In most cases when an indigent defendant, who has been unable to post bail, pleads guilty or is found guilty at trial, the district judge takes account of the time which the defendant has spent in prison prior to trial in the sentence he imposes, and no inequity results.

In other cases, however, under laws of relatively recent origin, the judge is required to impose a jail sentence of mandatory minimum length running from date of sentence. It is in these cases, such as violations of narcotics laws, that district judges are prevented from giving consideration for time served prior to sentence, and defendants without means are penalized by having to serve additional time, frequently amounting to several months, because of inability to raise bail.

It is not an infrequent occurrence when two men are arrested for, say, possession of marihuana, that one posts bail and the other lacks funds to do so. Criminal trials in Federal district courts occur only four times a year at 12-week intervals. When the case comes up for trial, the defendant who is out on bail may ask for and receive a continuance for one reason or another, and the trial is postponed for another 3-month period. When the trial does occur, the indigent defendant may have spent as long as 5 or 6 months in jail, but if he and his co-defendant, who has been free on bail, are found guilty and the judge decides that they are equally culpable and imposes the mandatory minimum of 2 years on both men, the indigent defendant will serve several months more than his co-defendant. Such a case occurred recently in Philadelphia, and the voluntary defender of Philadelphia, who brought this matter to my attention, informs me that similar cases are not uncommon. The understandable bitterness engendered in the minds of those prejudiced by this law undoubtedly adds to their maladjustments.

The Federal judges with whom I have spoken about this matter have recommended that the change in the Criminal Code proposed in this bill be adopted, and the Judicial Conference will consider the matter at its next meeting session.

I am pleased to note that the Subcommittee on Improvements in the Federal Criminal Code in its report—No. 1478—dated April 28, 1958, recommended, on page 33, the enactment of legislation providing credit, when sentence is imposed, for time spent in confinement between commitment and final disposition.

Mr. President, it has been said that the degree of civilization a society has attained can be tested by the treatment it accords to its criminals. If this be true, our society would register a higher score by the passage of this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 1816) to amend section 3568 of title 18, United States Code, to provide for reducing sentences of imprisonment imposed upon persons held in custody for want of bail while awaiting trial by the time so spent in custody, introduced by Mr. CLARK, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PROPOSED SELECT COMMITTEE ON CONSUMERS

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, for myself and on behalf of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ALLOTT], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BEALL], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CASE], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER], my colleague, the junior Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROUTY], and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT], I submit for appropriate reference a resolution to establish a Select Committee on Consumers.

The 17-member bipartisan committee proposed by the resolution would study and investigate economic problems of direct concern to U.S. consumers, determine the effectiveness of existing Federal agencies in dealing with consumer problems and recommend what if any additional legislation might be needed to safeguard, protect, and advance consumer interests generally.

For years, the key symbol in our private enterprise society has been the consumer. One of our most highly regarded economic barometers, the Consumer Price Index, points up the contradictory and often inflationary influences which have largely been unexplained. In July and November of 1958, 2 months when the recession was most acute, the Consumer Price Index, instead of declining, registered a high of 123.9—using 1947–49 price levels as the base year.

Today, as we approach the highest economic activity since the postwar high of 1956, the index registered 123.7 with a slight seasonal decline in food prices offset by increases in other goods and services.

The significance of the U.S. consumer in his capacity to influence the economy was evidenced by the fact that two-thirds of our gross national production in 1958 was accounted for by the goods and services required to meet consumer needs. Consumer needs are of the most vital concern to our national economic health and growth. The continuity of consumer spending during 1957–58 was largely credited with sustaining our level of economic activity and braking the rate of decline during the recession.

However, the underlying reasons which formulated consumers' attitudes toward their personal finances and what triggered their rate of spending are vitally important questions, and it is essential that Congress consciously recognize and give special attention to factors which have a major impact on the buying habits of 176 million people.

The Federal Government through such agencies as the Department of Labor, the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Commerce and the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, which includes the Food and Drug Administration, gives systematic consideration to about 30 million Americans—20 million union members, 3 million farmowners, 2 million wholesale and retail proprietors and over 4 million more private proprietors of businesses and industries—in their capacity as producers. However, there is no systematic representation of consumers' interest in overall economic policy as formulated by the Federal Government.

Although the President's Council of Economic Advisers dealing with national economic policy does meet with consumer groups, no regular advisory board representing consumer interests is regularly consulted by it. Nor is there consumer presence within such agencies as the Interstate Commerce Commission, which rules on fares and railroad services of immediate pocketbook concern to millions of consumers who commute by rail to work, or the Federal Power Commission on power rates which determine the cost of utilities to every American family, or the Civil Aeronautics Board in adjusting passenger rates and granting new airline routes, or the Tariff Commission which makes recommendations on import quotas affecting consumer goods.

The Select Senate Committee on Consumers would be specifically charged with studying the "extent to which authority heretofore conferred by law upon the executive, administrative, and regulatory agencies of the United States provides effective means for the solution of consumers' problems." Two key points to be considered by such a committee include, first the extent to which U.S. agencies through their administrative and quasi-judicial actions take into specific account the interest of the average consumer, and second, ways and means by which the consumers' interest can be specifically considered before Federal agencies of a regulatory nature which render decisions affecting prices, quality, and availability of goods and services.

In a broader sense, the areas for study and investigation of economic problems concerning the consumer by this select committee might well encompass the following:

First. Methods the consumer may employ to minimize the impact of inflation on consumer purchasing power and the value of savings and fixed incomes;

Second. The consumer's problems with consumer credit including installment buying credit;

Third. The effect on consumers of our agricultural program of farm-price supports which influences the cost of food and fibers purchased by consumers;

Fourth. The effectiveness of antitrust regulations to protect consumers against overcharging and restricted selection of goods caused by restraint of trade and monopolistic practices;

Fifth. The impact of sales, excise and other taxes on the consumer's ability to buy and his selection of goods;

Sixth. U.S. trade and traffic policies as they affect the price and availability of imported and domestic goods to the consumer;

Seventh. Research in consumer problems; and Eighth. The influence of branded and nonbranded products on the price and quality and availability of consumer goods.

The consumer, as such, is the average man whose voice is not adequately heard in the Government councils responsible for setting national economic policy which is felt in his pocketbook. The needs and problems of the small businessman were recognized by the establishment of the Senate's Select Committee on Small Business, and a similar approach is inherent in this proposal for a Select Senate Committee on Consumers. In our role as a consumer, each one of us deserves the status and the same attention from Government already given the farmer, business and organized labor.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the resolution be printed at this point in the RECORD and that the resolution may lie at the desk until the close of business today, so that other Senators, who may wish to do so, may have the opportunity to join as cosponsors.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be received and appropriately referred; and without objection, the resolution will lie at the desk, as requested by the Senator from New York.

The resolution (S. Res. 109) was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, as follows:

Resolved, That (a) there is hereby established a select committee of the Senate to be known as the Select Committee on Consumers (referred to hereinafter as the "committee") consisting of seventeen members of the Senate, of whom eleven shall be members of the majority party and six shall be members of the minority party. Members and the chairman thereof shall be selected as soon as may be practicable after the date of adoption of this resolution, and at the beginning of each Congress commencing thereafter, in the same manner as members and chairmen of standing committees of the Senate are selected. Vacancies in the membership of the committee shall not affect the authority of the remaining members to execute the functions of the committee, and shall be filled in the same manner as original appointments thereto are made.

(b) The committee shall adopt rules of procedure not inconsistent with the rules of the Senate governing standing committees of the Senate, and from time to time may establish such subcommittees thereof as it may determine to be required for the performance of its duties. A majority of the members of the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, shall constitute a quorum thereof for the transaction of business, except that such committee or subcommittee may fix a lesser number thereof as a quorum for the purpose of taking sworn testimony.

(c) No legislative measure shall be referred to the committee, and it shall have no authority to report any such measure to the Senate.

SEC. 2. (a) It shall be the duty of the committee to conduct a continuing comprehensive study and investigation with respect to—

(1) the nature and extent of economic problems of consumers within the United States;

(2) the extent to which authority heretofore conferred by law upon executive, administrative, and regulatory agencies of the United States provides effective means for the solution of consumers' problems; and

(3) the nature of any additional legislative or other measures necessary or desirable for the solution of such problems.

(b) The committee shall report to the Senate from time to time the results of its studies and investigations together with its recommendations for any additional legislative or other measures which it may determine to be necessary or desirable for the solution of economic problems of consumers.

SEC. 3. (a) The committee or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to (1) hold such hearings; (2) sit and act at such times and places during the sessions, recesses, and adjournment periods of the Senate; (3) require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such correspondence, books, papers, and documents; (4) administer such oaths; (5) take such testimony either orally or by deposition; and (6) employ and fix the compensation of such technical, clerical, and other assistants and consultants as it deems advisable, except that the compensation so fixed shall not exceed the compensation prescribed under the Classification Act of 1949, as amended, for comparable duties.

(b) With the prior consent of the executive department or agency concerned and the Committee on Rules and Administration, the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, may utilize the services, information, and facilities of any such department or agency, and may employ on a reimbursable basis the services of such personnel of any such department or agency, as it deems advisable. With the consent of any other committee of the Senate, or any subcommittee thereof, the committee may utilize the facilities and the services of the staff of such other committee or subcommittee whenever the chairman of the committee determines that such action is necessary and appropriate.

SEC. 4. Until an appropriation is made for the payment of the expenses of the committee, such expenses, in an amount not to exceed $_____, may be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

REIMBURSEMENT OF STATES FOR CERTAIN FREE AND TOLL ROADS IN NATIONAL SYSTEM OF INTERSTATE AND DEFENSE HIGHWAYS—ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS OF BILL

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, the distinguished Senators from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH and Mr. BYRD] have advised me that they desire to be cosponsors of Senate bill 1714, a bill to provide equitable reimbursement to States for mileage taken into the national system of defense and interstate highways.

I ask unanimous consent that their names may appear on the bill when it is next printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

REBATE OF PORTION OF INCOME TAXES COLLECTED FROM EACH STATE—ADDITIONAL COSPONORS OF BILL

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the names of the distinguished Senator from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH], and the distinguished Senator from Alaska [Mr. GRUENING], may be added as cosponsors of the bill (S. 1776) to authorize an appropriation to each State of an amount equal to 5 percent of the individual income taxes collected in such State during each fiscal year, introduced by me on April 23, 1959.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

WORLD DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION—ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR OF BILL

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the name of my distinguished colleague, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] may be added as a cosponsor of the bill (S. 1743) to promote an increasing flow of private capital from the United States into economically sound enterprises in other areas of the world, to enlist an ever-increasing number of individual private investors in this undertaking, to promote world peace through the expansion of mutual economic interests, to reduce gradually the need for U.S. foreign public investments and grants, to establish a World Development Corporation, and for other related purposes, introduced by me (for myself, Mr. COOPER, and Mr. MURRAY), on April 20, 1959.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADDRESSES, EDITORIALS, ARTICLES, ETC., PRINTED IN THE RECORD

On request, and by unanimous consent, addresses, editorials, articles, etc., were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. MORSE:

Article entitled "The Big Dilemma: Conscience or Votes," written by William Benton, and published in the New York Times magazine section of April 26, 1959.

NOTICE OF HEARING ON CERTAIN NOMINATIONS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, on behalf of the Committee on the Judiciary, I desire to give notice that a public hearing has been scheduled for 2 p.m., Monday, May 4, 1959, in room 2228, New Senate Office Building, upon the following nominations:

Bailey Aldrich, of Massachusetts, to be U.S. circuit judge, for the first circuit, vice Calvert Magruder, retired.

Anthony Julian, of Massachusetts, to be U.S. district judge, for the district of Massachusetts, vice Bailey Aldrich, elevated.

At the indicated time and place all persons interested in the above nominations may make such representations as may be pertinent. The subcommittee consists of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HRUSKA], and myself, as chairman.

CAN SECRETARY BENSON'S SOLUTION OF THE FARM PROBLEM BRING ANYTHING BUT DISASTER TO THE FARMERS?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, on February 17, when Secretary of Agriculture Benson appeared before our Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, I challenged him, in a series of detailed questions, to show that his solution of the farm problem, namely, to knock out controls and to shove down price supports, could bring anything but disaster to our farmers.

Mr. President, I challenge anyone who feels that the present policies of Secretary Benson are right to read the colloquy between the Secretary and myself, and then attempt to show how the policies he advocates can lead to anything but further depression for the American farmer and higher taxes for the American taxpayer.

I call the attention of the Senate to my challenge to the Secretary to produce studies and statistics to support his position.

First, I asked for studies to support his contention that the farmer's problem can be solved by driving down prices far enough to bring supply and demand in balance.

Second, I asked the Secretary to report the probable price level and production figures for the next 3 years for corn, other feed grains, wheat, cotton, peanuts, and manufacturing milk under the proposals he has made.

Mr. President, with these facts—if we can get them—the Senate can take a clear-eyed look at the farm proposals of the President and his Secretary; and that will go a long way toward avoiding the serious blunders that have cost the farmer and the taxpayer so dearly in the past.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the colloquy between Secretary Benson and myself, which took place when he appeared before our Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, be printed in the RECORD, following these remarks.

There being no objection, the excerpts from the hearings was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senator PROXMIRE. I want to discuss, Mr. Secretary, the heart of your message yesterday. I think you put it very well when you said: "To me, the answer to the farm surplus problem"—this was quoted in the New York Times today as the quotation of the day—"suggests itself in letters of fire a mile high: 'Eliminate as rapidly as practicable ineffective controls and use price supports at levels that will preserve and build markets.'"

Of course I do not argue or try to discredit that. I simply want to bring out the fact. My positon is quite contrary to that. I want to see where I am wrong, where you are right, and make as much progress on that as I can in that spirit.

It seems to me that the purpose of your proposal is first to limit or reduce the surplus and do this by discouraging production. No. 2, to increase consumption, and No. 3, to save this terrific burden the taxpayer now has to pay.

Is that correct?

Secretary BENSON. Senator PROXMIRE, that is essentially correct. I certainly feel that any program which has the effect of destroying markets and building up surpluses and which imposes ineffective controls on farmers at great cost to the taxpayers is a bad program.

Senator PROXMIRE. I would certainly agree with you on that.

Secretary BENSON. That is what we have had on certain of our so-called basic crops.

Again I say that four-fifths of our agriculture is free today of controls, and that part is getting along pretty well. It is the part that the Government has been the most solicitous, apparently, where we are in some difficulty.

Senator PROXMIRE. Let us take the area that is free from controls, the No. 1 cash crop in America, dairy products, an area in which you have had price supports, however.

Secretary BENSON. Yes, we have.

Senator PROXMIRE. Here is the consequence of fluctuations in price. First on production. Since that time, 1947 to 1952, the year before you took office, the price of manufacturing milk and the price of all milk rose some 7 percent, roughly. The price went up. Yet production dropped 2 billion pounds or about a little less than 2 percent.

Since you took office, however, beginning in 1953, the price has dropped about 10 percent. These figures are taken from your Department.

I would like to ask you if these figures are roughly accurate and in the second place how you explain what appears to be a contradiction of your fundamental position on production?

Secretary BENSON. First of all, Senator PROXMIRE, there has been a tremendous change, as you know, in the dairy industry. The tendency has been for the herds to get a little larger, for the farmers to introduce efficiencies which they haven't had before. The period before I took office was a period when we were in the Korean war which you will agree was an abnormal situation.

Senator PROXMIRE. What you are saying is that other factors were far more important than price in determining production of milk.

Secretary BENSON. Certainly there were other factors.

Senator PROXMIRE. It seems on the basis of these statistics that price was so minimal that it was far outweighed by other factors, technological factors, weather factors.

Secretary BENSON. I would have to appraise that very carefully to determine even in my own mind to what extent price was a factor and to what extent other factors entered into it.

Senator PROXMIRE. You can see why the dairy farmers are apprehensive. The farmer has been told that the way to solve production problems is to lower prices. It has not helped solve the production end of it at all. The production has increased at a much more rapid pace than before.

Let me get into this second area, markets. You have pleaded repeatedly and you have said that the way to open up markets is to get a competitive price. We have lowered the price the farmer receives for dairy products. We have done our very best to promote dairy products through the American Dairy Association. We have spent a lot of money through ADA at the cost of the Wisconsin farmer. We have found that the only index of the success or failure of such a program is the per capita retail sales, which have been going down since 1953. In 1953 and 1954 it was about the same, 678 pounds per capita; in 1953, 679; and again in 1954. Then it began to drop. So it seems that while this was a most modest drop it did not start until 2 or 3 years after the sharp price drop. Nevertheless, it is a drop that has coincided precisely one for one with the fall in the price that the farmer is receiving for his milk. So lower prices are giving the farmer no help on the production side. They are not cutting supply. And they are no help on the demand side. They are not expanding his market. So lower prices are a road to disaster for Wisconsin dairy farmers. Yet this is all you offer. Isn't that correct?

Secretary BENSON. The big item in the reduction in consumption was probably in the case of butter. That has been trending downward in competition with other spreads, as you know.

Senator PROXMIRE. How far down does butter have to go?

Secretary BENSON. It lost a good part of its market when prices were fixed at 90 percent parity. We just priced butter completely out of the market. So consumers turned to other spreads, and when they did and found them very satisfactory it was hard to get them to come back.

That is the biggest single problem we have had in the dairy industry in recent years. But it is an illustration of how you can price the commodity out of the market and destroy a market.

I think the greatest single need is the promotion of these high-quality dairy products that the farmers have produced. I do not think we have saturated the market. Our technicians say if our people had a minimum amount of calcium in their diet they would have to consume 9 percent more milk in this country.

I know the dairy association is doing good work, but I think we have only scratched the surface of our possibility.

As a matter of fact, I have been accused of being somewhat of a crank on this, and that is this question of making milk easily available to our people. I am not going to be satisfied until you have a milk dispenser alongside of every soft-drink dispenser in this country. If we had that today we would have a shortage of milk, of dairy products. We are confident of that.

We have found that wherever they are put in, the consumption of milk goes up. I think it is largely a question of promoting these products, making them easily available, and price will pretty well take care of itself, and the Government will not be in the dairy industry.

Senator PROXMIRE. I would like to ask you if you could provide the committee with statistics, if possible, showing the degree to which the drop in the sale of butter has contributed to this per capita consumption drop. It seems to me, from what I have heard, that this is not a complete explanation for the failure of dairy products, at lower prices to farmers, to reach out to get further markets.

I would also like to ask this: In Wisconsin we have promoted milk in all kinds of ways by placing dispensers around. Isn't it true that generally you have to have a margin for the processors so that there is enough incentive to sell milk in competition with soft drinks? You can produce Coco-Cola or Pepsi-Cola or other soft drinks at a very small cost. The cost of milk, we feel, is very low to the farmer, but it does not compare to the low cost of pop and Coca-Cola and so forth to the producer. So isn't this really a pie in the sky notion? We have already widened this processor margin enormously, widened it in the sense that the price to farmers is going down and the price to the housewife is going up. We are nowhere near getting to the position where the retail seller of milk can buy the commodity at a low enough price so that he has the incentive to provide the enormous advertising, the enormous promotional activity that goes with the sale of soft drinks.

Secretary BENSON. I have two points. In the first place, of course, I think no one would question but what the nutritional value of milk is far and away beyond——

Senator PROXMIRE. Least of all the junior Senator from Wisconsin.

Secretary BENSON. Beyond the value of any of the soft drinks.

Second, I would agree with you, I think, that the spread between the farm price and the retail price is too wide. I think there are inefficiencies in the handling of milk. Of course we are studying it all the time in the Department. Of course the big item is labor costs. But there are certain inefficiencies in the distribution of milk that I would hope could be reduced at least substantially which would tend to narrow that margin between retail and farm prices for dairy products.

Senator PROXMIRE. As far as production and as far as consumption is concerned, you can see why there is an element of discouragement for the dairy farmer.

Let us go to the other element. Since you have been in office, the cash to the taxpayer for supporting the dairy program has quintupled. It is five times as great as before you came in. The program of dropping price support for milk has not only failed to sell more milk, it has not only failed to discourage the production of more milk, but has been enormously expensive to the taxpayer. The handling of surpluses in various ways has increased very, very rapidly, from $57 million to over $275 million on the average. That is in comparing the 5 pre-Benson years with the 5 Benson years.

Secretary BENSON. There has been quite a liquidation, quite a culling program in the dairies, as you know, which has been encouraged by the high price of beef. That has caused a reduction in their dairy population. I think we ought to keep that in mind.

Senator PROXMIRE. May I interrupt to say that that is an explanation perhaps for the reason that the production of milk in this last 6 months has been somewhat lower. In other words, it is because of the favorable price for beef, not because of anything that has happened to the price of milk in the dairy industry to discourage production. In other words, farmers are selling their cows for beef.

Secretary BENSON. They are culling them because of the good price for beef. I think the record will show that in 1957 the dairy income was at an alltime high in this country and dairy farmers had declined somewhat. So the income per capita to dairy farmers in 1957 was at an alltime high.

In 1958 it would probably prove to be the second highest in history and the per capita income the highest.

I agree with you that it is not high enough. As one who milked cows for many years and would like to see the price higher.

Senator PROXMIRE. Since the income of Wisconsin dairy farmers averages around 52 cents per hour, it is a pretty hopeless outlook. These are businessmen who have investments of $40,000 to $50,000 apiece. They work, as your Department pointed out, 12 hours a day on the average. This is longer than farmers in any other State in America. What are they getting? Fifty-two cents an hour for this initiative, this hard work. It is a pretty hopeless outlook for them. You say it is the highest for any period on record, but after all we have had inflation; we have much higher income for wage earners, doctors, lawyers, merchants, manufacturers, everybody. The farmer, while he might have had a small increase in 1957, on a per capita basis, with all the effort and work he has put in it does not mean much because so much of their increase is an average increase that has resulted from elimination of some of the so-called marginal farmers rather than of actual benefit to the typical farm family.

Secretary BENSON. I realize farm costs have gone up. They went up 100 percent from 1939 to 1952, and they have gone up 4 percent since then. They have been in a cost-price squeeze which is very real.

Senator PROXMIRE. Let me try to relate this to the total problem. Is it not true that farm prices, farm income according to the parity index—the old one at 79 percent—is the lowest since 1940? So farmers are getting relatively far less and yet they are producing much more than ever before and we are loaded with the biggest surplus in history, as Senator SYMINGTON has so well brought out. In other words, on the overall basis this attempt of solving a problem by lower prices and fewer, ineffective controls just is not working now.

Secretary BENSON. You are comparing a war period with a peace period. No one would propose another war to settle this thing.

Senator PROXMIRE. Of course not.

Secretary BENSON. You would not want that; neither would I.

Senator PROXMIRE. All I am thinking, Mr. Secretary, is that we tried this program, pretty much tried the kind of thing that you are advocating. It is true that we have some control on some commodities. As you pointed out, it is only about 20 percent of our production. It has not really limited the overall production because the farmer simply shifts from corn or wheat or cotton to some other kind of production. We have had the dropping of farm price supports and we are not solving the problem.

If we tried these controls for so many years and they are not effective why don't we recognize that price supports without controls won't work?

Secretary BENSON. But it has been a great inconvenience to farmers and has not permitted them to balance their farm operations and work out their rotations the way they would like to had they not had the controls.

Senator PROXMIRE. I think that is right. My position is that you should not have controls unless the farmers want them, are given an opportunity to vote for them and do in fact vote for them. Our farmers are convinced, and they have said this through their organizations, that they want a self-help program. I think they will vote for this kind of self-regulation.

You said yourself that in principle you would support that kind of program. It would get Government out of the dairy business to a very great extent. It would therefore help the taxpayers and it would certainly help the farmer by limiting the production to what they could sell at a fair price.

Secretary BENSON. Senator PROXMIRE, we have not seen such a bill that we think is feasible and workable. I would be perfectly willing to support a program of self-regulation in the dairy industry if we could get a program that I thought was feasible. You would not ask me to report favorably on a bill that I did not think was workable and that would do more harm than good. That is the kind of bill that we have studied.

Senator PROXMIRE. But the bill I introduced last time was overwhelmingly supported by the principal dairy associations. They worked on it very carefully and at great length. It gave them an opportunity to vote. It would only result in a loan of some $200 million or $300 million. This enormous cost that has averaged $200 million to $400 million a year would be eliminated. Why isn't that in the national interest and in the interest of the dairy farmers?

Secretary BENSON. I think it did call for some $300 million of Federal funds.

Senator PROXMIRE. A loan.

Secretary BENSON. A loan, with no provision for repayment I think and it would have resulted as we studied it in the regulation of the dairy industry and eventual control. I do not believe the dairy farmers want controls.

Senator PROXMIRE. We were giving them an opportunity to say so. The bill provided a loan with the strongest kind of security.

Secretary BENSON. There are several objections to the bill. You may have a revised version. I do not know. Our technicians studied it objectively and recommended against it, thought it was not a desirable thing. Our advisory committee, which is bipartisan in character, made up of non-Republicans and non-Democrats, had it before them and studied it carefully and voted against it. As a matter of fact, in meetings with the proponents they agreed on the need for several changes which were never introduced.

Senator PROXMIRE. I am sure the advisory committee appointed by the President of the United States under your recommendation would support your position on this.

Secretary BENSON. Not always, Senator. They look at it objectively and do, I think, an honest, objective job.

Senator PROXMIRE. Let me get into another area.

I think I can cover these rather quickly. I want to ask you whether there are any Department studies of farm price elasticity that would support the implication that lower prices to farmers can yield higher farm income from increased production. I think this goes to the very heart of the farm program.

Professor Cochran of the University of Minnesota has argued that for every 1 percent increase in production there is from 10 to 12½ percent drop in price. Under these circumstances, of course, it is just hopeless for the farmer in our great technological explosion that we have in agriculture to look forward to anything but an impossible situation of economic disaster after disaster unless he is able to limit his production to what he can sell at a fair price.

Secretary BENSON. Senator PROXMIRE, I would have to challenge that as an economist myself, not an expert by any means. I would have to challenge the results of that study. I would like to look at the whole study. We have had a number of studies made in this field by many reputable economists. I would doubt very much the accuracy of those figures, although I would like to see the study, frankly.

Senator PROXMIRE. Could I ask you to provide us with the study that you have?

Secretary BENSON. Yes; we will be glad to.

Senator PROXMIRE. I think this is so important. Do you have any studies?

Secretary BENSON. A number of the land grant colleges have made them for various farm commodities.

Senator PROXMIRE. Do you have any studies to show that the farmers can solve the problems if you permit them to produce more? Does not every study show that as production increases you are going to get a drop in gross income because your price decreases so much more?

Secretary BENSON. Senator PROXMIRE, in the first place, I do not think you can prevent them if you tried because your controls will be ineffective. They will produce more. Second, farmers do not spend price, they spend income, and that is price times volume. It is just as important to a farmer to have something to sell as it is to have a price.

Senator PROXMIRE. It is just as important to have a price as to have something to sell.

Secretary BENSON. You must have both.

Senator PROXMIRE. Exactly.

Secretary BENSON. But we have a tendency to put all of our emphasis in years past on price, price, price, until we price some of our commodities out of the market. We cut our farmers out of the market. They have had less to sell and a lower income.

Senator PROXMIRE. Mr. Secretary, we live in a bargaining power economy. We live in an economy of strong labor unions that push up their price over and over again. We live in an economy where we have a minimum wage. We have a tariff. Industry fixes their price and they limit their production. The farmer is in that kind of an economy. If you tell him that he should operate in a free economy, he is just about the only person who does.

You have read and are familiar with that excellent study by Dr. Chamberlain of Harvard which shows that the farmer alone has a homogeneous commodity. He has no control over his price. Everybody else has some measure of control. Under those circumstances it seems to me you should recognize that you have to give the farmer at least an opportunity to vote for controls.

Secretary BENSON. He voted in the case of corn, and, of course, voted out controls.

Senator PROXMIRE. The proposition was put to him so he had no real choice.

Secretary BENSON. I think he had a pretty good choice.

Senator PROXMIRE. On tobacco he voted 12 to 1 to keep them.

Secretary BENSON. What was his choice, 50 percent or nothing?

Senator PROXMIRE. Of course, it depends——

Secretary BENSON. Ninety percent or nothing.

Senator PROXMIRE. Of course, it depends on how the question is put. No question about that.

Secretary BENSON. I think we ought to keep in mind, Senator PROXMIRE, that four-fifths of all of our agriculture today is free. There are no attempts at controls and they are doing better than those for which we have tried to control and fix prices. Our problem is really where the Government has tinkered mostly with commodities. Excuse me for using that term.

Senator PROXMIRE. I do not want to get political, but the election returns certainly contradict that. The farmers of America are not satisfied with that. I ran against Governor Kohler in 1952. The issue was Republican against Democrat. He got 70 percent of the farm vote. I ran against him in 1957. The issues with the Wisconsin farmer were overwhelmingly Benson policies. I got 70 percent of the vote. That is the most fantastic switch by an important economic group I've ever heard of. The farmers are not satisfied.

Secretary BENSON. May I comment on that?

Senator PROXMIRE. Yes.

Secretary BENSON. First of all, I understand you are a very effective campaigner.

Senator PROXMIRE. You came out to Wisconsin and campaigned.

Secretary BENSON. I was not effective enough.

The CHAIRMAN. That was not peculiar to Wisconsin.

Secretary BENSON. It would be pretty hard to prove very much agriculturally out of the election. I think the sentiment was more accurately reflected in that referendum vote on corn than it was on the election.

Senator YOUNG of North Dakota. Will the Senator yield?

Senator PROXMIRE. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Senator YOUNG of North Dakota. They voted the same way; 88 percent of the corn farmers actually got a higher price. All of the farmers in the noncommercial areas get a higher price support. In my State there was one commercial corn county that didn't abide by the quotas. Throughout the Nation the corn farmers will actually get a higher price than they had before.

Secretary BENSON. Senator YOUNG, they had voted for years that they didn't want controls.

Senator YOUNG of North Dakota. Actually they got a higher price support. If you gave the wheat farmers that choice they would vote that way.

Secretary BENSON. They voted the same in 1956 when they didn't have that choice.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator PROXMIRE.

Senator PROXMIRE. I would like to call attention to the Associated Press report about President Eisenhower's speech in Peoria, Ill., in 1956.

"President Eisenhower called Tuesday for a 'full share' for the farmer in prosperity.

"'In a free agriculture,' Mr. Eisenhower declared, 'farmers attain that kind of parity in the marketplace.'"

Did the President's assurance of full income parity have any basis in fact? Were there any studies by your technicians to indicate that farmers could in the foreseeable future get income parity in the marketplace?

Secretary BENSON. I do not recall that there were any special studies.

Senator PROXMIRE. Any studies of that kind?

Secretary BENSON. Of course, there are a number of commodities that have been at full parity on the free market. Cattle prices are there now at about full parity, I think.

Senator PROXMIRE. Certainly. Grapefruit, tomatoes, too. We are talking about the American farmer as a whole who has a lower parity now than at any time in 17 years.

Secretary BENSON. There is more income from cattle and calves than any other commodity.

Senator PROXMIRE. There is nothing in the record since 1952, nothing in this whole experience, that indicates that the American farmer is going to get 85 or 90 or 100 percent of parity in the marketplace. And no study by your Department backs up that assurance. In the absence of that I ask you, and I ask you in good humor, but I ask you, if this is not a demagogic statement, if there is nothing to back it up?

The farmer is not going to get full income parity in the marketplace in the foreseeable future; isn't that correct?

Secretary BENSON. I think that is the only place he is ever going to get it unless you are going to go Socialist and get very rigid controls and force the farmer to cut down. I think the only place he can get it is the marketplace. We have never been able to provide it for him except during wartime. We tried it just before World War II. The parity ratio at that time was down to 77. Prices were down to 77 percent of parity. We had a war, and prices went up.

The war ended, and prices came down again. We were accumulating again and then we had the Korean war. Prices went up again and after the war we had the same adjustment downward.

Parity really, Senator PROXMIRE, is a pretty weak measuring rod. I would like to see the farmer get just as much as he can.

Senator PROXMIRE. It does not nearly measure the deficiency on the farm and off the farm per capita income of farm people of about $1,000, compared to $2,000 for people not working in farming. That is grossly unfair. Certainly it is a weak measuring stick.

Let me go on to ask what are the probable price levels and production figures for the next 3 years for corn, for other feed grains, for wheat, cotton, peanuts, and manufacturing milk under the proposals that you made? I will not expect you to give those to me now, but I think it is extremely important for the committee to have that information and that the Congress have that information before we act on legislation this year.

Secretary BENSON. We can furnish it for the record, Senator PROXMIRE.

Senator PROXMIRE. It seems to me that kind of assurance from technicians in your Department has not been given before. Is it not true that it is possible that the absence of that kind of thoughtful analysis and study of the impact of the proposals you make is one of the reasons for the failure of our farm program in the past?

In other words, the Congress has not really been informed exactly what would be the consequences of what they are voting for.

Secretary BENSON. If there is any information that we have the committee would find useful we will certainly make it available.

(The document referred to is as follows:)

"STATEMENT FILED BY SECRETARY BENSON

"I should like to point out that the Department now has underway a study in answer to a similar request received by mail from Senator PROXMIRE, and it will take some time to complete that. We shall be glad to make the results available to the committee as soon as they are available. In this connection, I should like to point out that the Department has prepared a series of studies for the Congress since 1955 on such commodities as milk, rice, tobacco, cotton, and feed grains, so that a very substantial volume of materials bearing on the effects of alternative programs have already been provided."

Senator PROXMIRE. I am almost through.

The CHAIRMAN. Take your time.

Senator PROXMIRE. Did not the President precisely promise a guarantee of price supports of 90 percent in 1952?

Secretary BENSON. I do not think he promised a guarantee. I would have to check the records to see.

Senator PROXMIRE. Let me remind you of something. He said in Minnesota, "Here and now, without any ifs and buts, I say to you I stand behind, and the Republican Party stands behind, the price support laws on the books. This includes the amendment to the basic farm act passed by both parties in Congress to continue through 1954 the price support of basic commodities."

Secretary BENSON. That was carried out. It was continued through 1954. There were no changes.

Senator PROXMIRE. You are telling this committee that Congress did not act rapidly enough to change that law, to reduce it?

Secretary BENSON. We recommended in 1954 that the act be changed when the 2-year period expired. That was when the first change came. It was not as much as we recommended but there was some change in the fall of 1955.

Senator PROXMIRE. Then you wanted to drop price supports in 1955, and it was the failure of Congress to drop the price supports to 75 percent, as you requested, that caused the trouble. In fact, it dropped supports to only 82 or 83 percent. Was that one of the problems that resulted in overproduction?

Secretary BENSON. Yes.

Senator PROXMIRE. Then how do you justify the 1956 increases that the President of the United States put into effect?

Secretary BENSON. I have answered that already. It is in the record.

Senator PROXMIRE. The answer was they were administrative problems.

Secretary BENSON. No. The answer was that the President had recommended legislation which he and the rest of us in the Department thought was sound and good for farmers but that the legislation was not acted upon. An omnibus bill was passed which we felt was a piece of bad legislation. The President vetoed it and it was near the end of the session of Congress.

The President thought something should be done to give some help to the farmers on a temporary basis so administratively there were some changes made.

Senator PROXMIRE. That does not make any sense at all. If your position is that high artificial prices are bad for the farmer and bad for farming, in spite of all the explanation about how you did not get exactly the bill you wanted, why did the President increase above the discretionary low that he had? Why did he push prices up just before the election?

Secretary BENSON. He tried to provide some constructive changes in the program and was unsuccessful.

Senator PROXMIRE. In the absence of that, why did he push prices up if it was wrong? If it was wrong in 1955? If it was wrong in 1955 and in 1957, why was it right just before the election?

Secretary BENSON. We were unsuccessful in getting constructive legislation from the Congress.

Senator PROXMIRE. There were changes in wheat from $1.81 to $2; corn, from $1.40 to $1.50. Corn not produced in compliance with allotments, from 0 to $1.25. Rice, $4.04 to $4.50. Milk for manufacturing, $3.15 to $3.25. Butterfat, from $0.562 to $0.586. Maybe these are small but we would certainly love to get them now.

In U.S. News & World Report on page 48 you say this: "Our technicians made a study." This refers to Senator TALMADGE'S proposal. You said it would cost $10.5 billion a year to finance it. You also made a statement about an omnibus bill that I had last year that I brought before the people of Wisconsin. I got estimates from the Library of Congress, estimates from the former Secretary of Agriculture, Clinton Anderson, showing that my bill would cost less than the present program, yet you came into my State and said it would cost several billion dollars more than the present farm program.

I ask you, if you can give us the exact statement as to the cost of Senator TALMADGE'S program, why can't you give us the same kind of estimates on your own program?

Secretary BENSON. We can.

Senator PROXMIRE. Will you do that?

Secretary BENSON. If these recommendations were carried out what the cost would be?

Senator PROXMIRE. As I understand it, the committee has asked you and you have agreed to provide an omnibus farm bill in this session.

Secretary BENSON. We have agreed to do some drafting that would incorporate the alternatives in legal language.

Senator PROXMIRE. All the recommendations that you want?

Secretary BENSON. Which we have set forth here.

Senator PROXMIRE. I am asking if you will give us the cost of this program and how it will affect the budget.

Secretary BENSON. We will give you the best estimate we can.

Senator PROXMIRE. Will you make available to the committee your analysis of the Talmadge bill?

Secretary BENSON. Yes, indeed.

Senator PROXMIRE. Or make available to me your analysis of my bill?

Secretary BENSON. Yes, of course.

We will make it available to the membership of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Is your bill before the committee, Senator PROXMIRE?

Senator PROXMIRE. My bill was before the committee and the Secretary of Agriculture has already analyzed it. He has already made a statement which was used by my opponents very effectively in Wisconsin as to its cost. I am simply asking him to give the basis for that statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you say "effectively"?

Senator PROXMIRE. Too effectively.

Secretary BENSON. We have the request from the chairman of the committee to make an analysis of Senator TALMADGE'S bill and that is in process, Mr. Chairman.

Senator PROXMIRE. I would simply like to conclude.

Mr. SORKIN. In the U.S. News & World Report we did not say the Talmadge bill would cost $10 billion. We said the analysis we made of a deficiency payment program at 90 percent of parity would run in excess of $10 billion. I am not sure that you would think of the Talmadge bill as excellent once you had completely analyzed it, sir.

Senator PROXMIRE. I have other ideas myself.

Mr. SORKIN. Apparently there is a difference of opinion between you and Senator TALMADGE. From what you have been saying the Talmadge proposal provides for no controls and your proposal last year was for very rigid controls.

Senator PROXMIRE. We both are trying to achieve the same thing. He proposes a compensatory payment system that gives farmers something like parity. It does it in a way that I think is less desirable than the proposal I have. But I think the principle of his proposal is better than the one we have now.

Mr. SORKIN. I think it would wreck the farm economy of the State of Wisconsin, if we analyzed it. You get your money in Wisconsin, 90 percent of it, from sales of livestock and livestock products.

Senator PROXMIRE. From dairy products and livestock.

Mr. SORKIN. Yes, sir. There would be very little in payment to Wisconsin since only 3 percent of the income comes from the basics.

Senator PROXMIRE. I see what you mean.

Mr. SORKIN. I think if you analyzed that bill you would not be very happy about it. It would cut livestock prices sharply.

Senator PROXMIRE. No; not its present form.

Mr. SORKIN. Yes, sir.

Senator PROXMIRE. I would like to ask the Secretary if he would furnish production figures and farm price estimates under your bill. How much production and what level of farm prices would you anticipate from the proposals you would make?

Secretary BENSON. We could make estimates.

Senator PROXMIRE. That would be useful in the line of questioning that Senator SYMINGTON is pursuing.

I would like to say that I am delighted by this study by Foote & Weingarten. This seems to be exactly the kind of thing that would be enormously helpful to Congress. I think this kind of study applied to your proposal and Senator TALMADGE'S proposal would be very helpful to us in coming to the most intelligent possible conclusion as to cost, et cetera.

Secretary BENSON. Thank you.

Senator PROXMIRE. I want to thank the Secretary for being so courteous and helpful in his response. I regret that we do disagree so completely, but that is one of the prices that you have to pay for being Secretary of Agriculture and being a Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

JOHN FOSTER DULLES

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, in the New York Herald Tribune of April 27, 1959, there appears a news story by Robert J. Donovan, entitled, "Dulles Vows to Herter: He'll Keep Hands Off." And in the Christian Science Monitor of April 25, 1959, there appears an editorial entitled, "Dulles: No 'Interlopers'."

Both of these press items point up, once again, the caliber of the former Secretary of State, who has invariably placed the interests of the Nation, as he sees those interests, in the forefront. He has made it clear that, so far as he is concerned, there is only one Secretary of State, one source of authority under the President in the conduct of foreign relations—Mr. Christian Herter.

To be sure, Mr. Dulles will be available for consultation and advice. The responsibility for decision, however, must rest with the constituted authorities, under our system of Government. Mr. Dulles has made clear that he will be no interloper in the development of U.S. policies for dealing with the life-and-death problems of our foreign relations. I renew my expressions of admiration and respect for the former Secretary of State for his proper, appropriate, and patriotic response to a delicate situation. It is an example which might well be followed by others inside or outside the Government. The line of authority and responsibility for foreign policy under our system is from the President to the Secretary of State. It must be kept that way.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have included at this point in the RECORD the two articles to which reference was previously made.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Herald Tribune, Apr. 27, 1959]

DULLES VOW TO HERTER: HE'LL KEEP HANDS OFF—ADVICE GIVEN IN PERSON IS: BROOK NO MEDDLERS, STAND ON OWN FEET

(By Robert J. Donovan)

WASHINGTON, April 26.—When Christian A. Herter flies to Paris tomorrow on his first big assignment in his new job, he will be taking with him ringing advice from John Foster Dulles to stand on his own feet as Secretary of State, to tolerate no "interlopers" between President Eisenhower and himself, and to feel no obligation whatever to consult Mr. Dulles.

As Mr. Herter heads for the Western Foreign Ministers' meeting, which opens in Paris on Wednesday, he also will be carrying a verbal pledge by Mr. Dulles that the retired Secretary of State will not, in his new role as special consultant to the President, try to force his own views on Mr. Eisenhower, Secretary Herter or anyone else in the Government.

Former Secretary Dulles' advice and his promise were given Mr. Herter at an unusual gathering in Mr. Dulles' suite in the Walter Reed Army Medical Center here Thursday. The occasion was the swearing in of Mr. Dulles as the President's special consultant and the full story of what occurred is told here for the first time.

The highest officials of the Government had come to see Mr. Dulles take the oath. The President was there. So was Vice President Nixon, Secretary Herter, C. Douglas Dillon, Under Secretary of State for Economic Affairs, and the retired Secretary's brother, Allen W. Dulles, Director of the Central Intelligence Agency. Mrs. John Foster Dulles was on hand, and there was a scattering of others from the White House, the State Department, and the hospital staff.

Mr. Dulles, who is suffering from cancer, was dressed in a navy-blue suit and stood straight as a ramrod as Frank K. Sanderson, chief administrative officer of the White House, administered the oath while the President stood at Mr. Dulles' left hand.

After the brief ceremony Mr. Eisenhower remained for only a short time and then left to address the National Association of Manufacturers. After he had gone, Mr. Dulles asked some of the other high officials to remain awhile, and together they sat in a circle under a portrait of Sir Winston Churchill, painted by the President.

WHAT DULLES SAID

Mr. Dulles turned to Secretary Herter, and as his words have been recalled by one who heard them, said:

"As you know, Chris, I have always considered that the Secretary of State, next to the President, has the primary responsibility for the making of foreign policy. I have always opposed any attempts from any quarter—whether from the legislative branch of the Government or from the executive branch—to infringe upon the prerogatives and responsibilities of the Secretary of State in the foreign policy field.

"Where foreign policy is concerned, I have always felt that there could not and should not be any interlopers between the Secretary of State and the President."

FREE HAND FOR HERTER

Mr. Dulles paused a moment and then added with a smile:

"And I want to emphasize to you, now that I have taken this new position as a foreign policy consultant to the President, that I never want to do anything which might put me in the position of being an interloper between you and the President."

The former Secretary went on to stress that under no circumstances need Mr. Herter or any one else in the State Department feel obliged to consult him on the unfolding events in Paris and Geneva or indeed on any other phase of foreign policy.

WILL ADVISE WHEN ASKED

He would be happy, Mr. Dulles said, to give advice when advice was asked, but he would never, he said, put himself in a position of forcing advice on the President, the Secretary of State or any one else in the Government.

The man who was Secretary of State from January 21, 1953 until 11 days ago when illness forced him to resign made it very plain to all present that he felt that Mr. Herter must quickly establish an individual and distinctive identity as Secretary of State. Unless this is done Mr. Herter's hand will be weakened in the critical negotiations impending in Europe. Furthermore, as Mr. Dulles believes, leadership in the area of foreign policy might well pass from the State Department to powerful Democrats in the Senate unless Mr. Herter can establish for all to see that he is in fact as well as in name the Secretary of State and that there is no appeal over his head to Walter Reed Hospital.

FAMILIAR WITH PROBLEM

Mr. Dulles is well versed in the difficulties that Secretaries of State have encountered in permitting "interlopers," to use his word, to come between them and the President. His own uncle, Robert Lansing, who was Secretary of State to President Woodrow Wilson, was sidetracked by Col. Edward M. House. Later, in the administration of President Franklin D. Roosevelt, Under Secretary of State Sumner Welles was often closer to the President in the conduct of foreign relations than was Secretary of State Cordell Hull.

Throughout his years in the State Department Mr. Dulles and the men close to him fought moves that might bring anyone outside the Department into the picture as an adviser to the President on foreign policy. Thus Mr. Dulles opposed a suggestion that Gen. Walter Bedell Smith be placed on the White House staff in this capacity.

HAD OPPOSED ADVISERS

He was also unhappy about many of the activities of C. D. Jackson, Governor Rockefeller, and William H. Jackson who, in the early years of the administration, followed each other onto the White House staff as advisers to the President on psychological strategy. Many of their proposals cut across what Mr. Dulles deemed his own field. Thus, he opposed, at one point, the open-skies plan which Mr. Rockefeller persuaded the President to propound at the 1955 summit conference in Geneva.

The purpose of the meeting which Mr. Herter will attend in Paris will be to agree upon a common Western position for the East-West Foreign Ministers' conference to be held in Geneva starting May 11.

NO CONGRESSIONAL ADVISERS

The Secretary is departing in full agreement with Senator J. WILLIAM FULBRIGHT, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, that no congressional leaders should accompany him to the Geneva Conference.

Secretary Herter's position on this is that there should be congressional representation only in the unlikely event that some agreement should be reached with the Russians and that even then members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee should be present only for the formal signing—not throughout the conference itself. This attitude apparently applies also to congressional representation at a possible summit conference later in the summer.

[From the Christian Science Monitor, April 25, 1959]

DULLES: No "INTERLOPERS"

One of the more reassuring aspects of the Dulles-to-Herter changeover at the State Department has been the performance of Mr. Dulles at the meeting confirming him as foreign policy adviser to President Eisenhower. Mr. Dulles is reported to have warned his successor, Secretary of State Herter, against "interlopers" between him and the President—and then to have added that he, Mr. Dulles, would take care himself not to be an interloper.

Mr. Herter may have needed no such assurance from his predecessor. But many Americans will welcome it because (1) of the manner in which the transfer of the secretaryship took place and (2) the confusion which resulted in earlier administrations when influence was divided between the Secretary of State and a presidential adviser.

Mr. Dulles' remarks recalled the experience of his uncle, Secretary Robert Lansing, with President Wilson and the presidential alter ego, Col. Edward M. House. Many Americans will remember the unfortunate situation which developed when President Franklin D. Roosevelt and Undersecretary of State Sumner Welles appeared to be bypassing Secretary Hull.

How easy or difficult it will be for Mr. Dulles to avoid "interloping" must depend not only on himself but on the President. The temptation for Mr. Eisenhower to rely too heavily on his adviser may be considerable in view of his losses of trusted lieutenants over the last few years.

It would have been better perhaps to have appointed Mr. Dulles as adviser to Mr. Herter than to the President. And it will be well if the President now seeks to obtain Mr. Dulles' advice to him through the Secretary of State rather than seeking it outside that channel. Mr. Dulles has shown how well he would understand that procedure and has already given implicit signs that he would approve of it.

THE CAPEHART PLAN

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, on Friday, April 24, the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] offered a number of suggestions for dealing with the situation in Germany. The able Senator is always to be listened to when he offers his views. In matters of foreign policy and the cold war, however, he speaks with a special authority. He has the continuing acquaintance with international problems which goes with his diligent memberships on the Foreign Relations and Banking and Currency Committees. Moreover, he is a widely traveled man and one of the few Senators who has visited Russia in the postwar years. His first-hand knowledge of that country and his insight into the thinking of the Russian people are especially pertinent in dealing with the problems which are posed in our relations with them as regards Germany.

I read the three-point Capehart plan for a settlement of the German question with much interest. It is imaginative. It is bold. It reveals an exceptional flexibility of mind in dealing with a problem which requires new thought and new perceptions.

As I understand the Capehart plan on Germany, he would have withdrawals of Communist and free forces from Germany and East Europe. He would foreclose the nuclear armament of the two Germanies. He would have NATO—this country and its allies—guarantee Russia against a German attack and Germany against an attack by the Soviet Union. This plan, if acceptable, he believes, would lead to the reunification of Germany, and ultimately, perhaps, to greater freedom throughout Eastern Europe. After that, would come vastly increased trade between the Communist world and the West.

I cannot at this point accept quite the degree of flexibility from present policies which is contained in the Capehart plan. Nevertheless, I must commend the Senator from Indiana for the boldness and depth of thought and understanding which he has manifested in putting it forth. I am sure that the administration will appreciate having this plan before its eyes as it goes about the difficult task of molding a new Western policy on Germany.

I ask unanimous consent that there be inserted in the RECORD at this point, a news story on the Capehart plan which appeared in the Washington Evening Star, April 25, 1959.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PLAN OFFERED BY CAPEHART ON TROOP ISSUE

Senator CAPEHART, Republican, of Indiana, yesterday offered a Western program for negotiations on Berlin calling for withdrawal of all foreign troops from Germany and East Europe.

He proposed that the North Atlantic Treaty Organization countries offer to defend both Germany and Russia if either is attacked by the other.

Senator CAPEHART, a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, told a reporter he has not offered his proposals for possible consideration at the foreign ministers and summit conferences but he likely will do so.

He suggested:

1. Western Powers remove their troops from West Germany in exchange for the withdrawal of Soviet troops from East Germany, Poland, Czechoslovakia, and other satellites.

2. Both East and West Germany agree to forgo nuclear weapons arming.

3. The NATO countries agree that if Germany is attacked by Russia, they will go to Germany's aid and that if Russia is attacked by a rearmed Germany, the Western allies will defend Russia.

"On the basis of such an agreement," Senator CAPEHART said, in an interview, "we might then well consider a trade program with Russia."

He said that if his suggestions could be agreed upon at the coming negotiations the way would be opened "not only for the reunification of Germany, but greater freedom throughout Eastern Europe."

"We could end up with every one of those countries having their own kind of government," Senator CAPEHART said.

ECONOMY HOLDS KEYS TO BALANCED BUDGET

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I have in my hand a news item from the New York Times of Sunday, April 26, 1959, written by Edwin L. Dale, Jr. The headline of the article is "Economy Holds Keys to Balanced Budget" and the subheadline is "Strong Trend in Income and Profits May Bring a Rise in Tax Revenue."

Mr. Dale points out in the article that the chances of a balance between spending and receipts are still considered quite good, even on the assumption that Congress is more "spending minded" and less "receipts minded" than the President has asked it to be.

Mr. Dale also points out that if the flow of receipts is large enough to balance the budget, even though spending on farming and highways and anything else is higher than the original estimates, the Treasury will have to do no further borrowing in the money market, and that could have an important effect on interest rates, the structure of the national debt, the availability of funds for other borrowers, and other things. Any of these effects would be almost universally regarded as desirable.

I emphasize that particular paragraph, because much has been said about money rates and high interest rates. I point out, as Mr. Edwin L. Dale suggests very strongly, that high interest rates are the result of competition for money. If we could take the Federal Government out of competition for billions of dollars worth of money in the money market by balancing the Federal budget, it would have a very desirable effect upon interest rates. One of the strongest influences for the imposition of so-called high interest rates has been the unbalanced budget, and therefore, the necessity for the Federal Government to go into the money markets year after year for billions of dollars, in competition with States, with localities, and with corporate borrowers.

The point I make is that the balancing of the budget would have a very profound and a very desirable effect upon the whole question of interest rates.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is it the desire of the Senator to have the article printed in the RECORD?

Mr. BUSH. I thank the Presiding Officer for reminding me of that. I ask unanimous consent that the entire article by Mr. Edwin L. Dale, Jr., be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ECONOMY HOLDS KEYS TO BALANCED BUDGET—STRONG TRENDS IN INCOME AND PROFITS MAY BRING A RISE IN TAX REVENUE

(By Edwin L. Dale, Jr.)

WASHINGTON, April 25.—When a Federal budget balances or is in the red, the main reason is not decisions of the President or actions of Congress. It is events in the national economy in general and on the Nation's farms in particular.

The virtually unanimous belief here over the last 3 months since the President submitted his precariously balanced budget for the fiscal year 1960, beginning July 1, has been that the budget would wind up in the red. Heavy stress has been laid on the probable—but not necessarily relevant—failure of Congress to go along with many of the President's recommendations.

The predictions of a deficit may very well prove true. But among the budget experts, this is by no means considered a foregone conclusion. The chances of a balance between spending and receipts are still considered quite good—even on the assumption that Congress is more spending minded and less receipts minded than the President has asked it to be.

Congressional spending actions, on appropriations and other direct spending bills, almost always have their main impact on future budgets, not the immediately forthcoming budget. Thus this Congress could pass a big housing bill, a rise in defense appropriations, airports and depressed areas bills going beyond the President's recommendations—and the impact on the $77 billion estimate of expenditures in fiscal 1960 would be very small. One form of aid-to-education bill being considered and a few veterans proposals could have a large immediate impact but these are exceptions and are not likely to become law anyway.

OFFSETTING FACTORS

There do happen to be this year two matters on which congressional inaction can, ironically, increase the total of the budget. Both involve receipts that, under budget accounting, count as an offset to spending instead of entering the receipts side.

One is the requested increase in postal rates. The other is the requested increase in gasoline taxes, without which there would probably have to be budget expenses to make up a deficit in the highway trust fund.

These two items together amount to an immediate $600 million budget impact in the forthcoming fiscal year. Those who have forecast a deficit have laid heavy stress on them. Congress has given no sign of willingness to pass either. All other things being equal, failure to pass them would result in a deficit of more than $500 million.

But the main point is that all other things are never equal. No important item of expenditure or receipts ever turns out exactly as estimated. And the two things that are most unequal of all are receipts from income taxes—both corporate and personal—and farm spending.

Corporate and personal income tax receipts, obviously, depend upon the state of the economy. When the President made his estimate for those two items, he assumed a good year in 1959, but not a sensational year.

EARLY REACTION

The first reaction to his receipts estimates was that they were too optimistic.

But since those early reactions, the economic statistics have begun to look very good. In particular, the estimate for corporation profits—based in part on early corporate reports for the first quarter—is now being revised upward in some quarters from the $47 billion forecast by the President to $50 billion or even more.

As for personal incomes, the big jump in March lends support to those who feel that the President's estimate of $374 billion for the year as a whole still looks reasonably safe. This is more doubtful than profits, but could easily work out as the President forecast.

Thus there has emerged a very real prospect that receipts will be $1 billion to $2 billion higher than the President's estimate. If corporate profits are $50 billion, receipts from this source alone will be $1.5 billion higher than the estimate in the budget.

Such an outcome would scarcely be unprecedent. President Eisenhower's first estimate of receipts for fiscal 1956 was $60 billion. By the time the books were closed 18 months later, the Treasury had collected $68.2 billion—which was the single reason why that budget was balanced.

What of the spending side of the budget, outside of the aforementioned congressional action (or inaction)? All the major spending items in the budget invariably come out differently from the original estimate, for various reasons. But in recent years a single item has done more than all the others to throw the estimates out of whack.

FARM SPENDING

This is farm spending. It is totally uncontrollable because it depends on how many farmers choose to avail themselves of price support loans or purchases. And that in turn depends mainly on the size of crops. In some recent years this item has turned out as much as $2 billion higher than the original estimate.

As one budget expert put it this week, "Leaving out the receipts side, the state of the moisture in the soil of Kansas could have more to do with whether this budget balances than all of the congressional actions put together."

When President Eisenhower submitted his budget in January no one really knew what the size of farm crops this year would be. No one still knows with any certainty. But the first crop reports are in, and they look encouraging from a budget viewpoint. President Eisenhower estimated farm spending at $6 billion, and current reestimates on the basis of crop information has left this total essentially unchanged.

One other spending item should be mentioned. Congress could make a deficit almost inevitable if, following the wish of the Senate, it should decide to charge to fiscal 1960, instead of fiscal 1959, the $1,375 million item for increased U.S. contribution to the International Monetary Fund. The House version of the bill left the money in 1959. The issue has yet to be resolved in a House-Senate conference.

It is clear from the foregoing that, in the crucial receipts item, the economy makes the budget rather than the budget making the economy. A balance achieved by higher receipts is simply a signal that the economy is strong. The balance does not make it strong.

EXCEPTED ITEM

But there is one exception to this generalization. This is in the complicated field of management of the national debt. If the flow of receipts is big enough to balance the budget, even though spending on farming (or highways or anything else) is higher than the original estimates, the Treasury will have to do no further borrowing in the money market. And that could have an important effect on interest rates, the structure of the national debt, availability of funds for other borrowers and other things. All of these effects would be almost universally regarded as desirable.

As for the impact of the budget on inflationary pressure, it is probably the spending side that counts above all.

This—together with the impact of congressional actions this year on future budgets—accounts for the persistence of the administration's economy drive, even though many of its officials think the prospects for a balance in the budget are pretty good.

THE OPENING OF THE ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I am proud to invite the attention of this body to the opening Saturday of the St. Lawrence Seaway. As that day's Washington Post and Times Herald correctly noted, this event marked the realization of a dream of well over a century.

In the past 5 years, the United States and Canada have deepened channels and made other changes to open up the heartland of America to world trade.

I take this opportunity to congratulate and commend the officials—private and governmental—in both countries who have contributed so much to making possible completion of the Seaway. They have marked their names indelibly on the history pages of both the United States and Canada.

Completion of the Seaway can launch a real "golden age" for all in the region of direct benefit from this significant event. As I have noted, the mere fact that this important project could be finished at all demonstrates a kind of cooperation among international, Federal, State, and local governments and industry which is all too rare in today's troubled world.

As the ships made their way Saturday through the new facilities, the eyes of the world were fittingly focused on the St. Lawrence Seaway. But these acts and the official ceremonies in June formally inaugurating the Seaway, are only the first steps. We must now bend with a will to the task of insuring that the vast future potential signaled by this event is fully realized.

The opening is no magic wand. We must now go to work to let the world know our products, our market potential, and our readiness to expand the existing two-way trade with other nations. We have a sales job to do, because we are competing with well-established industries and ports.

But we are well armed for the fray. Upon the shores of the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence Valley nearly two-thirds of the foreign trade of the United States originates. It is the outlet for the richest concentration of industry in the world. Nearly one-half of the U.S. economy is included in this great economic region. Now this area suddenly finds itself closer to Liverpool than Baltimore, closer to France than Philadelphia. The resultant opportunities stagger the imagination.

I see for the future of this area a greater potential than the Erie Canal had for my State of New York. All over the State, benefits from the opening will be reaped. In particular, the north country of New York State will boom.

Mr. President, only inertia and fear can prevent a spectacular growth and great prosperity as a result of the Seaway's completion. The future is not for little men with little minds, nor for men without vision. The future is for men of daring, who have great expectations, who with guidance, perseverence, and leadership will strive to transform these great expectations into reality.

I am confident all who are concerned with Saturday's events, all who are concerned with the future of the Seaway, are alert and equal to the challenge of its ramifications. I am confident this event can and will mark the beginning of a golden age of prosperity and progress, based on utilization of the Seaway.

Mr. President, Saturday's New York Herald Tribune comments significantly on the Seaway's opening. I ask unanimous consent that the editorial be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SEAWAY IS OPENED

When the first cargoes start toward the heart of the North American Continent today through the locks of the St. Lawrence Seaway, it will mark the opening of one of man's greatest triumphs over geography. And it will be a reaffirmation of the value of water transport in a day when the air has seemed to be the great new avenue of world communications.

For all the Seaway's modernity, there will be much history sailing through its new locks and deepened channels. For the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence formed one of the great routes into North America from the days of the first explorers—a route that vied with the Mississippi-Missouri-Ohio complex and the Hudson-Mohawk link when canoes and other small craft were the principal means of speedy travel in inland America. The bateaux of the French voyagers and their big bark canoes took adventurers and missionaries, fur-traders and soldiers, on the great looping circuit that once threatened to pin the English colonies to their strip of seacoast behind the Appalachians.

But wars, and a climate that favored more southerly settlements, ended that. The long winter freeze that closed the St. Lawrence made it unprofitable, at first, to develop all the potentialities of the route; New York State's Erie Canal tapped the traffic of the Great Lakes and the Mississippi and its tributaries were soon alive with steamboats as New York City and New Orleans became the great entry ports of a continent, rather than Montreal. And by the middle of the last century, the railroads were altering the historic transportation patterns which had been constructed in a time when waterways ruled.

Since that time, automobiles and planes have been added to the train and the ship and new variations in trade routes and shipping methods have ensued. Many canals have fallen into disuse; railways have felt the pinch of diverted traffic and revenues. Communities which flourished by the banks of once busy waterways wasted away, as neighbors on the railway lines boomed—then some of the railway towns were themselves eclipsed. Yet through it all, the United States and Canada grew great and prosperous, by exploiting to its fullest each new way of shipping men and goods across the great reaches of their rich lands.

Now the St. Lawrence Seaway, built to carry vessels nearly double the draft that could navigate the older locks and channels, will interchange ships, passengers, and cargoes between the lake ports and the whole wide world. It will mean many changes—although there is still fierce dispute over just what those changes will be.

New York City, for example, profited enormously by the Erie Canal, the railroads, the highways, and the planes, for its magnificent port was the natural exchange point between inland and ocean trade. Unquestionably, some of the traffic that poured through New York will be diverted to the North. But the great port is still there, the facilities that have been built to meet its uses and service the ships are functioning, the skills of management and the capital accumulations of centuries of growth are available. The port is never choked by ice; communications with the interior are always open.

New York, therefore, need not fear the Seaway or the future. It has its own strengths; it stands to share in the increased prosperity that is promised for the lakes region, along with all the rest of the Nation. For it was only the smallest cities that really languished in the past because of changes in transportation methods. Those that had the innate qualities of greatness, that were not simply accidents of some transient transportation factor, may have relinquished some part of their business when new avenues of national wealth were opened. But they grew with a growing country—as New York will continue to grow.

Without rancor or petty jealousy, then, New York City hails the Seaway and wishes success to the cities on its path. North America, territory of the friendly neighbors north and south of the lakes, is big enough and fruitful enough for every one. What serves one, serves all.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, the opening of the St. Lawrence Seaway on Saturday heralds a notable mark of progress for trade and commerce on the North American Continent. The accessibility of the rich, industrial-agricultural complex of midland America to deep-sea shipping of the world will, I believe, pave the way to a brighter economic future for the United States and Canada.

Although the formal ceremonies are scheduled for June 26 in celebration of the opening of the Seaway, the traversing of deep-draft, oceangoing ships through the waterway now really marks, first, the completion of one of the most magnificent inland waterway engineering and construction feats in history; and, second, the opening of new commercial, industrial, recreational, agricultural, and tourist opportunities for ourselves and our good neighbor to the north. Included in these opportunities are:

First. Less expensive transportation to the markets of the world for the products of our farms and factories;

Second. Great interchange of United States and Canadian products;

Third. Stimulation of tourist travel between the United States, Canada, and other lands of the world;

Fourth. The outpouring of dynamic volumes of electric power from the powerplants on the waterway;

Fifth. An increased demand for services and facilities to handle the increased trade—thus creating more jobs and great economic health;

Sixth. An initial increase in trade; estimated at 10 percent, with larger volumes in the future.

NEEDED: EARLY COMPLETION OF GREAT LAKES CONSTRUCTION CHANNELS

We recognize, of course, that the event reemphasizes the need for early approval of the appropriation of adequate funds for the completion of channels for the western end of Lake Erie. Until this is accomplished, the agricultural and industrial areas west of Lake Erie will still be denied benefit of the great waterway.

Consequently, I again respectfully call the attention of my colleagues on the Appropriations Committee to the need for approval of adequate funds in the 1961 budget.

As we know, the budgetary recommendations were, unfortunately, limited to $23 million for work on the connecting channels. Recognizing that this amount was inadequate if we are to meet the target date of 1962 for completion of work on the channels, my colleagues will recall that I contacted the Corps of Engineers to inquire what amount could be effectively utilized in the next fiscal year that would enable us to meet this deadline.

In response, the engineers indicated that

First. About $29 million could be effectively utilized; and Second. That if work were carried forward at a $29 million level for the next fiscal year, it would be possible to meet the 1962 deadline.

We recognize, of course, that the Federal Government is facing serious budgetary problems.

However, I believe this is one instance where, if we failed to provide additional funds, it would be a glaring case of being "penny-wise and pound-foolish."

Jointly, the United States and Canada have invested about $450 million in this development project. To fail to provide the additional funds to give access to the greater industrial areas of the western Great Lakes to the Seaway would be shortsighted indeed.

Consequently, I again respectfully urge approval of the $29 million amount for work of the connecting channels for fiscal year 1961.

The April 25 edition of the Milwaukee Journal carried an editorial entitled "A Long Awaited Day." Hailing the Seaway as the realization of a 60-year-old dream, the editorial also pays tribute to those who, over the years, have played a role in the completion of this great project.

I request unanimous consent to have the editorial printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A LONG AWAITED DAY

As the first ships paraded through the St. Lawrence Seaway Saturday they brought realization of a 60-year-old dream for Milwaukee, Wis., other Great Lakes States, and Canada. Many men and organizations and institutions share credit for this magnificent accomplishment. And Wisconsin deserves a large share in the glory.

In recent years, Wisconsin's Senator ALEXANDER WILEY has been one of the most consistent and determined leaders in the fight for the Seaway. But it should not be forgotten that another Wisconsin Senator, William F. Vilas, first laid the proposal before Congress in 1895. The Milwaukee Journal was the first newspaper to launch an editorial campaign for the Seaway in 1897.

Wisconsin and Milwaukee leaders have always been in the forefront of efforts to bring the Seaway into being. Milwaukee and other Wisconsin cities stepped out ahead and showed their confidence in ultimate success by developing harbor facilities in advance of final Seaway approval.

In this moment of regional and national pride, however, we must not overlook the role of our progressive Canadian neighbors. When it appeared that American foes of the Seaway—the railroads, especially—had succeeded in blocking our national participation, Canada said it would go ahead alone. That broke the final political barriers. So we are indebted today not only for the very large Canadian investment in the Seaway, and the neighborly cooperation without which it could never have been built, but for the prod that got our Congress off dead center.

The Seaway is a great memorial to all, Americans and Canadians, who had the vision of what it could mean to open the heartland of the continent to the oceans and their traffic, and who never lost faith that this day would come.

IMPORTATION OF TURF GRASS SEEDS

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Senate Joint Memorial 7 of the 50th Oregon Legislative Assembly be printed in the body of the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the memorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATE JOINT MEMORIAL 7

TO HIS EXCELLENCY, THE HONORABLE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

We, your memorialists, the 50th Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, in legislative session assembled, most respectfully represent as follows:

Whereas the production of Chewings fescue and Creeping Red fescue (known as Fine fescues) turf grass seeds is a major agricultural enterprise in the Willamette Valley of western Oregon and in the Grande Ronde Valley of eastern Oregon, with over 90 percent of the production, in the United States which has averaged 9,707,000 pounds annually during the past 5 years; and

Whereas heavy imports, averaging 7,469,750 pounds during the 1954 to 1957 crop years, have contributed to a buildup in U.S. carryover stocks and have demoralized the domestic market in some recent years, and now threaten to do so again, with 8,229,300 pounds imported during the first 8 months of the 1958 crop year, and

Whereas instability in foreign production and in imports into this country discourage domestic producers' efforts to satisfy U.S. needs; and

Whereas, given reasonable protection from such variable imports and their periodic disastrous effects on U.S. markets, Oregon growers and other growers in the United States are willing, able, and anxious to produce high quality Chewings fescue and Creeping Fine fescue seeds in amounts sufficient to assure adequate supplies to meet domestic needs at reasonable prices; and

Whereas the current low import duty of 1 cent per pound on Fine fescue seeds does not limit nor regulate imports of this important Oregon farm commodity, and

Whereas an import quota of around 5 million pounds annually of Fine fescue seed, as recommended by the Northwest Chewings and Creeping Red Fescue Association, should lead to equitable sharing of the domestic markets with producers in friendly and free countries: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Oregon (the House of Representatives jointly concurring therein), That we respectfully urge the President of the United States to cause the U.S. Tariff Commission to promptly investigate this matter and recommend to the President, for his executive action, the establishment of an annual quota on Fine Fescue seed imports into this country; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this memorial be sent to the President of the United States, to the U.S. Tariff Commission and to all Members of the Oregon congressional delegation.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, the Oregon Legislative Assembly, through this memorial, is seeking one thing and one thing only; that is a fair hearing before the Tariff Commission in order that the Oregon seed industry may present the facts as it sees them in support of the contention that tariff protection is needed for the Chewings fescue and Creeping Fine fescue seed industry of the State.

Mr. President, I do not anticipate the findings of the Tariff Commission, nor do I suggest to them the action they ought to follow, but I do feel that the record indicates a fair hearing is needed and ought to be given the proponents. In this connection, I ask unanimous consent that a letter addressed to me, under date of March 10, by Mr. Ted Sidor, secretary of the Union County Seed Growers Association, be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LA GRANDE, OREG., March 10, 1959.

Senator WAYNE MORSE,
U.S. Senate Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MORSE: The Union County Seed Growers Association, the Oregon Seed League and the North West Chewings and Creeping Red Fescue Association are interested in applying to the Tariff Commission of an import quota on Fine fescue seed.

This will be the third time that these groups have applied. The last one was sent in 1957, and was turned down by the secretary, Donn Brent, of the Tariff Commission, without a hearing. He indicated that we had no cause for alarm; however, the very situation has developed as we predicted.

Increased plantings in other areas is forcing the market down to a price below the cost of production in the Northwest States. At the present time, stocks on hand by dealers will have to be sold at a loss because of the price caused by the huge influx of these fescue seed into the United States.

We would like to enlist your cooperation and aid in preparing the information needed for such a tariff. We would like to do this as soon as possible because of the influx of seed and the lowering of price that is endangering an industry vital to the economic stability of Oregon and other Northwest States.

Very truly yours,

TED SIDOR,
Secretary, Union County Seed Growers Association.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, Mr. Sidor, in my judgment, has indicated that the situation which was predicted has come to pass, and that this matter is deserving of careful and conscientious scrutiny by the Tariff Commission.

Mr. President, this again illustrates a point of view for which I have fought for 15 years in the Senate, which is that the American people are always entitled to procedural protections in connection with the exercise of discretion by Government officials.

It is the same principle for which I fought on the floor of the Senate last Friday night, when I urged that there be added to the Kennedy-Ervin labor bill a series of amendments which would give greater protection against the exercise of discretionary power by the Secretary of Labor.

Mr. President, in connection with the seed problem, we have an industry which wants to be heard before the administrative body which has the power to render a discretionary judgment which may do irreparable injury to the industry.

This is the same position I took not so long ago in connection with the cherry industry of my State, which wanted a hearing before the Tariff Commission in order to show the irreparable damage which was being done by the importation of maraschino cherries, particularly from France and Italy.

I wish to stress, Mr. President, that in my judgment Congress can never justify denying to individuals and groups in our country the opportunity to be heard. The right to petition the Government is a precious right, and whenever we pass legislation, as we have in this field, Mr. President, which has the effect of denying the right to be heard and to present the facts to the Tariff Commission, we commit, in my opinion, a legislative wrong.

Again I ask the simple question, as I have so many times during 15 years: What is wrong with providing a forum for people who think they have been wronged by the Government, so as to give them an opportunity to present the facts in support of their contentions?

Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNAMARA in the chair). The Senator from Oregon.

RAILROAD FREIGHT CAR SHORTAGE

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks a telegram which I have received from Mr. W. C. Cole, vice chairman of the Governor's emergency transportation committee of 1959, in my State, dealing with a very serious boxcar problem which has developed again in the Pacific Northwest.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SALEM, OREG., April 25, 1959.

The Honorable WAYNE MORSE,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.:

House joint memorial 8 of the Oregon Legislature, the complete text of which follows, was proposed by the Governor's emergency transportation committee of 1959, and introduced in the house by the house standing committee on planning and development. The memorial has now passed both houses of the Oregon Legislature and will be forwarded to you as soon as it can be formally processed.

All votes on this memorial were unanimous.

It is our sincere hope that you can give your best efforts to implementing its aims as they affect national legislation.

"To His Excellency, the Honorable Dwight D. Eisenhower, President of the United States; to the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, and to the Interstate Commerce Commission:

"We, your memorialists, the 50th Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, in legislative session assembled, most respectfully represent as follows:

"Whereas the Oregon economy is directly dependent upon a relatively small number of basic industries; and

"Whereas the agricultural and lumber products of our State are vital to the health, welfare, and defense of our country; and

"Whereas due to circumstances beyond our control the aforementioned industries have for years suffered from periodic railroad car shortage; and

"Whereas the western railroads which serve this State have been and are building cars in larger numbers than are the eastern railroads; and

"Whereas the failure of eastern railroads to produce sufficient cars for their own needs stems from obvious financial difficulties; and

"Whereas this lack of cars leads the eastern railroads to delay return of western cars for extended periods of time; and

"Whereas the solution to this problem cannot be obtained locally but lies in the hands of the Federal Government, the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the eastern railroads; Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Oregon (the Senate jointly concurring therein), That the President of the United States, the Congress of the United States, and the Interstate Commerce Commission are hereby requested to take appropriate action to improve our national defense capabilities and the economic condition of our State by:

"(1) Assuring the return of rail cars to the railroad holding title thereto with the least practicable delay;

"(2) Deferring action on any national legislation which would increase railroad cost of operation; and

"(3) Making every reasonable effort to aid the railroads to develop a car construction program of sufficient size to increase materially the national car supply; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this memorial be transmitted to the President of the United States, the Secretary of the U.S. Senate, the Clerk of the U.S. House of Representatives, to each Member of the Oregon congressional delegation, and to the Interstate Commerce Commission."

Sincerely,

W. C. COLE,
Vice Chairman, Governor's Emergency Transportation Committee of 1959.

Mr. MORSE. This is an old, bewhiskered problem. We have had it time and time again, and in my judgment, we shall have it time and time again in the future, until the Congress adopts some procedural reforms in connection with the Interstate Commerce Commission.

I have great confidence in the chairman of the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON]. I know that he is as much concerned about this problem as are the other Members of the delegation from the State of Washington, and all the Members of the Oregon delegation, including my colleague in the Senate [Mr. NEUBERGER]. We may disagree as to just what procedure should be adopted, but we know that there is a boxcar shortage, and that there is a problem facing the Congress of taking the steps necessary to alleviate it.

I have indicated in the past that I am willing to go so far as to provide for the building, by the Government, of the number of boxcars which can be demonstrated, on the facts, to be necessary in order to meet a war emergency.

We do the same thing for a great many European railroads. We have sunk millions of dollars in equipment and facilities for European railroads. This aid represents a total out-of-pocket grant c millions of dollars of the American taxpayers' money.

For example, we paid the entire cost of the railroad terminal in Rome, Italy. I favored it. I am willing to spend the money necessary to strengthen us against the threat of aggression by Russian communism, but I think we are overlooking the fact that if we should get into a war with Russia tomorrow, America's transportation system would collapse. It could not begin to meet the war emergency needs which would be brought about by such a war.

If that be true—and I believe opportunity should be provided to supply the facts—the American taxpayer owes it to the American railroad industry to build the number of boxcars necessary to meet such an emergency, over and above what the industry needs for peacetime transportation, and place them in a pool, making them available to the railroads of the country on the basis of a reasonable rental rate, in order to meet the kind of boxcar shortage which is bringing about such great economic losses to the lumber industry and the grain industry in the Pacific Northwest and in other sections of the United States.

I hope the Senator from Washington will call for early hearings in Washington on the boxcar shortage. I understand that my good friend from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL], who is a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, has already held some hearings in Kansas City, for which I commend him. However, as a Senator from the Northwest, I now raise my voice in a plea for some hearings in Washington, D.C., and possibly in the Pacific Northwest, on the boxcar shortage, because it is a problem which we have an obligation to solve. It is a problem which we can solve if we have the will to do it.

MOB RULE

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I rise with great sadness. The conscience of the entire Nation—and I am certain the conscience of the people of the South, and specifically of Mississippi—must be shocked and affronted by what, from all indications, is a lynching of M. C. Parker, reportedly taken from a Poplarville, Miss., jail, by a masked band. That there may have been a lynching at all in 1959 is even more shocking, as all Americans of good conscience had every reason to hope that such brutal crimes had become a thing of the sad past.

The fact that the Poplarville jail was unguarded—even though this is apparently a local practice—indicates that a new kind of vigilance is needed. Damaging as such an event is, and tending to nullify much that is constructive which has occurred with respect to civil rights, it could also nullify in one bloody moment many efforts at progress which thousands of Americans of good will in a State like Mississippi are endeavoring to make on their own.

Furthermore, it is a damaging blow to American prestige all over the world, and is sure to be exploited, as was the Emmett Till case and similar incidents of the past, by the Communists where it can do us the most harm, especially among the uncommitted nations of the free world—not the countries behind the curtain, but the free world where there are 1 billion people whose skins are yellow or black. Where they will go could well determine the course of freedom for centuries to come.

We must again convince those who may have doubts that the fruits of our constitutional democracy are individual liberty and freedom, and the rule of law; and that the strange fruit concerning which we have read in the press is an aberation of the sort loathed by the overwhelming majority of all Americans, no matter where they live.

The crime probably committed in Poplarville, Miss., is an offense not only against that community and State, but against all the people of the United States, and must be considered as such. It consequently behooves us to do everything necessary to see that such offenses do not recur. This is within our power if we choose to act—and choose to act we must.

It would be demeaning the sadness and tragedy of the event if I were to speak about civil rights legislation, antilynching laws, or anything else. The stark tragedy of this event, standing by itself, is enough.

We are being judged in the world by what we do to come abreast of these events, to find those who are responsible, and punish them, and to demonstrate the outrage of the community itself.

I am very glad to note in the morning press that there is local outrage in the State, as shown by the diligence of the State's own officials and local police officials, as well as by agents of the FBI. I am sure that the great conscience of America will leave no stone unturned to see that the culprits are found and the right thing is done about such events, and, if humanly possible, to see that they do not occur again.

It requires the organized conscience of the American people, on a national scale, to impress some people with the fact that our country simply cannot and will not tolerate, circa 1959, any such lawlessness, anarchy, or brutality of man to man. I think I bespeak the mind of every American who has faith and hope in his heart for the right, when I express these sentiments.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I rise to commend the distinguished Senator from New York for his very fine statement. I am sure that I do not violate rule XIX of the Senate when I say that it is with a heavy heart tody that I view the tragic episode in Mississippi.

I am sure that the overwhelming number of fine citizens of Mississippi are likewise of heavy heart today. Of course, the incident adds great propaganda fuel to the Communist pump, because we all know the kind of misrepresentation which the lying Rusian propaganda machine will spew on the world now for some time to come in regard to this unfortunate happening.

I am not sufficiently familiar with the facts to know what protections were or were not taken in order to prevent this incident. I am a little bit at a loss, from newspaper accounts, to understand why there was no guard, why apparently, there was no law officer within the near vicinity of the jail in order at least to be in a position to help with identification. It is always remarkable, when these tragedies occur, that they should occur under such circumstances that a human error of judgment makes it possible for mobs to take the law into their own hands and commit this kind of horrendous crime. It must be apparent to all groups in America that now is the time, not for criticism, but for an understanding of the nature of the problem and the steps which ought to be taken in order to prevent such occurrences.

I would take the Senate back to 1957 when I urged on the floor of the Senate that title III should not be stricken from the civil rights bill, because title III had teeth in it. I believe that once mobsters understand that procedures exist, as we had them in title III of the civil rights bill, for giving the courts the judicial power they must have in order to enforce their decisions, that fact will have a deterring effect on mobsters. It will also strengthen law-abiding groups in any State, North or South, where occasionally there are people whose emotions run away with them, and they commit this kind of a crime which constitutes a blot on the history of our country.

I would suggest that the Mississippi incident shows the importance of our proceeding calmly and with circumspection, but with determination to pass at this session of Congress a true civil rights bill.

RECENT CRITICISM OF THE SUPREME COURT

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, the recent criticism of the U.S. Supreme Court is a matter of concern for members of all three branches of our Federal Government. It is the responsibility of the Congress, the executive, and the judiciary to maintain the balance of powers provided in the Constitution. Each branch must defend itself. On the other hand, if one branch is unfairly attacked, I believe there is a responsibility of the other two to defend it.

Much of the criticism of the Court has been intemperate and based on personal reaction to decisions rather than on an understanding of the role of the Supreme Court. However, the indictment of the Supreme Court last summer by the Conference of State Chief Justices is of another order. The authority of their office and the size of the vote to reprimand the Supreme Court for failure to exercise proper judicial restraint deserves attention.

The judgment of the State justices was not a court decision. It was a convention resolution, and it is subject to evaluation in a more restrained atmosphere. This has been provided by Dean William B. Lockhart, of the University of Minnesota Law School, in an address, "A Response to the Conference of State Chief Justices." The address was given at the Association of American Law Schools, meeting in Chicago last December, and is reprinted in the April 1959 issue of the University of Pennsylvania Law Review. I believe that Dean Lockhart has brought the issue into balance, and that his remarks on the Court's adherence to the decisions of Congress are especially pertinent.

I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMMENT—A RESPONSE TO THE CONFERENCE OF STATE CHIEF JUSTICES

(Address by William B. Lockhart, dean and professor of law, University of Minnesota Law School, made as a panel member at the Association of American Law Schools meeting in Chicago, Dec. 28, 1958)

My assignment is to appraise the Supreme Court's role in recent times in the area of Federal-State relations. I have decided to center my attention on the criticism leveled at the Court by the Conference of State Chief Justices last summer.

We can ignore today's emotional and colorful attacks on the Court. Their irrationality destroys their effectiveness. But when the chief justices of the State courts by a vote of 36 to 8 indict the Supreme Court for failure to exercise proper judicial restraint that indictment requires careful examination.

The danger is that an indictment of this kind, coming from a responsible source like the Conference of Chief Justices, tends among the uninformed and irresponsible to be taken as proof of guilt.

What, then, is the indictment?

In the conclusion of their report the chief justices deplore what they call an accelerating trend toward increasing power of the National Government and corresponding contracted power of the State governments.

They recognize that with a developing country and changing conditions there will always be problems of allocating power between National and State Governments, as matters once mainly of local concern become matters of national concern, and they recognize that the Supreme Court is given power to determine such questions. They point out that the degree of friction that develops in effecting changes depends upon the wisdom of those empowered to alter the boundaries and upon the speed with which changes are made. The chief justices then build up to their indictment by saying: "The overall tendency of decisions of the Supreme Court has been to press the extension of Federal power and to press it rapidly." Then comes the indictment:

"We believe the Supreme Court too often has tended to adopt the role of policymaker without proper judicial restraint. We feel this is particularly the case in both of the great fields we have discussed—namely, the extent and extension of the Federal power, and the supervision of State action by virtue of the 14th amendment."

My concern is with the indictment that the Supreme Court has "too often" acted "without proper judicial restraint" in the Federal-State relations area. In my opinion, this indictment is not justified as applied to the "modern" Supreme Court toward which this criticism was directed. This criticism might properly have been directed to the pre-1937 Court, but not to the Court after 1937.

Let us consider briefly the first area mentioned by the chief justices—extent and extension of Federal powers. In this area has the Court of the past 20 years adopted the role of policymaker without proper judicial restraint?

There are two divisions in this area: The first relates to the expanding scope of the national powers themselves under congressional legislation; the second, to the restrictions or limitations upon State power arising out of the existence or exercise of national powers.

In the first division the Court has exercised extreme self-restraint. There is no need to spell this out. We all know that for the past 20 years the Court has permitted Congress to make its own policy in expanding the national power, whether under the commerce clause or under the power to tax and spend for the "general welfare" or other clauses. The Court has refrained from interfering as Congress has moved the National Government into areas formerly the exclusive domain of the States.

The chief justices deplore the rapid expansion of national powers, but they are either criticizing the wrong agency or seeking the wrong remedy. Congress is the agency that has expanded the national powers, and the Court has practiced judicial restraint in leaving these policy determinations to Congress. If the chief justices want the Court to check this legislative expansion of Federal powers, the Court must exercise less judicial restraint, not more.

In only one respect can it fairly be said that the Court has on its own authority expanded national powers. This is in its interpretation of vague statutory phrases, such as "affecting commerce" in the National Labor Relations Act, where Congress sought to go as far as the Court would find constitutional power. Here the Court could possibly have adopted a more restricted view of national power without thwarting clearly expressed congressional intent. Yet Congress wanted the regulations to extend as far as was constitutionally proper, and there is no basis for concluding that the Court has carried national power in these areas beyond that contemplated or desired by Congress. Congress is still the basic policymaker in determining the scope of national power, and has shown no inclination to draw back its regulations in these areas where it used vague phrases for the very purpose of going as far as possible. I think of only one exception, the Southeastern Underwriters case, where the Court's 1943 application of the antitrust laws to insurance was later, in effect, reversed by Congress. Here greater self-restraint, with a more thoughtful appraisal of the possible implications of the decision on State regulatory power, might have avoided an unhappy episode.

But these illustrations of expansion by the Court's interpretation of vague statutory phrases are peripheral to the main thrust of expanding national power. That thrust came from Congress, with strong public support; and even Mr. Justice Roberts, after retirement, said that the Court could not have resisted it.

In the second division relating to restrictions or limitations on State power arising out of national power, dormant or exercised, the overall movement of the modern Court has been toward increasing, not decreasing, State power. Let us glance briefly at the major areas involved.

In intergovernmental immunities the Court has moved toward greater and greater freedom of taxation, both by the States and by the Federal Government. It has removed this major obstacle to State taxation at least when the immediate taxpayer is a private person, not the Federal Government itself. Here is an expanding area of judicial restraint, leaving the determination of the tax burden to the political processes. The Court is faced with tougher problems when State regulation has an impact on Federal agencies, but in recent years the Court has interfered with State regulation of this nature only when it was found inconsistent with actual Federal legislation. On some of these cases there is room for a reasonable difference of opinion, but in my opinion these cases cannot be criticized as demonstrating a lack of judicial self-restraint. Indeed, they are not so criticized by the chief justices.

In State taxation of interstate commerce the modern Court has shown more and more liberality toward State taxing power. The Court has given increasing recognition to the State need for tax revenue from interstate business, and has sustained many taxes that would have been held invalid prior to 1937. In some cases the Court has stricken down State taxes on what seem to me purely formal grounds, where I would have sustained the taxes as involving no real threat to interstate commerce. Yet this is a difficult field in which the arbiter of our Federal system has to weigh many considerations, and I do not believe that the Court can be accused of any lack of appropriate self-restraint in this difficult area. Today there is substantially greater freedom to impose taxes on interstate business than 20 years ago, and the report of the chief justices recognized this increasing liberality toward State taxation of interstate commerce.

Similarly, there is less interference in recent times with State regulation of interstate commerce, absent any Federal legislation. Increasingly, the Court gives careful consideration and appropriate weight to the State interest sought to be protected by the regulation, though it has not hesitated within the past 20 years to hold invalid State regulation that it considered unreasonably harmful to the national interest in a free commerce. This is its function and duty as the arbiter of the Federal system. I think it significant that the chief justices aimed no criticism at the Court in connection with cases of this kind.

Similarly, in other areas, the Court has given greater effect, not less effect, to State power during the past 20 years. The chief justices recognize this by referring to Erie v. Tompkins, establishing the reign of the State common law in Federal courts in diversity cases, and by noting the Supreme Court's relaxation of its due process rules with respect to in personam jurisdiction in State courts.

Actually, when you reduce the chief justice's report to specifics rather than generalities, in only one area is the report critical of actual Supreme Court decisions dealing with restrictions on State power arising out of national powers, as distinct from 14th amendment restrictions. This is in the preemption doctrine decisions.

The report refers to two lines of preemption cases: (1) the Nelson case, in which the Court held that Federal legislation dealing with subversive activity preempted the field and excluded State statutes forbidding subversive conduct against the U.S. Government, and (2) the cases dealing with the effect of the National Labor Relations Act on State jurisdiction to deal with labor relations in industries subject to the national act. The Court cannot justly be accused of lack of proper judicial restraint in either of these areas.

Personally, I think the Supreme Court was right when it affirmed the four to one decision of the Pennsylvania Supreme Court in the Nelson case. I do not propose to discuss the decision, though I suggest a reading of the defense of the decision at the Conference of Chief Justices by Chief Justice Jones, of Pennsylvania. It is enough to say that this was a difficult and close problem in an emotionally charged area, where the Court was bound to be criticized if it agreed with the State court that the State was without power to deal with subversion against the United States. Six of the nine Justices were firmly persuaded that State meddling in this delicate and difficult area was inconsistent with nationally established programs for dealing with this national problem, which only the National Government could adequately handle. Appropriate self-restraint does not require the Court to abdicate its responsibility in such a case, particularly when Congress can remedy the decision quickly if it disagrees.

The labor relations decisions in which the Court has sought to steer a workable line between National and State jurisdiction reveal a careful and studied effort to leave to the States as much jurisdiction as possible without interfering with the congressional plan of regulation. There is nothing lighthearted about the way the Court has struggled with the various aspects of this difficult problem. Had the Court been inclined to cut out for itself an easier task it could have taken the extreme position that Congress has preempted the entire field of labor relations affecting interstate commerce. This would have been easy for the Court to administer, but it would have disregarded important State interests. Instead, in my opinion, the Court has acted very responsibly to protect State interests in this area and has brought upon itself many headaches in the process. Of course, I do not agree with all of its decisions in this area, for they are difficult ones on which the most conscientious persons can reasonably differ. For example, I thought the Guss decision unnecessarily created a "no-man's land," an unfortunate result not compelled by the act. But good lawyers disagree with me on that case. Viewing this whole line of cases, I am satisfied that the Court cannot justly be accused of lack of proper judicial restraint or a tendency to overextend Federal power in disregard of State interests. Indeed, the report of the chief justices appears to recognize that the principal cause of difficulty in this area has been the failure of Congress to provide guidance, rather than a lighthearted exercise of policymaking by the Court.

Summarizing my views on the first count of the indictment, I suggest that the report of the Commission on Intergovernmental Relations in 1955 presents a far more accurate picture of the impact of Supreme Court decisions on the powers of local self-government than does the Chief Justices' report. The conclusions in chapter 1 of the Commission's report remain accurate in 1958: I mention two:

(1) Limitations on State power arising out of national powers have "only a minimal effect on the capacity of States to discharge their functions." The "trend of judicial opinion outside the civil liberties field has on the whole been tolerant and accommodating to State policy." The "range of activities that lie primarily within the power of the States by reason of lack of any coercive authority in Congress to deal with them is substantial."

(2) The basic problems of maintaining our Federal system today lie in those areas of National and State power where both Congress and the States have real choices to make, and where many alternative courses are open. It is in these areas that practical issues arise, and the legislatures and administrative agencies with their assigned jurisdictions provide the appropriate forums for settling these issues. The current judicial doctrine leaves these issues to be resolved by legislative judgment. They are no longer issues resolved by the Court applying legal criteria but by the legislative bodies, operating within their respective jurisdictions, applying political, economic, and administrative criteria.

This has been the consequence of Supreme Court decisions over the past 20 years. To me this is judicial self-restraint. It may be excessive self-restraint in the eyes of some, but it cannot properly be called lack of proper judicial restraint.

The second count of the indictment is that the Supreme Court has tended to adopt the role of policymaker without proper judicial restraint in its supervision of State action by virtue of the 14th amendment.

Most of us would, I think, agree that the verdict would have to be "guilty" here were we judging the period from 1900 to 1937. During that period the Supreme Court repeatedly substituted its policy judgment for that of the State legislatures on the wisdom and desirability of economic and social legislation. But that is all ancient history. At least with respect to social and economic legislation the Supreme Court of the past 20 years must be acquitted of this charge. The modern Supreme Court has been extremely careful not to substitute its judgment of what is wise or sound for State legislative judgment in social and economic legislation. The same cannot be said of a number of the State courts represented by the chief justices who voted to indict the Supreme Court for lack of proper judicial restraint.

Only in two areas has the Supreme Court used the 14th amendment to supervise State action to any extent in the past 20 years. In these two areas there has been a considerable degree of interference with State policies—in civil liberties and criminal procedure.

In both areas the Supreme Court has exercised a considerable measure of affirmative leadership. There has been less self-restraint here than in other areas and for that the Court is to be commended, not condemned. Here is where fundamental rights of the individual to equality under the law, to freedom of expression, and to fair procedures come into conflict with governmental power. Since judicial restraint on most matters of legislative policy has allowed a very broad sweep to governmental power, it is appropriate and necessary that the Court give increasing attention to insuring that these broad governmental powers are exercised in such a way as to respect the basic constitutional rights of individuals. It is safe to give broad sweep to legislative powers only if an independent judiciary will assert itself to protect the rights of individuals and minorities. A high degree of self-restraint here would be an abdication of the Court's major responsibility.[1]

Turning now to State criminal procedure the Court has been unusually careful to exercise a reasonable measure of self-restraint. It has deliberately left to each State a great deal of freedom to work out its own criminal procedure, so long as the most basic rights are not denied. Repeatedly, the Court has refused to impose upon the States procedural standards that the Court has found essential to fair administration of justice in the Federal courts.

This does not mean that the Court has not interfered with State criminal procedure. It has on a good many occasions and in some closely divided cases, like the recent Griffith decisions criticized by the Chief Justices. But the division in Griffith did not relate to the desirability of a procedure requiring the State to pay for a transcript when needed to perfect an indigent's appeal. All agreed this was desirable; their division related to whether this procedure was sufficiently fundamental to justify imposing the procedure on the State. In other words, the Griffith case itself demonstrates the Justices' constant concern with maintaining a proper balance between insuring fair procedures and leaving with the States independent responsibility for developing their own procedures. The many decisions in which the Court has resolved a difficult question in favor of the State demonstrate to me an unusual forbearance and judicial restraint in this area. Indeed, on a number of occasions the Court has allowed State procedure to stand that I personally would have held to violate due process—for example, its refusal to require counsel for indigents in noncapital cases.

I, for one, believe there is a real need and place for the discreet exercise of power in the Supreme Court to enforce fair standards of criminal procedure in State courts. I recommend the lecture by Justice Schaefer, of the Illinois Supreme Court on "Federalism and State Criminal Procedure," published in the November 1956 issue of Harvard Law Review. He makes a very strong case for control over State criminal procedure by the U.S. Supreme Court. In addition to certain practical considerations that give to the Supreme Court a better perspective than the State courts, Justice Schaefer emphasizes that:

"Considerations of federalism * * * must be measured against the competing demands arising out of the relations of the United States to the rest of the world. The quality of a nation's civilization can be largely measured by the methods it uses in enforcement of its criminal law. That measurement is not taken merely in retrospect by social historians of the future. It is taken from day to day by the peoples of the world, and to them the criminal procedure sanctioned by any of our States is the procedure sanctioned by the United States."

Apart from the real need for some Federal control over minimum procedural protections, it should not be overlooked that these procedural standards do not curtail the substantive legislative power of the State. The State still has the power to deal with its problems, but is simply required to do so by procedures that insure adequate safeguards to protect the rights of individuals.

My conclusion then is that in this broad field of Federal-State relations the Supreme Court has acted in a very responsible manner in the past 20 years. Its record simply does not support the accusation by the Chief Justices that it has too often acted without proper judicial restraint in this area. In view of the pressures under which the Court operates, with a heavy caseload and far less time to study the cases than we on the sidelines have to examine them critically, there are bound to be occasional cases where we may believe the Court has not given careful enough consideration to the problem and should, perhaps, have exercised greater judicial restraint before taking action. But its record as a whole does not support the broadside type of attack made by the chief justices.

This does not mean that the chief justices' comments can be lightly brushed aside. Even though their conclusions are not well supported by a fair examination of the Court's actual performance, there is significance in the fact that the vast majority of the State chief justices gave their support to this report. This indicates a rather widespread opinion in judicial circles, both north and south, that there is need to urge the Supreme Court to exercise greater discretion and self-restraint in its policymaking roles in our Federal system. So widespread an opinion cannot be wholly ignored by the Supreme Court Justices. While I think the report went too far when it accused the Court of too often adopting the role of policymaker without proper judicial restraint, we cannot quarrel with emphasis in the report on the need for careful moderation and restraint in the exercise of the Court's policymaking role. I think all of the Justices appreciate this need for moderation and restraint, but there may be some value in a forceful reminder from such a representative group of the judiciary in this country.

Still, I would not like to see this report cause any major change in the course of decisions by the Court. In my opinion we are now going through one of the great periods in the history of the Supreme Court. Today the rights of the individual are in the ascendancy. Today the Court is giving greater protection than ever before to basic individual liberties, and to procedures that protect the individual's rights. At the same time, the Court is throwing no roadblocks in the way of governmental action designed to benefit the individual. When history writes its record of this period, my opinion is that the storm now raging around the Supreme Court will be only one little skirmish in an era in which the Supreme Court will emerge as one of the key factors in the creation of a better American democracy.

FARM PRICE SUPPORTS

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, the April issue of the Farm Journal magazine carries an article reporting the results of a poll that the magazine made of its readers on the popularity of farm price supports.

The magazine reported that 55 percent of its readers are opposed to Government price supports and are in favor of removing Government entirely from the farm price field.

Secretary of Agriculture Benson and other enemies of Government farm price supports have gleefully seized upon the Farm Journal poll to justify their position.

In a recent speech, Secretary Benson cited this poll as proof that the Nation's farmers are in favor of his program of lowering support prices or eliminating them altogether.

In a speech earlier this month at Dallas, Tex., the Secretary referred to the Farm Journal poll and declared:

Yes; the voices of the American farmer calls in louder and louder tones for more freedom to act and less Government interference. If this is what farmers want—what are we waiting for—what is Congress waiting for? I repeat, we've made our recommendations. Why don't they act?

In short, Mr. President, Secretary Benson is using the Farm Journal survey in order to claim that farmers are behind the ruinous agricultural policies of the present administration. In the past 6 years the farm program of the present administration has driven many family-type farmers from the land and has forced many of the survivors of the Benson program to the brink of bankruptcy.

Ever since I saw the purported outcome of the Farm Journal poll, I have wondered just who the readers were who voted in it. I was especially curious about the results in my own State, where the magazine reported 62 percent against price supports.

As a Senator from an agricultural State and as one who has been vitally interested in farm matters during my 40 years of public service, I could hardly believe that this survey truly represented the sentiments of the dirt farmers of this Nation. I certainly found it impossible to believe that 62 percent of the farmers of my own State were opposed to all price supports, as the Farm Journal sought to suggest and as Mr. Benson would imply.

Mr. President, the very able commissioner of agriculture of my State, the Honorable Phil Campbell, was one of those who found it hard to believe that 62 percent of the farmers of Georgia were opposed to price supports. He decided to conduct a survey of his own.

In the April 8 edition of the Market Bulletin, a weekly publication of the Georgia Department of Agriculture, which goes to the farmers of my State, Mr. Campbell asked farmers to write him their feelings about Government price supports.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I might insert in the RECORD at this point in my remarks the statement by the commissioner of agriculture appearing in the April 8 edition of the Market Bulletin.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOW DO YOU FEEL ABOUT PRICE SUPPORTS

The current issue of one of the Nation's largest farm publications claims that 62 percent of Georgia's farmers want the Government to do away with all forms of price supports and leave the farmer on his own.

In order to set the record straight I want every farmer who reads this to sit down and write me a card or letter saying whether or not he thinks the Government should support farm prices.

If Georgia farmers want to do away with price supports I want to know it.

PHIL CAMPBELL,
Commissioner of Agriculture.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, in the current edition of the Georgia Market Bulletin, Commissioner Campbell reports the first returns from his survey. The Campbell poll shows that 62 percent of the farmers of our State are in favor of continued Government supports on the prices of farm commodities.

It is noteworthy that the result of Mr. Campbell's poll is exactly opposite that of the Farm Journal poll.

Mr. Campbell does not contend that his survey proves that 62 percent of all Georgia farmers are in favor of price supports. He wisely points out that straw polls at best are risky indicators of public opinions.

However, Mr. Campbell also points out that producers of most major farm commodities have for many years expressed their overwhelming approval of Government price supports in the various crop referendums. This, he maintains, is far more indicative of the true feelings of the bona fide farmers on price supports than his own poll or that of a farm magazine.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to include as a part of my remarks Commissioner Campbell's article in the latest edition of the Georgia Market Bulletin, reporting the results of his survey.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PRICE SUPPORT SURVEY RESULTS

Letters favoring price supports	628
Letters against price supports	374
Total	1,002

Listed above are the results of the letters sent in by readers of the Market Bulletin concerning Federal price supports for farm products.

This survey was conducted as a result of a national magazine's statement that 62 percent of Georgia's farmers were against a national support program for farm products.

In my opinion the survey conducted by the Market Bulletin on a voluntary basis of its readers is of little more significance than the survey conducted by the national farm magazine.

Surveys, at best, are poor indications as witnessed in the presidential election between President Truman and Governor Dewey and as witnessed also when a national magazine made a survey during one of President Roosevelt's earlier elections. The results were so much the reverse of the survey that the national magazine ceased publication immediately after the election.

Actually there is no need for a survey as to how farmers feel. Since a Federal price support law was passed and came into being, farmers have had to vote each year as to whether or not they favored continuance of the price support programs. Each year, for many years, farmers have voted for the price support program.

With this absolute evidence of farmers voting, why be so ridiculous as to attempt a survey which at best is of very little value.

PHIL CAMPBELL,
Commissioner of Agriculture.

THE FARM PROBLEM AND POSTAL RATES

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, a new high—or perhaps it was a new low—in unfair and slanted attacks on the Nation's farmers was reached in an editorial appearing in the April 20 issue of the Life magazine.

The implications in the editorial are that the farmers of this country are a worthless and shiftless group of people who are living on Government subsidies and handouts. Life wound up with the astounding conclusion that marginal farmers should be driven off their farms and relocated at Government expense. It does not state where these farmers are to be relocated, or what effect such relocation would have on the competition for jobs, which now has brought about the unemployment of 5 million.

In its assault on what it termed "farm subsidies," Life magazine conveniently overlooked the fact that virtually every other segment of the American economy enjoys some form of Government subsidy, assistance, or protection—either directly or indirectly. One such subsidy is the special low postal rates that most of the magazines and periodicals—including Life magazine—now enjoy.

As a matter of fact, the Post Office Department has estimated that Life magazine is being subsidized to the tune of $9,310,000 a year in postal rates.

This was the figure the Post Office gave to a committee of the House in 1957 in arguing for higher postal rates. The figure of $9,310,000 was the difference between the estimated cost of handling Life in the mails and the postal rate charged it.

Since that time, the postal rate for magazines has increased somewhat. So have salaries and operational costs of the Post Office Department. I am informed that the figure given as the mail subsidy for Life magazine in 1957 would not be substantially changed today.

Mr. President, the rank hypocrisy behind this unwarranted slur of American farmers has been exposed in an editorial appearing in the Carroll County Georgian, a newspaper published in one of the leading agricultural counties of my State. I ask unanimous consent to insert this editorial, entitled "Life Does It Again," at this point in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LIFE DOES IT AGAIN

Life magazine, the self-appointed voice of the discordant minorities which includes the Republican Party, has done it again. In its usual blast of contrived excitement, the magazine has sat in judgment of American farmers.

In a lengthy editorial in the April 20 issue of that magazine there is an all-out attack on the farmers for accepting Federal aid in the form of subsidies. The magazine comes up with the conclusion that marginal farmers should be forced off the farm and relocated at Government expense. They implied that all small farmers would fall into this group to be picked up at Government expense and put somewhere else. But that somewhere else is not located in the Life article.

The magazine wants the voters to get up in arms about Government help to farmers, broadly hinting that no one else benefits from Government funds. There is no mention of airlines, railroads, the special depletion allowance for oil companies, utilities, labor, many businesses, maritime services, and many, many others—most of whom just happen to advertise in Life magazine.

In fact, while no name has been given, a U.S. post office subsidy saves one national magazine $8,604,000 in postage during a single year. Which is considerably more than any one farmer gets in a long, long lifetime of toil.

It seems Life magazine will never learn which side their bread is buttered on. And, incidentally, there are two good farm products. If Life magazine finds that subsidies are such a terrible blow they could accomplish a neat savings for their country and salve their outraged conscience by actually paying what it really cost to mail their weekly publication.

If subsidies are going to be knocked off, let's get the foolish ones first. Since Life magazine does not make a contribution to the American way of life anywhere approaching the contributions of any farmer it seems that the logical subsidy to cut out first would be the favorable mailing privileges of Life magazine. It would be nice to see the Post Office Department breaking even.

It would also be nice for Life magazine to attempt to be what it tells its subscribers it already is, an impartial pictorial news magazine.

EDITORIAL SUPPORT FOR SENATE CLASSIFICATION AND PAY SYSTEM

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, on April 15, 1959, I submitted Senate Resolution 102, which would direct the Committee on Rules and Administration to formulate and submit to the Senate a classification and pay system for the empoyees of Senators. My proposal is designed to provide the public and the press with information as to salaries and duties of staff members of Senators while preserving desirable administrative flexibility.

I was happy to be joined in sponsoring this measure by the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. CARROLL], the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], and the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BUSH].

Recently the Oregon Journal, a daily newspaper in my home city of Portland, discussed Senate Resolution 102 in an editorial entitled "A Way To Allay Voter Suspicion." The Journal pointed out that there is nothing inherently wrong in Congressmen hiring relatives. The editors noted that the procedure provided for, under the terms of my resolution, would permit a determination of whether or not the employee of a Senator is doing work and carrying out responsibility commensurate with his salary. "If such is the case," the editorial states, "then it doesn't make any difference whether the employee is a relative or not."

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this excellent editorial published in the April 22, 1959, issue of the Oregon Journal be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A WAY TO ALLAY VOTER SUSPICION

Out of the flurry over congressional nepotism has come a proposal which would allay much of the criticism of the present system and still leave the Congressmen with plenty of leeway in hiring and salary setting of assistants and office help.

As we have said before, there is nothing inherently wrong in the hiring of relatives by Congressmen. The twin evils which have given nepotism a bad name are the hiring of relatives at high salaries for minor or nonexistent duties and the cloak of secrecy with which the whole process has been shrouded.

A bill introduced by Senator RICHARD NEUBERGER would seem to give the public a reasonable amount of information and at the same time allow flexibility. His proposal calls for classification of positions in a Senator's office with several grades within each classification. It would also make accessible to the press and public a list of those persons on a Senator's payroll with their grade, position, and salary range but not necessarily the exact pay level. Such a plan would discourage loading the payroll with relatives who do little or no work but at the same time, by not listing exact salaries, would prevent the interoffice bickering which sometimes accompanies general knowledge of these details.

Since a Congressman's office staff is paid with tax dollars, the public is entitled to know in general how the payroll allowance is being spent.

With a plan such as NEUBERGER'S, it would be possible to determine whether an employee was doing work and carrying responsibility commensurate with the salary. If such is the case, then it doesn't make any difference whether the employee is a relative or not.

A little candor of the type suggested in the Neuberger bill would do much to allay voter suspicion and abolish the idea that a public office holder's primary aim is to get his and all his family's muzzles in the public trough.

NEEDED: EARLY APPROVAL OF GREAT LAKES BASIN COMPACT

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I am happy to report that the Senate Judiciary Committee today approved Senate bill 548, to grant congressional consent to a compact among the States of the Great Lakes Basin.

The early enactment of this bill by the Congress will, I believe, better enable the States around the lakes to cooperate in preserving, developing, and better utilizing the commercial, industrial, water, recreational, residential, and other resources of the Great Lakes Basin.

Under the Constitution, of course, compacts of this nature require Federal approval.

Last year a similar bill passed the Senate; unfortunately, final approval was not attained in the House of Representatives.

Generally, the compact represents a constructive effort by the Lakes States, through better coordination and cooperation, to more effectively utilize their resources to work out problems that may develop among the States relating to their mutual interests and to plan more constructively for developmental programs for the future.

In view of the merits of this proposed legislation, I respectfully urge that Senate bill 548 be brought up as early as possible in the Senate so as to achieve favorable approval during this session of Congress.

THE SENATE'S FIGHTING TAXPAYER—SENATOR WILLIAMS OF DELAWARE

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. President, in the Chicago Sunday Tribune of April 26, 1959, there appeared an article, written by Willard Edwards, entitled "The Senate's Fighting Taxpayer"—referring to Senator JOHN WILLIAMS, of Delaware. This is a deserved tribute to the Delaware Senator for his courageous efforts to expose waste and inefficiency in the operations of the Federal Government.

I ask unanimous consent that the article be published in the body of the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SENATE'S FIGHTING TAXPAYER

(By Willard Edwards)

WASHINGTON.—They call him "the Whispering Terror." He's the shyest Member of the U.S. Senate but his soft voice on the Senate floor almost invariably creates fear and consternation in the Government bureaucracy.

Senator JOHN J. WILLIAMS, Republican from Delaware, a mild mannered, slender man with a hesitant smile, is an enigma to his colleagues. His almost inaudible speeches command an eager audience in a Chamber where the loud and bombastic too often prevail. He shuns publicity but gets headlines. He is a master of the understatement, delivered deadpan.

After exposing a particularly odious tax scandal involving a notorious racketeer, he remarked, almost apologetically:

"I do think the Government should prosecute gangsters for big income tax evasions just as vigorously as it prosecutes law abiding citizens for little ones."

For 12 years, WILLIAMS, representing one of the smallest constituencies in the Nation, has been unearthing venality, stupidity, inefficiency, and waste in the Federal structure. He works alone, patiently accumulating evidence, checking and doublechecking his facts. Finally, he appears on the Senate floor, waits his turn quietly, and then reads, in a low, soft voice, his carefully prepared statement.

In the huge Government buildings along Pennsylvania and Constitution Avenues, bureaucrats turn pale as the word is passed: "WILLIAMS has dug up another one."

They have reason for trepidation. During the Truman administration, WILLIAMS' one-man investigations of the Justice Department and the Internal Revenue Service started a series of grand-jury inquiries, trials, and convictions. Approximately 380 Government officials and employees were fired, resigned, or retired in a 3-year period. Sixty went to jail.

He has remained on the warpath during the Eisenhower administration. His more recent revelations have disclosed bureaucratic injustices and inequities rather than felonies but he remains an object of fear to Government officials. He was the first GOP Senator to take the floor to attack Presidential Assistant Sherman Adams.

"I can see no difference between mink coats and freezers under a Democratic administration and vicuna coats and oriental rugs under a Republican one," he murmured.

Nor does WILLIAMS withhold his fire when the activities of his own colleagues come under his scrutiny. Last year, a congressional pension plan was about to slip quietly and without debate through the Senate when it fell under the searching gaze of the Senator from Delaware.

Noting that this measure contained a remarkable proviso which would permit veteran legislators to retire with pensions higher than their salaries, WILLIAMS told his fellow Senators:

"This is a congressional gravy train which you don't have the guts to defend in public."

Senators are not accustomed to hear such caustic reprimands, delivered mildly as if in reproof of an erring child. In this instance, the main target was Senate Majority Leader LYNDON JOHNSON, Democrat, of Texas, a thinskinned autocrat who has been known to pour sarcasm and ridicule upon those who raised the slightest question concerning his legislative program.

JOHNSON flushed but made haste to pigeonhole the pension plan—permanently.

WILLIAMS has a gift for gentle irony which has gone largely unnoticed. After uncovering the fact that the wealthy owner of a famous money-winning race horse had collected a Government hay and feed subsidy, he remarked, innocently:

"I am sure that, as racing fans watched this horse win hundreds of thousands of dollars, they did not realize he was on Government relief."

Again, after relating his futile efforts to turn back to the U.S. Treasury $1,500 which had been allotted him for office stationery which he did not need, WILLIAMS observed:

"I was advised to buy the stationery, call a truck, and send it to the city dump. In that way, the Government would be rid of the money and I wouldn't have to pay an income tax on it."

Gazing reflectively at the ceiling, he summed up the incident:

"Everybody but the taxpayers would be happy."

Once he was accused of violating the law by making public a document stamped "secret," which exposed a Government employee's crookedness.

"I don't know if I've violated the law," he told the Senate, "but I always heard it was a crime to conceal a crime."

Frank Costello, the New York racketeer, was one of WILLIAMS' early targets. Costello evaded jail for years and at one point obtained a last-minute stay from Supreme Court Justice William O. Douglas. WILLIAMS was so indignant that he could almost be heard in the galleries.

"If this were an ordinary citizen, he would have been in the Federal penitentiary years ago," he remarked. "It is long past the time when the courts should stop pussyfooting around with this racketeer and remember that 170 million law-abiding Americans have some rights as well as these gangsters."

When WILLIAMS was introduced at the Republican convention in Chicago in 1952 as the Senator who had singlehandedly uncovered tax scandals of the Truman administration, he received an ovation. He bowed his head in embarrassed acknowledgment but did not seize the opportunity to make a speech.

At one point in his investigations, there were highly authentic reports that he had received threats from gangster sources.

"I can't understand what started such rumors," was his only comment. Shortly thereafter, he revealed settlement of big delinquent tax claims for small amounts by several members of the Capone gang.

WILLIAMS was born on a farm near Bayard, Del., 54 years ago, one of 11 children. After finishing high school, he went to work for a chicken feed firm. By the time he was 40, he and his brother were among the State's big chicken farmers.

If a crooked Government employee in 1946 had not pocketed certain income-tax payments, among them one by Chicken Farmer WILLIAMS, the Senate would have lost an outstanding figure and the taxpayers many millions of dollars.

Farmer WILLIAMS had little interest in politics but he was outraged when he found himself listed as a delinquent taxpayer. Since he had canceled checks to prove his payment, he began an investigation, discovering that an Internal Revenue Bureau worker had embezzled his money and that of other taxpayers. Although this embezzlement was known to Bureau officials, the thief was still on the payroll.

"Something ought to be done about this," WILLIAMS confided to his neighbors. He promptly ran for the Senate against a veteran Democratic New Dealer, beat him handily, and came to Washington in 1947, determined to obtain more information on the Tax Bureau.

Doggedly, he, his wife, and his secretary waded through Government reports, corporation records, bank records, official documents, and other source material. With meticulous care, he built up his case. It wasn't until May 1951, that he made his first Senate speech on the Revenue Bureau's operations but it rocked the administration. His exposure snowballed as tipsters in Federal bureaus fed him more information.

WILLIAMS has not been concerned solely with taxes and scandals. He has fought subsidies for farmers, miners, and other groups, steadfastly refusing to take Government money for his own farms from soil conservation, soil bank, or other programs. His disclosures have led to the tightening up of many laws.

WILLIAM'S strength is that he retains the viewpoint of the man whom cartoonists like to picture as the harassed and befuddled little individual labeled "U.S. Taxpayer." He hates waste or misuse of taxpayer money, whether it be one dollar or a million, whether it is because of corruption, immorality, or stupidity in high or low places.

He was one of the few Republican Senators to breast the Democratic landslide last November, winning reelection to a third 6-year term. One voter, questioned by a reporter, summed up the majority sentiment in his State simply:

"A vote against WILLIAMS would be like a vote for dishonesty."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER TO DISPENSE WITH CALL OF CALENDAR

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the call of the calendar may be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, the policy committee will meet today at lunch to consider all the bills on the calendar and will receive a report of the legislative review committee. At a later time I hope to be able to submit to the Senate a list of the bills which have been cleared for action.

It is expected that the supplemental appropriation bill will be called up for discussion at an early time after the Senate has disposed of the nomination of Mrs. Luce.

I also anticipate that the railroad retirement bill will be called up while the senior Senator from Oregon is on the floor, I should like to ask him if the hearings and report on the railroad retirement bill are available.

Mr. MORSE. The hearings, I am certain, are available. I filed the report on Friday. It should be available, although I myself have not seen it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Are there minority views?

Mr. MORSE. They also were filed on Friday.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. What was the vote in the committee?

Mr. MORSE. Fourteen Senators voted for the bill, and one Senator voted "present." The Senator who voted present, however, asked permission to file minority views if he cared to, and he has filed minority views.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Would the Senator from Oregon wish to speculate on how long that bill will occupy the attention of the Senate?

Mr. MORSE. I feel sure that I will not take more than 30 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I have found the Senator from Oregon to be a very flexible and versatile man. He may take as long or as little time as he feels the circumstances justify. I wish all Senators to be on notice that if the hearings and report are available, we will try to have the railroad retirement bill called up promptly.

I understand that the discussion on the nomination of Mrs. Luce to be Ambassador to Brazil will take 2 hours or more. The nomination will be followed by the supplemental appropriation bill. It is hoped that we may complete action on that bill today and perhaps take up the railroad retirement bill tomorrow. After we see what progress we make today, I shall make a detailed announcement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no further morning business, morning business is closed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider executive business.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES

Mrs. SMITH. Mr. President, from the Committee on Armed Services, I report favorably 3,596 nominations in the Army, Navy, and Air Force in the grade of major and below. Included in this group are approximately 1,000 graduates of the Military, Naval, and Air Force Academies.

Since these names have already appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, to save the expense of printing on the Executive Calendar, I ask unanimous consent that they be ordered to lie on the Vice President's desk for the information of any Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations will lie on the desk, as requested by the Senator from Maine.

The nominations are as follows:

LeRoy Henry, and sundry other persons, for appointment in the Regular Air Force;

Peter G. Abdalla, and sundry other midshipmen (Naval Academy), for appointment as ensigns in the Navy; and Jerry M. Abbott, and sundry other officers, for promotion in the Regular Army of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further reports of committees, the nomination on the Executive Calendar will be stated.

DIPLOMATIC AND FOREIGN SERVICE

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Mrs. Clare Boothe Luce, of Connecticut, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to Brazil.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the majority leader yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TALMADGE in the chair). Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I am glad to yield to the distinguished minority leader.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, let me say that I understand that the distinguished Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] wishes to have a yea-and-nay vote taken on the question of confirmation of the nomination. I think that is entirely proper. Speaking for myself, we on this side of the aisle will make every effort to see to it that a yea-and-nay vote is taken on the question of confirmation of the nomination.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I wish both the majority leader and the minority leader to know that I appreciate this courtesy.

In my 15 years in the Senate, whenever any Senator has asked me to help obtain a yea-and-nay vote, I never have failed to do so, and I never will. Sometimes it is of great importance to those concerned to have a yea-and-nay vote taken; and I have always been glad to cooperate in that connection.

In regard to this matter, I appreciate very much the cooperation in regard to having a yea-and-nay vote taken.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, the Senator from Oregon may be sure that a yea-and-nay vote will be taken.

Mr. MORSE. I thank the Senator from Texas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination of Mrs. Clare Boothe Luce to be Ambassador to Brazil?

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, we proceed now to consider the nomination by the President of Mrs. Clare Boothe Luce to represent our Nation as Ambassador to Brazil.

I rise to speak in opposition to the confirmation of the nomination.

Mr. President, my speech will be of some length. In the interest of continuity, I shall not yield until I have finished my formal remarks. Thereafter, I shall be happy to answer questions in regard to any of my formal remarks or any comment I may make.

Mr. President, my opposition to confirmation of the nomination of Mrs. Luce involves some very serious charges as to her competency or lack of competency. I intend to make that formal record first—as I would as a lawyer who was pleading a case before the bar of justice.

After I have made my argument in chief, I shall be happy to answer questions.

Mr. President, I speak as a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, and as chairman of its Subcommittee on Latin American Affairs. In my capacity as chairman of the Subcommittee on Latin American Affairs, I assure the Senate that my inclination is, and always will be, to resolve all doubt, whenever possible, in support of a Presidential nomination for an ambassadorship to a Latin American country.

It is only because I think this nomination is so completely unjustified and is so much against the best interests of my country in respect to our relations with Latin America that I consider it my duty to make this record against confirmation of the nomination of Mrs. Luce.

Mr. President, the record will show that one of the first major questions which I had to consider as a new Senator, back in 1945, involved the question of the confirmation of the nomination of Henry Wallace to be Secretary of Commerce. Because of the feelings which then existed within the Senate, there were delays of considerable length in connection with the consideration of the Wallace nomination. Those delays gave me an opportunity to engage in research and study in regard to all nomination confirmation controversies in the history of the Senate of which there is any written record. I directed that study; and I, myself, did a great deal of the research. I was greatly assisted by the Library of Congress and by my own legislative assistant at the time.

That research was very helpful to me, and when a later nomination, that of Robert Hannegan to be Postmaster General, also proved to be controversial, I spoke at great length on the historic criteria which I think the records show Congress has historically followed in exercising its constitutional duties, under the advice-and-consent clause of the Constitution, in regard to Presidential nominations, ambassadorial and others.

In order to refresh the recollection of my colleagues—because, in my judgment, so much of that study is likewise applicable to the question of confirmation of the nomination of Mrs. Luce—I wish to point out that the study shows that the following are the criteria which, over the decades, the Senate has followed:

First, character and mental soundness. Does the nominee to a position which calls for the exercise of the advice-and-consent power of the Senate have the character and mentality which would justify confirmation of the nomination by the Senate?

As I said during the debate in 1945, and during nomination confirmation debates in the Senate since then, this does not mean that the President must nominate to each position for which he has the Executive right to nominate a candidate, someone who meets the individual views of individual Members of the Senate in regard to character qualification. Instead, the history of such matters shows quite clearly that the Senate has considered the character criterion from the standpoint of whether the nominee has a public record, a known record, of conduct and behavior so bad that an individual Senator would have to admit to himself that the appointment of a person of that type would be a reflection upon the Government of the United States.

I believe it was in 1945, or in one of the subsequent debates during which I discussed the character criterion, that, in order to illustrate its importance and its application, I stated that I believed all of us could take for granted that if a President nominated to a high post a convicted felon or a person notoriously known as a libertine or a person who was publicly known to be so devoid of the character qualifications of social morality and good conduct that we could say that that person really was not fit to be nominated to the position, then, under the advice-and-consent clause of the Constitution, that person should be found wanting under the first criterion I have mentioned.

The second criterion, Mr. President, is that the Senate, by its action over the decades, has demonstrated that it looks to the question of whether the nominee is patriotic, in the sense that there is no room for doubt or question as to the nominee's loyalty to our constitutional form of government. In other words, if one were nominated who favored any form of totalitarianism—Communist or Fascist or Monarchist—if a President should ever make the mistake of nominating one who could not satisfy the Senate that he or she was a loyal American, believing in our system of constitutional, representative government, then such a person should certainly not receive the favorable advice and consent of the Senate in support of the nomination.

Mr. President, no one would dispute the desirability of the requirement of the criterion of loyalty to our form of government. The difficulty, as history shows, is in its application, because honest men can disagree as to the facts which support or fail to support any challenge to one's qualifications under this criterion.

The third criterion which I think history clearly shows the Senate has followed over the decades, in exercising its advice and consent power under the Constitution, has been the criterion of freedom from a conflict of interests. A nominee must have a record that shows he has no special economic interest in the position; that his appointment to the position will not serve his personal, selfish economic interests, and that he is a person who could not possibly seek, to the detriment of the public interest, to do damage to the United States by letting his economic connections influence his representation of the people of the country in the particular post to which he is appointed, be it in connection with the administration of domestic government or in connection with an ambassadorial office.

The fourth criterion the Senate has followed in the history of our country, under the advice-and-consent clause, is the criterion of competence. This criterion does not mean, Mr. President, that we must be satisfied as Senators that the person nominated by the President is the most able person who could be selected, and the most competent person who could be selected; but it means that we as Senators must be satisfied that the person has what we all know is the essentiality of the ability and competency to perform the work of the particular office, to the credit of the public interest of the American people.

Mr. President, speaking of the criterion of competency, I think it should be pointed out for the record, as it has been heretofore in our discussions of confirmations, that the Senate is not an appointing body. The power of appointment, under the Constitution of the United States, is given to the President, and the Senate is endowed with the power of advice and consent. As we lawyers say, the advice and consent clause of the Constitution comprises language of limitation. It is language which limits or checks the power of appointment, but it does not grant the power of appointment to the Senate.

This is a very important point, Mr. President, with regard to the application of the advice and consent clause, because if the constitutional fathers had intended a coequal power with the Executive, it would have been very easy to have said so. They could have provided that appointment should be made by the President and the Senate. But they made it very clear that the appointment in the first instance shall be made by the President, subject to this precious power of check known as the advice and consent clause.

Now, Mr. President, when words of limitation are used, as the constitutional fathers used them in the Constitution with respect to the advice and consent clause, we lawyers point out that words of limitation raise a presumption—it is a rebuttable presumption, not a conclusive one—in favor of the President's nomination, unless it can be shown that the nomination runs afoul of one of these historic criteria.

It has always been my position in every confirmation debate in which I have engaged during my 15 years in the Senate—it is my position today—that the presumption is in favor of the President. But, as I have said, it is a rebuttable presumption, and not a conclusive one. I respectfully submit that some of the statements some of my colleagues have made in regard to the Luce nomination would seem to imply that it is a conclusive presumption; that really the consideration of a nomination before the Senate should be looked upon as a mere formality; that the President should be allowed to appoint whomever he wants, and that the presumption should not only be in favor of the President, but that it should be conclusive.

Of course, Mr. President, that position implies there is not an advice and consent clause in the Constitution. But the clause is in the Constitution. We cannot wish it away. We have to act under it. We have to consider each nomination on the basis of questions which may be raised concerning the nomination when any Senator, carrying out what he considers to be his conscientious duty of representing the people of the State from which he comes, raises serious questions with regard to a nomination, as I do today in connection with the nomination of Mrs. Luce.

I have made these preliminary introductory remarks, Mr. President, because I want the RECORD to show once again the very consistent position I have taken over the years in regard to these criteria.

NOMINEE MISJUDGES REASONS FOR INQUIRY

Mr. President, last weekend there was filed with the Senate Foreign Relations Committee by Mrs. Clare Boothe Luce a supplementary statement concerning her nomination to be Ambassador to Brazil.

It purports to be a response to me for the questions I asked of her in the Foreign Relations Committee, and a documentation of a 1944 campaign statement Mrs. Luce made that—and I quote her—President Roosevelt was "the only American President who ever lied us into a war because he did not have the political courage to lead us into it."

Mrs. Luce's supplementary statement is neither a documentation of that 1944 statement of hers, nor is it a remotely accurate statement of the reason why I pursued the line of questioning I did at the hearing.

I ask unanimous consent to have Mrs. Luce's written statement printed at this point in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. President, Senators will find the statement as a supplement to Mrs. Luce's testimony, starting on page 27 of the committee hearings of April 15, 1959.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I am grateful for this opportunity, generously afforded me, to answer in greater detail some of the questions propounded yesterday (April 15, 1959) and to bring to the public attention my position on certain vital issues.

First of all, I do believe that if the principle, acted upon yesterday, was to become a permanent policy of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, it would ultimately result in severe injury to our national interests abroad and a diminution in the quality of the appointees that the committee passes upon. That principle, the principle of political conformity, was clearly enunciated by Senator WAYNE MORSE who raised serious objections to statements made by me during the heat of political campaigns. He described these statements as being "subversive," "entirely uncalled for comment," and said that on the basis of these statements "I just do not think she is qualified to be in a diplomatic position."

One of the statements to which Senator MORSE referred, and the one which occupied a large part of my testimony, was a statement I made on October 11, 1944, less than a month before the election, in which I accused President Roosevelt of being less than honest and truthful in his dealings with the American people between September 3, 1939, and December 7, 1941. I admitted yesterday that the language used in 1944 was "in my view very intemperate, and would not have been used by me if I had the experience which I now have." I offered an apology for using such language, even during the excitement of a political campaign. However, the Senator from Oregon was not willing merely to accept my apology for intemperate language, but insisted that I, there and then, immediately document the substance of the truth in the statement. Since I had supposed that the questions to be asked would deal largely with Brazilian affairs and my qualifications for the position to which I have been nominated by President Eisenhower, I was not prepared to immediately document statements of my political beliefs made 15 years ago. Not being a trained historian and a specialist in 20th century American political history, I was not able quickly to cite volume, author, and page references. However, since yesterday I have found my thesis adumbrated in great detail in a volume entitled, "President Roosevelt and the Coming of World War II," by one of the foremost American historians, Charles A. Beard. Further documentation of my statement can be found in chapter VIII of Robert Sherwood's excellent dual biography "Roosevelt and Hopkins." This chapter deals with the third-term campaign. Henry L. Stimson, Secretary of War, 1940–45, wrote in his memoir, "On Active Service in Peace and War":

"To Stimson it always seemed that the President directed his arguments altogether too much toward his vocal but small isolationist opposition, and not toward the people as a whole. By his continuous assertion that war was not a likely result of his policy, he permitted the American people to think themselves into a self-contradictory frame of mind. As Stimson constantly pointed at the time, only the President could take the lead, in a warlike policy. Only he had the right and duty to lead his people in this issue" (page 375).

Further evidence to support the core of my statement can be found in Cordell Hull's, "The Memoirs of Cordell Hull" (vols. 1 and 2), Edgar Robinson's "The Roosevelt Leadership, 1933–45," and Basil Rauch's "Roosevelt: From Munich to Pearl Harbor."

I do hope that the Senator from Oregon finds these authorities satisfactory and no longer considers my statement subversive.

The other political statement I made was again made in the midst of a political campaign when I, holding no public office and speaking only as a private citizen, said, former President Truman had been the handpicked candidate of certain municipal political leaders. Partly on the basis of this statement, Senator MORSE declared, "I just do not think she is qualified to be in a diplomatic position."

Strict conformity to the political tenets of the majority party is hardly a sound basis on which to judge the qualifications of any person for a diplomatic position. Once admit the validity of this principle in practice and the national interest of the United States would be severely imperiled. Once concede that political vengeance is a worthy motive to formulate questions, and we will be that much closer to the Orwellian state. Once allow such actions to go unnoticed and unanswered and we will be shirking our duty as Americans by an act of omission. For these reasons I have prepared this statement.

CLARE BOOTHE LUCE.

APRIL 16, 1959.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, first, Mrs. Luce is absolutely and completely wrong when she states that the senior Senator from Oregon applied what she calls a "principle of political conformity" in raising objections to her nomination. "Strict conformity," says Mrs. Luce, "to the political tenets of the majority party is hardly a sound basis on which to judge the qualifications of any person for a diplomatic position. Once admit the validity of this principle in practice and the national interest of the United States would be severely imperiled. Once concede that political vengeance is a worthy motive to formulate questions, and we will be that much closer to the Orwellian state."

So says Mrs. Luce. I can only say of her statement, if she thinks that was the reason for my questions she is even less perceptive and less qualified for the job than I thought.

Her responses to the committee and this written statement she has subsequently filed indicate conclusively to me that Mrs. Luce is one more example of the Eisenhower administration's practice of paying off political "hacks" with ambassadorial appointments. That is the one principle that emerges time after time as the Senate considers the appointments to ambassadorships which come to us from the White House. The issue this nomination presents to the Senate is whether we shall permit the Eisenhower administration to continue its practice of using ambassadorial posts to reward politicians. It is my conviction that the Senate has an obligation to impose a higher standard than that when we are asked to confirm nominations.

DUTIES OF THE SENATE IN CONSIDERING NOMINATIONS

The questions asked of Mrs. Luce in committee by myself, the committee chairman, Mr. FULBRIGHT, and other Senators, were intended to help us find out her qualifications for the job for which she was nominated. Section 2 of article II of the Constitution provides that the President "shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls."

Note that this advice and consent power of the Senate occurs in the Constitution in article II, the article which outlines and describes the executive powers of our National Government. It was not placed in article I, which confers and describes the legislative powers.

In considering the nomination of Mrs. Luce, and of every other person whose nomination requires confirmation by the Senate, we are acting under our executive powers conferred upon the Senate by the Constitution. In confirming ambassadors, we are sharing with the President the responsibility for America's representation abroad.

Of this arrangement in the Constitution, Hamilton had this to say in The Federalist, No. 76:

> It is not easy to conceive a plan better calculated than this to promote a judicious choice of men for filling the offices of the Union; and it will not need proof, that on this point must essentially depend the character of its administration.

And a few sentences later:

> To what purpose then require the cooperation of the Senate? I answer, that the necessity of their concurrence would have a powerful, though in general, a silent operation. It would be an excellent check upon a spirit of favoritism in the President, and would tend greatly to prevent the appointment of unfit characters from state prejudice, from family connection, from personal attachment, or from a view to popularity * * *.
> He would be both ashamed and afraid to bring forward, for the most distinguished or lucrative stations, candidates who had no other merit than that of coming from the same State to which he particularly belonged, or of being in some way or other personally allied to him, or of possessing the necessary insignificance and pliancy to render them the obsequious instruments of his pleasure.

Hamilton did not specifically mention persons with no other merit than their political affiliation, but that undoubtedly is included in his list by implication.

There is nothing here about the Senate rubber stamping Executive appointments. On the contrary, ascribing to the Senate executive duties along with the President for filling these positions, also makes the Senate, along with the President, responsible for the adequacy of the persons chosen.

If a poor nomination is made, and is confirmed by the Senate, we are as much disgraced for approving it as the President is for making the nomination in the first place.

This power was clearly conferred upon the Senate to improve the selection of men and women for official posts. It is my contention that over the years, the Senate has not been fulfilling that constitutional purpose. We were not meant to approve anything sent to us by way of nomination for ambassador or any other office; we were meant to exercise a check upon the President so that capable and responsible people would be chosen.

WHAT SHOULD BE EXPECTED OF AN AMBASSADOR?

That brings me to the question of what we should expect of the people who represent the United States overseas. Of course, historically, an ambassador was the personal representative of one head of state to another head of state.

In an article entitled "Instant Diplomacy and the New Diplomats" which appeared in the Columbia University Forum, volume II, No. 1, fall 1958, Dana Adams Schmidt writes about the change over the centuries in the role of the ambassador. Mr. Schmidt is well known as the Washington diplomatic correspondent for the New York Times.

Mr. Schmidt points out that in ancient times princes of one country communicated with princes of other countries by use of messengers. By the 13th and 14th centuries, these messengers were expected to bring back observations and judgments of events in the countries they had visited.

The rules and customs of this growing diplomatic corps became increasingly complex.

Ambassadors—

Says Mr. Schmidt—

> theoretically the personal representatives of their sovereigns, were expected to put on a show of pomp and generosity, to live well and to entertain lavishly.

But with the advent of modern communication, the role of the ambassador began to change. We moved into an era of what Schmidt calls popular diplomacy, in which transmitting views and information directly to large populations became a major object of the great powers.

Mr. Schmidt concludes that today we need a new kind of diplomat; the traditional diplomat will no longer do.

> In the old days American diplomats were drawn from a particular social stratum and educated in a restricted number of institutions. When they went abroad, they naturally sought out persons like themselves. They talked with government officials and moved among the ruling classes. But their contacts usually went no further. * * *
> The ambassador of today must of course still have the broadest possible knowledge and exquisite tact—

I stress that a modern diplomat must still have exquisite tact as a qualification, according to this well recognized authority—> but he must work with a team of specialists of a kind quite unknown to the old diplomacy. These specialists must be able to examine with professional skill the most varied facets of a foreign country's life and must of course understand the equivalent facts of American life. * * *

> The ambassador and his secretaries must also keep in touch with the opposition as well as the ruling party. They must, in other words, immerse themselves in the country's life.

As I have pointed out, Mrs. Luce's extreme partisanship in Italy extended not only to attempting to influence the outcome of an election but to an expression of great displeasure when a man she opposed was elected President of Italy.

Mr. Schmidt describes the new diplomat as one who must be a specialist in several areas of social adeptness. But also he "must be articulate, quick in his responses, sensitive not only to the atmosphere at the Foreign Office but also in the street. He must convey to his government not mere information but intelligence in the highest sense, synthesizing the work of other specialists in a form communicable to the Members of Congress and to the public by the extraordinary devices of communication which loom at his disposal. More than ever, he will have to be something like a complete public man."

The age of communications is such that an ambassador can no longer be viewed as the representative only of a head of state. All over the world, we Americans are judged by our Ambassadors. We are even judged by the lesser diplomatic officials, the foreign aid and military officers, and even our tourists in other lands. The currently popular book, The Ugly American may be a somewhat overdrawn picture of the American image abroad, but we know there is enough truth in it to make us uneasy.

An international expert on the history of diplomacy, Harold Nicolson, has stated that the most important qualification for a diplomat is honesty and reliability.

I am satisfied to use that standard in judging the nomination before us. I suggest it is the standard that should be used by the Senate—Is she honest? Is she reliable? I am satisfied that Mrs. Luce does not meet either criterion.

When I speak of honesty here I am not speaking of monetary honesty, but of honesty of intellect. After all, the test of an individual's honesty is to be found in the answer to the question: Is he intellectually honest? Does he have that intellectual integrity which justifies us in saying, "Here is a moral man—on the basis of morality, integrity, and intellectual honesty."

In my judgment Mrs. Luce is simply not competent for this assignment, on her record, when weighed against these standards.

A good ambassador—such as our colleague, Senator COOPER—makes friends for America, not just for the President. A poor ambassador arouses animosities against America, not just against Mr. Eisenhower.

We Senators, as I have shown, share the executive responsibility for selection and appointment of ambassadors. A poor ambassador reflects upon our judgment, just as a poor ambassador reflects upon the American people.

We cannot slough off the advice-and-consent duty that is ours by saying, "Oh, we should let the President have whomever he wants. This is really his function." I say to my colleagues, read the Constitution. It is our function, too.

SENATE ACTION WILL BE WIDELY NOTED

Mr. President, the vote on the confirmation of this nomination will be noted throughout the world. It is not merely a vote on an ordinary diplomatic appointment. It will be followed around the world for the following reasons:

First. It will be watched in the entire diplomatic service to see whether blatant politics is put ahead of career service.

Second. It will be watched around the world to see whether the memory of a great President of the United States who led this country in peace as well as war is to be smudged by confirming his most vitriolic critic who falsely accused him of lying us into war.

Third. It will be watched in Latin America to see whether the U.S. Government officially confirms the report published in Time magazine quoting a State Department official that Bolivia should be carved up among its neighbors. This was the report which caused grave riots in Bolivia and special precautions to guard some 700 American citizens there.

Fourth. And it will be watched in this country as well as abroad to see whether the Senate of the United States bows to the intertwining of Henry Luce policies and Dwight D. Eisenhower policies which have so influenced history in Asia, Latin America, and Europe during the past 6 years.

I should like to speak on these four points. I speak as a member of the Foreign Relations Committee and as the chairman of the Subcommittee on Latin American Affairs, as I indicated in my introductory remarks. It is to one of the most important Latin America countries—Brazil—that great and traditional friend of the United States, to which Mrs. Luce has been appointed as Ambassador.

I recognize the unpopularity of being critical of a lady.

I yield to no other Member of the Senate in my devotion to that pattern of behavior known as chivalry; but this issue has nothing to do with chivalry. When we come to the question of the selection of an ambassador sex has nothing to do with it. My job is that of impersonal evaluation of a nominee, irrespective of the nominee's sex. Naturally I do not find it pleasant to be critical of a lady. I am the sponsor, and have been for a good many years, of proposed legislation in the Senate—and I seem to have great difficulty in even getting hearings on it—to give equal rights to women in the field of economic opportunity by assuring them equal pay for equal work. That has nothing to do with any matter of chivalry. It has to do with plain justice. It has to do with what I consider to be the trust which I owe to the position I have the honor to occupy.

That should dispel any notion lurking in the mind of anyone that I find it at all pleasant to oppose this nomination. It is my duty to follow where the facts lead. Therefore, Mr. President, I intend to express my views as to the incompetency of this nominee as a nominee, irrespective of her sex.

I realize that I am speaking against the nomination of a lady who is not only charming but who has also behind her the power of the Time, Life, Fortune empire.

In the course of my remarks I shall take the position that I do not believe we can separate the nominee from her consort, who accompanies her much of the time. Neither do I believe that we can separate the nominee from her relationship to Time, Life, and Fortune. I do not believe we can separate the nominee from the record of the Time, Life, Fortune journalistic-television empire in exercising great influence on American foreign policy during the past 6 years, to the detriment, in my judgment, of the foreign policy of the United States. It is an empire which has molded public opinion and frequently slanted the news for many years.

I have in mind an incident reported in Time magazine about which I know from my being involved in the operative facts of the incident, and I have been at a loss to find any connection between the story as it appeared in Time magazine and the facts. That is why on a previous occasion in debate on the floor of the Senate I have referred—and I am perfectly willing to repeat the statement today—to the Luce publications as "loose" publications. I have never been one to be the slightest degree weak in the knees in opposing journalistic practices in this country which I believe are not in the public interest.

At another time in debate I said—and I will repeat it today—that I thought the Luce publications—and we can spell the name any way we wish—have done a better coverup job for Dwight D. Eisenhower than Pravda has done for Khrushchev. That is the kind of journalistic empire with which we are dealing, in my opinion. We cannot separate this nominee from it no matter how hard we try. We cannot separate this nominee from her consort. We cannot separate this nominee from the policies of Time, Life, and Fortune.

Mr. Luce, as was brought out in the committee hearings, spent about half the time with her in Italy. That I believe was to the detriment of the foreign policy of the United States. She testified that he would spend about 6 months of the year with her in Brazil. I would not have it otherwise. That is fundamental to the marital relation. However, I will not refuse to take account of the fact that that marital relation, in my judgment, must be considered as we ponder the effects of the nomination upon the policies of the United States in Brazil. Thus, I say that this Luce empire has molded public opinion and frequently has slanted the news for many years. That is undeniable.

It is beyond question the No. 1 spokesman of the Eisenhower administration, as I shall develop later. It has great power to distort the truth and it has shamelessly done so.

Not only do these magazines enjoy postal privileges from this administration which permit Life to be the largest circulating magazine in the world, but they have also received great largesse from this administration in the form of television stations. The Time-Life empire owns stations in Salt Lake City, Utah; Denver, Colo.; Minneapolis, Minn.; and Grand Rapids, Mich. This bloc of TV stations in themselves can tell a network what national programs to throw off the air. They are key stations which the networks must have in key cities.

EFFECT OF THIS APPOINTMENT ON LATIN AMERICA

Next, let me discuss the effect upon Latin America if the Senate of the United States confirms Mrs. Luce as Ambassador to Brazil. I am sure that all Senators recall the riots in La Paz, Bolivia, following publication by Time magazine of the statement attributed to a State Department official to the effect that the only hope for Bolivia was to carve it up among its neighbors. Though the effect of that statement was disastrous, it could not at that time be linked with the official policy of the United States. The statement was, of course, denied. But it remains a fact that Bolivia geographically is divided into two parts. One is the alto plain about 12,000 feet high. The other is the lowlands which are drained by rivers flowing into Brazil and which geographically are almost a part of Brazil. The city of Santa Cruz, the most prosperous city in these lowlands, is just a stone's throw from the Brazilian border.

The plateau of Bolivia is so high, so rocky, and so cold that it is largely unproductive agriculturally. It is from the lowlands that Bolivia derives its sugar and most of its other agricultural production. Yet history has shown that this area contiguous to Brazil has been eyed somewhat covetously in the past by Brazil, which is one reason for the sensitiveness of the Bolivian people when Time magazine carried a purported quotation suggesting that its country be partitioned. This suggestion has been made before in the past. The alto plain of Bolivia is quite similar to that of Peru and in the past Bolivia's neighbors have not hesitated to cast inquisitive glances toward her territory.

I submit that confirmation of the nomination of Mrs. Luce, who so intimately is connected with Time magazine, and which carried exclusively the story of her having been poisoned by the ceiling in the American Embassy at Rome, would confirm in the minds of many Latin Americans—certainly Bolivians—the already present deep suspicion that Time magazine was speaking for more than itself when it suggested once again that Bolivia be partitioned.

With regard to the alleged poisoning from plaster flakes which fell off her bedroom ceiling in Rome, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point an article published in the Washington Post of Friday, July 20, 1956, entitled "Doctor Doubts Paint Poisoning Is Cause of Mrs. Luce's Illness."

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, will the Senator explain what the article says?

Mr. MORSE. I shall be very glad to read it. I was seeking to save time. I will be very glad to explain it as I read it.

Mr. President, this is an article which was published in the Washington Post of Friday, July 20, 1956. It bears on the remarkable explanation which was given by Time magazine for Mrs. Luce's resignation from her post in Rome—an explanation which a large body of opinion considers to be fantastic. I share that point of view. It is an exceedingly fantastic explanation. However, I am glad to read the article. It says:

Ambassador Clare Booth Luce's physician yesterday said her latest illness may have had no connection whatever with poison paint specks that allegedly dropped from her bedroom ceiling.

Dr. Milton Rosenbluth said the ailments for which he treated Mrs. Luce in New York 2 months ago were enteritis and iron-deficiency anemia.

Their relation—if any—to traces of arsenate of lead detected in a specimen is "very unclear," he said, because the suspected ceiling of her Rome Embassy bedroom had been covered and repainted 13 months earlier.

I understand the record is perfectly clear that arsenate of lead was not used in the paint. I continue to read from the article:

Dr. Rosenbluth was interviewed by telephone in New York.

(In Rome, the architect who prepared the villa for Mrs. Luce when she arrived 3 years ago said today the painted ceiling that reportedly poisoned her had not been touched in 40 or 50 years, Reuters reported.

Paolo d'Anna, an American of Italian origin who has lived in Rome for many years, said he decorated the villa for Mrs. Luce just before she arrived in Rome. He added: "But the ceiling was not touched. As far as I know, the ceiling has not been touched for the past 40 or 50 years.")

Time magazine reported "a deadly fallout" of the poison caused the long series of illnesses that have beset Mrs. Luce since she became Ambassador to Italy more than 3 years ago. The Ambassador's husband, Henry R. Luce, is editor-in-chief of the publication.

The magazine said a second investigation uncovered "a high content" of arsenate of lead from painted roses in the ceiling of her 17th century embassy residence in Rome.

"For 20 months it said, Ambassador Luce had been breathing arsenated fumes, had been eating food and drinking coffee powdered day after day with the deadly white dust."

Dr. Rosenbluth said it was far from certain her latest illnesses were "arsenic-induced infection," as the magazine reported.

"Whatever she had in 1954 I would regard as cured," he said. "Her latest illness seemed to be related to some liver infection she had in Italy.

"Specifically, what she had now was not poisoning."

He said it is possible the earlier illness could have so debilitated her to the point where she was more susceptible to the later ailment, but that even this is uncertain.

Time magazine had no immediate comment on Dr. Rosenbluth's remarks.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President——

Mr. MORSE. I have not yielded to the Senator from Connecticut. I withdraw my request that the article be printed because I have now read it in its entirety.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. No. I explained at the beginning of my speech that I would continue until my formal remarks were concluded, but that then I would remain on the floor of the Senate so long as any Senator wished to question me about my remarks.

Assuming that the next request of the Senator from Connecticut will be the same as his first, I shall read an article concerning the matter of alleged arsenate of lead poisoning, which was published in the New York Times of July 18, 1956.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I shall not object to his asking unanimous consent to have the article printed in the RECORD, now that I know what it is. But if the Senator wishes to read it, of course I have no objection.

Mr. MORSE. I always try to save time, as the Senator knows. He and I may disagree on many issues, but he has never found me unwilling to try to accommodate the Senate by saving time, when I can feel that I do not damage my record thereby.

So, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD an article entitled "Story of Mrs. Luce's Poisoning in Rome Villa Amazes Italians," published in the New York Times of July 16, 1956.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STORY OF MRS. LUCE'S POISONING IN ROME VILLA AMAZES ITALIANS—HEALTH OFFICIALS SAY THEY KNOW OF NO RECENT CASES OF ILLNESS FROM USE OF ARSENIC IN ROOM PAINTING

ROME, July 17.—The report that Mrs. Clare Boothe Luce, U.S. Ambassador to Italy, has suffered arsenic poisoning in Rome caused general amazement here today. When she departed for New York last May it was said here that the Ambassador was in a "run-down condition" from overwork and needed rest and a "general physical check up."

Local health authorities pointed out that they had no jurisdiction over the Villa Taverna, Mrs. Luce's residence, where she reportedly had been exposed to small doses of arsenic over a long period. This 16th century mansion adjoining the Villa Borghese Gardens was purchased by the U.S. Government several years ago to be used as a private residence of American Ambassadors in Rome. As such, it is extraterritorial, which means that no Italian policemen or other officials may enter the premises unless requested by the embassy.

Health authorities indicated that they would investigate whether any other Roman homes had been decorated with paints or varnishes containing arsenic. These authorities said they had no record of any recent case of arsenic poisoning from causes such as were blamed for Mrs. Luce's illness.

VILLA'S FURNISHINGS MASSIVE

The Villa Taverna has the name of the aristocratic family that inhabited it in the Renaissance. It rises in the middle of a vast park with tall pine trees. Its furnishings are massive and somewhat gloomy. Mrs. Luce added her own art collection, which contains mostly modern masters but includes a beautiful Italian Renaissance madonna.

Mrs. Luce's bedroom, where the arsenic poisoning is said to have occurred, is large and has four high windows. The housekeeping staff said today the ambassador used to start her long day at 6 a.m., when she would ring for the local morning newspapers and peruse them in bed for more than an hour before having breakfast.

In this period, it is presumed, tiny particles of arsenic dropped into Mrs. Luce's coffee and other breakfast food. Toward 8 a.m. Mrs. Luce would dress and drive across the Borghese Gardens to the embassy building on the Via Veneto in the center of the city.

Reports of Mrs. Luce's poisoning were splashed across the front pages of the evening papers here tonight.

"NO POISON PLOT FOUND

"WASHINGTON, July 18.—A paint chemist said today that if there was lead arsenate in the paint on Mrs. Clare Boothe Luce's bedroom ceiling in Rome 'it was added deliberately either to kill someone or to kill flies.'

At the same time State Department officials said there was "absolutely no evidence" of any attempt on Mrs. Luce's life.

"The scientist, Francis Scofield, chief of the technical division of the National Paint, Varnish and Lacquer Association, conceded only one possibility—other than intent to kill insects or a human—that paint might have been the source of arsenic poisoning.

"He said there was a chance that paint applied in this century might have flaked off and loosened particles of some coat applied before 1900 that might have contained an arsenic poison.

" 'No arsenate derivative that I know of is either technically or economically suitable for use in decorative paint,' he added."

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I say, therefore, in closing my comment on this incident, that I am one of those who have always felt that there is grave doubt as to the reason why Mrs. Luce left Rome, and that the explanation that her departure was caused by paint flakes dropping from a ceiling is too incredulous and fantastic.

I submit that the confirmation of the nomination of Mrs. Luce, who so intimately is connected with Time magazine, the magazine which carried exclusively the story of her having been poisoned by flakes falling from the ceiling in the American Embassy at Rome, would confirm in the minds of many Latin Americans—certainly Bolivians—the already present deep suspicion that Time magazine was speaking for more than itself when it suggested once again that Bolivia be partitioned.

I submit also that this is no time to take any such risk. We have seen that a part of Latin America is already restless. We have seen the growth of a certain amount of communism in the Caribbean. We have seen a serious revolution break out in Bolivia only within the last few days, and we have seen troops called out in Bolivia to protect Americans. During the war, Bolivia was our only source of tin. With tin curtailed from Indonesia and the Malay states, we relied almost exclusively on our neighbor in Latin America. Today the countries of southeast Asia are much closer to Red China than they are to us. What will happen in the future remains to be seen. We hope it will be the best. But there is no reason for jeopardizing our friendship and ties with a nation in the Western Hemisphere which is already uneasy, which already has a strong left-wing labor movement in the tin mines, but which is our only source of tin in the Western Hemisphere.

LUCE QUALIFICATIONS ARE POLITICAL

I turn now to my next point, namely, the very clear evidence that Luce policy is woven through the fabric of the Eisenhower foreign policy.

First of all, two of the most intimate advisers of President Eisenhower, in addition to Mrs. Luce and her husband, are Charles Murphy, his number one speech writer during the 1952 election and again in the 1956 campaign; and, secondly, C. D. Jackson, assistant publisher of the Time, Life, Fortune magazines. He has held several positions, and I am not sure what his position officially is at the moment, but he has been able to serve in the White House, then go back to New York as an executive of the magazines, then come back to the White House to serve again. He came to Washington immediately after President Eisenhower was inaugurated in 1953, to become adviser on psychological warfare. He moves back and forth between Washington and New York like a shuttlecock. His hand is felt in Eisenhower policy at any and all times.

Let me cite the effects of this close relationship between Mr. and Mrs. Luce and their executives.

In the spring of 1956, President Eisenhower called the Prime Minister of Canada, Mr. St. Laurent, to White Sulphur Springs, W. Va., to get together with the President of Mexico. His invitation was based upon the idea of consulting upon mutual problems affecting these three vital neighbors. The meeting received tremendous publicity in the United States and also in Canada and Mexico. Great things were expected of it.

What I am interested in is the matter which President Eisenhower took up with the President of Mexico and the Prime Minister of Canada, namely, the tax which the Canadian government had imposed on Time magazine.

The Canadian edition of Time is printed in Chicago at a cost which enables it to sell advertising at about one-half the rate of Canadian magazines. Therefore, the Canadian government had imposed a tax on American magazines. It hit only two—Time and Reader's Digest. This was not a matter which vitally affected the taxpayers of the United States. It probably affected only three or four taxpayers—namely, Henry Luce and Mrs. Luce, the lady whom we are now asked to confirm, plus some other executives of the Time and Life magazine empire. This matter did not affect the defense of the United States, the borders of Canada and the United States, nor the trade between the United States and Canada.

Yet the President of the United States, after summoning Prime Minister St. Laurent to come all the way to West Virginia, took up as the number one item on the agenda for discussion of the tax on Time magazine.

That is one illustration as to how President Eisenhower's foreign policy is inextricably interwoven with the fortunes of the Luce magazine empire.

But even more important is the manner in which the Luce family has dominated the foreign policy of the Eisenhower administration in regard to China. Henry Luce was born in China. Understandably and commendably he takes a great interest in China. Mr. and Mrs. Luce are great friends of Madame Chiang Kai-shek. For many years the Luce publications have berated and bulldozed former Secretary of State Dean Acheson and our former President, Mr. Truman, because, as they termed it, the Truman administration did not unleash Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek. It was the privilege and right of Mr. Luce to take this position. I do not argue with that.

But I do call attention to and take exception to the manner in which Mr. Luce has changed the foreign policy of the Eisenhower administration, and now it is proposed that his wife be appointed officially as a member of that administration.

It will be recalled that the most effective speech delivered by President Eisenhower, then General Eisenhower, in the autumn of 1952, was his pledge to go to Korea. News stories at the time credited Charles Murphy, a member of the Luce staff then active as an editor of Fortune magazine, as the ghost writer of that speech. This speech was conceived by the Luce empire, and after President Eisenhower was elected, he had to go to Korea to carry out his pledge. Thereafter, he unleashed Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek. In Korea, he also made a peace which President Truman has correctly described as a virtual surrender to the Communists. The Luce publications take great stock, as we all do, in opposing communism in China. But it was the Luce policy, in part, which led to this abject surrender.

Although the President announced with great fanfare that he had unleashed Chiang Kai-shek, nevertheless, after all that fanfare, Chiang Kai-shek is right back on the leash. He is back where he was under the much criticized Acheson-Truman policy, because there is no place for him to go. There was no fanfare by Time and Life magazines when Chiang Kai-shek was put back on the leash. But he was put back.

Far more important, however, is the fact that the policies we have followed on Quemoy and the Matsus, in part influenced, and certainly praised and applauded by, the Luce family, have very nearly brought us into war. They have brought us up to the brink. And I am glad to say that last fall our former Secretary of State, John Foster Dulles, retreated from that brink. It was not an easy thing for him to do. It was a matter which entailed the swallowing of pride, both personal and national; but Mr. Dulles did announce, at a press conference last September, that it was unthinkable that the Chinese Nationalist Army would ever be able to retake the Chinese mainland.

That was a direct reversal of the Luce foreign policy, and it was one of the few times that the Eisenhower administration has failed to follow that policy. The reversal, of course, was due in part to the overwhelming demand on the part of the American people, as reported in the New York Times, that we not go to war over those islands. It was also in the face of the fact that the Eisenhower administration was heading into a very important election. So Mr. Dulles retreated.

It is rather significant to note at this point that the policy of brinkmanship was first enunciated, however, in an exclusive interview in Life magazine, written by John Foster Dulles, and given to his friend, Mr. Luce, the spokesman for the administration. That article got Mr. Dulles into more political hot water than perhaps any other statement he has ever made. It caused grave repercussions among our allies abroad who did not like the idea of being deliberately led up to the brink of war. And it caused unfortunate repercussions in the United States. At that time, Henry Luce made a public statement that he personally accepted responsibility for the article written by John Foster Dulles. We may never know who was actually responsible for that article; but, on the face of it, the article illustrated and proved the intertwining of Luce policy and Eisenhower policy in conducting the vital affairs of the United States.

LUCE CAMPAIGN CONTRIBUTIONS

There is nothing in her record to indicate to me that Mrs. Luce is qualified to be a diplomat.

That was, and is, the principal objection I have to her appointment now to be our Ambassador to Brazil. The role for which I believe she is well qualified is that of political hatchetman; she does very well at making inflammatory and demagogic political speeches; she and her husband contribute heavily to the Republican coffers. And for this she is being rewarded with an ambassadorship.

The senior Senator from Oregon is the last Member of this body who would ask or demand political conformity from anyone in public life. But I do believe that a person seeking a diplomatic post should have some talent for diplomacy. That person should demonstrate sound judgment and a capacity for self-restraint. Mrs. Luce's record throughout her public life shows little evidence of these qualifications.

I say that Mrs. Luce's qualifications are political only; her conformity is with Eisenhower and the GOP; insofar as the administration is concerned, that is the main consideration, apparently, in handing out ambassadorships; and that is how Mrs. Luce qualifies.

Let us look for a moment at the record of Mrs. Luce.

After serving two terms as a highly partisan Member of Congress from Connecticut, from 1943 to 1947, Mrs. Luce returned to public life in 1952, to work for Eisenhower's nomination for the Presidency.

Mrs. Luce and her husband were heavy financial contributors to the 1952 GOP campaign.

In 1952, Henry Luce contributed at least $10,000 to various Republican campaign groups that I am able to locate; $3,000 was to the Republican National Committee, $1,000 to the National Professional Committee for Eisenhower and NIXON, $1,000 to the Citizens Committee for Eisenhower and NIXON, $2,000 to the National Republican Campaign Committee, and $3,000 to the United Republican Finance Committee of New York.

Mrs. Luce herself made 47 radio and television appearances on behalf of candidate Eisenhower. As the publication Current Biography, 1951–53 puts it: "when he was elected her name was mentioned for an important Government appointment." And she got it. Three months after the GOP took office, Mrs. Luce was sent to Italy as our American Ambassador.

In the 1956 campaign, the Luces contributed $29,375 to various Republican campaign groups, according to the report of the Senate Privileges and Elections Subcommittee.

In 1957, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD figures showing the nominations to ambassadorial posts of financial contributors by the Eisenhower administration. They showed that between the end of the 1956 campaign and August 1957, 19 men who had been, or were to be, appointed as ambassadors had contributed to the 1956 GOP coffers $218,740.

In 1953, I was not a member of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate. At that time, with the Republicans in control of the Congress, there was no public hearing at all for most of these appointments. There was no public hearing on Mrs. Luce's nomination for the Italian post, nor was there any rollcall vote on it in the Senate. A few days ago, Mrs. Luce made the point that none of the questions being asked her this time were asked her in 1953; and I replied that I was not on the committee in 1953.

Since 1953, a motion I made 2 years ago has been adopted as the general practice of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate. It is that when a member requests it, there shall be a public hearing on the appointments which come before us for confirmation.

EFFECT OF APPOINTMENT ON CAREER SERVICE

I turn now to my next point—namely, the effect of Mrs. Luce's appointment on the foreign service of the United States. My distinguished friend from Arkansas, the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee [Mr. FULBRIGHT], has quite rightly emphasized the need of strengthening our career diplomatic service. With this I fully concur. However, I am a little surprised that some in the Senate who believe in strengthening our career diplomatic service do not make a stand in regard to this particular appointment of so controversial and unqualified a political figure to such an important Latin American post.

I call attention to the fact that Mrs. Luce is replacing a career diplomat. He is Ellis Briggs, now Ambassador to Brazil.

Mr. Briggs began as vice consul at Lima, Peru. He has worked his way up, and has vast experience in many Latin American countries. He was counselor of the Embassy in Havana, Cuba; was Ambassador to the Dominican Republic; was Director of the Office of American Affairs, in the State Department, and served as Ambassador to Uruguay, Ambassador to Peru, and to some of the most sensitive posts in the world. He served as Ambassador to Czechoslovakia when William Otis, of the Associated Press, was imprisoned. And perhaps the most difficult of all, he served as Ambassador to Korea shortly after the Korean war. For this he received the Medal of Freedom from no less than President Eisenhower.

Ambassador Briggs speaks Spanish and Portuguese, and is popular in Brazil.

However, despite this long and distinguished career, I understand that the Eisenhower administration did not even notify Mr. Briggs that he was being relieved of his duties in Rio de Janeiro. The first he knew that he was to be relieved was when he received a biographical sketch of his successor, Mrs. Clare Boothe Luce, and was asked by Washington to distribute copies of a press release to the Brazilian newspapers.

I submit, Mr. President, that that is no way to treat a distinguished career diplomat. Ambassador Briggs was not even told that he was to be assigned to a new post, and had no idea what was to become of him until he later read in the newspapers that he was to be made Ambassador to Greece. He has had no experience in Greece or the Near East.

The distinguished chairman of our committee has so often emphasized, and quite rightly so, the importance of respecting our career service. I completely agree with him, and that is one reason why I am voting against the Luce nomination.

Mr. President, yesterday, in the New York Times of Sunday, April 26, in an article I previously inserted in the RECORD, Mr. Herbert L. Matthews, writing on the subject "Why Latin America Is Vital to Us," had this to say about our policy in connection with diplomats:

> The choice of ambassadorships rests largely in the White House, not the Department of State.
>
> The Department knew perfectly well in the spring of 1957 that the Cuban situation desperately required an experienced career diplomat, and the first choice was such a man—H. Freeman Matthews. Unfortunately for the United States and for Cuba, he felt obliged to turn down the transfer and, also unfortunately, the Republican National Committee wanted to reward a good Republican with an ambassadorship.
>
> So the post went to a man with no diplomatic experience and no knowledge of Cuba—Earl E. T. Smith. There is no doubt that the present distressing degree of resentment toward the United States on the part of Premier Fidel Castro and the Cuban people could have been avoided or greatly lessened by expert diplomacy in Havana.
> This points to one of the obvious things that can be done to improve U.S. relations with Latin America. It is to choose Ambassadors with more care and a greater sense of responsibility.

Mr. President, in my judgment, the post of Ambassador to Brazil calls for a career diplomat, not a political appointee. It calls for an Ambassador thoroughly trained after long years in diplomatic service in Latin America. I am very much of the opinion, Mr. President, that we have some difficult times ahead in the years to come in regard to Latin American relations. It is very important that we put in our ambassadorial posts, and in our other top diplomatic posts throughout Latin America, career diplomats, and not persons with such a controversial background as Mrs. Luce's. I am satisfied that in the due course of time her appointment will result in a deterioration of our relations with Latin America.

MRS. LUCE AS AMBASSADOR TO ITALY

After examining Mrs. Luce's record as Ambassador to Italy, I do not feel that she made a good record.

Some remarkable propaganda has been spread by large segments of the American press, including the Luce empire, in seeking to give the American public the impression that she did do a good job; but I do not think that allegation will stand up under analysis.

As Ambassador to Italy, Mrs. Luce was a notorious absentee, even allowing for her long illness just before she resigned. In 1955 she was absent from her post 87 days, plus being on vacation for 69 days. None of that was sick leave, or due to illness. In 1956 she was absent from her post 84 days, plus 23 days of vacation, and 95 days of sick leave.

I do not know of very many Government positions where the individual can work at such a casual pace and stay in that job very long, and that includes being a Member of Congress. Her total record for the 2 years showed her absent on 171 days of duty and 187 days of nonduty; that is, vacation and sick leave. These figures were inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD], and appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 103, part 12, pages 15882–15883.

The Senator from Montana has been another member of the Foreign Relations Committee who has shared the point of view of our chairman, if I understand correctly, that greater stress should be placed on the selection of career diplomats rather than politically appointed diplomats.

Mr. President, in regard to the matter of career diplomats versus politically appointed diplomats, it is interesting to note, as one looks at the absentee compilation which the Senator from Montana placed in the RECORD in 1957, that the career diplomats render much better service to the American people, as a group, by staying on their posts. The matter of being a diplomat in a foreign office calls for one to stay on the job except when called back by his Government for further consultation in regard to problems of the position.

Irrespective of this nomination, I feel that the Foreign Relations Committee must take some steps to make clear to the State Department that we are going to discharge more of a watch-dog function in respect to the performance of our foreign diplomats, and that when we find such a record of absenteeism, we have a right to ask the questions, "How come? Why isn't this person removed? Why don't you send someone to that post who can be relied upon to stay on the job and represent the interests of the United States through that Embassy?"

I not only raise this point about Mrs. Luce's absentee delinquencies, but, in addition, I believe that her activities as Ambassador went beyond the proper official duties of an Ambassador.

INTERFERENCE IN DOMESTIC POLITICS

Is is true that Mrs. Luce had some moments of success during her last 2 years in Rome, but an examination of her entire record, will disclose that the mistakes of her 4 years far outweigh the popularity of her departing months.

Mrs. Luce took office in the crucial year 1953. Elections in Italy are held every 5 years, and they are just as important as the elections held every 4 years in this country. To some extent they are more important, because the balance between the Communist Party, the second largest party in Italy, and the forces of anti-communism is a very delicate one. Any false move, any unwise statement could change that balance.

In the spring of 1953, a very good friend of the United States, Premier De Gasperi, led the forces of the Christian Democratic Party and the middle-of-the-road groups. He then had a clear-cut majority. So advisers in the State Department tendered Mrs. Luce friendly advice that she remain in New York until after the Italian elections were over. She insisted on returning to her post immediately. She objected to speculation in the newspapers that she was being asked to remain in the United States.

Once she had assumed her post in the spring of 1953, Mr. Luce, being an active lady, apparently chafed at sitting on the side-lines. Just as she was so active in the campaigns against Roosevelt and Mr. Truman, so she wanted to get into the campaign in Italy. Understandably, she wanted to try to help defeat Communism. However, it is an old and well-accepted rule of diplomacy and politics that a foreign ambassador does not engage in the slightest political activity in a foreign state. The United States has expelled certain envoys from its shores when they engaged in political activity, even in the slightest degree.

However, Mrs. Luce, scorning this well-accepted principle of diplomacy, made a speech in Milan on May 28 hinting that if the Italian people did not vote for the middle-of-the-road parties supporting Premier De Gasperi, "Grave consequences" might follow. This speech was delicately phrased. But the words "grave consequences" carry a connotation in diplomacy in foreign countries which did not escape the people of Italy. To them it meant that American Marshall plan aid would be cut off. It was a threat to a proud people and it was resented.

The Italian newspapers friendly to this country were silent. They could not defend such a threat. Premier De Gasperi was embarrassed. It was the most devastating blow he had received during that entire hotly contested election. But the Communist papers were vocal. They had been given the one argument they needed most; namely, that the United States of America was trying to dominate the politics of Italy.

The next day, speaking in Genoa on May 29, at the Propeller Club, Mrs. Luce repeated the same indirect warning to Italy.

This is what sometimes can happen when a political ambassador is sent abroad. In my judgment, a career diplomat would have known better. The results which followed in Italy are too well known to all to be repeated in detail. But Premier De Gasperi lost the narrow margin of the strength he had in Parliament. After that the Christian Democratic Party had to govern Italy by coalition. Many observers believe that Mrs. Luce's speeches gave the Communists their greatest victory in the entire post-war Italian period. Whether or not she was effective, she did try hard to influence the outcome.

Following this, Mrs. Luce also became indirectly embroiled in the Italian election for President. She was opposed to Mr. Gronchi, just as she had opposed Roosevelt and Truman, and apparently for the same reason.

Mr. Gronchi is a Democrat, and somewhat left of center. He believed in a strong, peaceful reform program for Italy. He favored land reform, breaking up the large estates, a higher tax on business and on the upper brackets. Mrs. Luce, of course, did not make speeches in Italy against Gronchi, as she did against Roosevelt and the New Deal in the United States. But her performances were felt through the European editions of Time magazine and in other ways through the political and social leaders who came to the American Embassy in Rome.

Mr. Gronchi, however, was elected. His election took place in the Italian Parliament, and at the time it took place, Mrs. Luce was in the diplomatic gallery. Crushed, she yielded to a natural feminine emotion. It is reported that she was so emotionally upset as to cause her to weep, whereupon she left the diplomatic gallery. It created an incident which stirred the diplomatic corps of Rome, was much discussed in the press, but naturally was not published in Time, Life, or Fortune.

It was widely said in diplomatic circles in Rome that had Mrs. Luce been of the opposite sex she would have been recalled. Certainly, an ambassador in Washington who even secretly opposed the President of the United States would have been declared persona non grata. Mrs. Luce remained in Rome. And to her credit, I must say that she made a fast recovery. She cultivated President Gronchi, whom she had opposed, and had him invited to Washington.

But the fact is that her two speeches in Rome and Milan in 1953 during the height of the Italian elections probably did greater disservice to the United States in fighting communism than any other faux pas made by any other ambassador in the entire postwar period anywhere in the world.

Yet Mrs. Luce, who, with her husband, made heavy contributions to Eisenhower's reelection in 1956, has now been appointed Ambassador to Brazil and we are asked to confirm her nomination. To send her to Brazil, where she has to learn all over again, where she would only have approximately a year and a half to serve, and where she would replace a very fine career diplomat, would be, in my opinion, utter folly.

The answer should be, for the year and a half, Mr. President, to appoint a career diplomat to fill this very important Brazilian post.

INTERFERENCE IN DOMESTIC OIL POLICY

A second activity of Mrs. Luce in Italy, which I consider undue and which is an equally sensitive point in Brazil, was her attempt to influence the oil policy of the Italian Government.

Natural gas had been a state monopoly in Italy when it became evident that substantial oil deposits were also present. The chief of that state monopoly was Enrico Mattei. Mattei became the object of severely critical articles in Fortune magazine, and later, in Time magazine, which described him as the biggest single obstacle to large-scale American investment in Italy.

When the publisher of these widely read magazines is also the consort of the American Ambassador, it is not surprising that many Italians were apprehensive about where a privately held opinion ended and American policy began.

In fact, during this period of time Henry Luce spent some time with his wife at the American Embassy in Rome. Later, I shall insert in the RECORD quotations from a magazine charging, as did some of the press at the time, that Mr. Luce was very much interested in American Oil Co. opportunities in Italy to invest in Italian oil.

Mrs. Luce made it much clearer when a statement of hers appeared in the New York Times in January 1955, and later in an Italian industrial newspaper, declaring that—

> Capital comes where the profit is greatest. Political security is associated with economic convenience.

She continued:

> Much depends upon the oil policy of the Italian Government. It is known that oil investments are a good index of the security and profitable nature of the market. Many private companies can be led to invest their capital here if they see the oil companies doing it.

In an article in the Reporter magazine of February 23, 1956, it was stated that the rumor was being leaked from the State Department that further financial assistance to Italy would be withheld "until this oil business is settled."

Italian Premier Scelba was scheduled to make a trip to the United States, and the American interest in the oil situation had become such a pressing political issue that the Socialists tried to limit by an act of Parliament Scelba's discussions while he was here. The motion did not pass the Parliament, but a moral commitment was elicited from Scelba that he would not in fact talk about Italian oil while in the United States.

According to this article in the Reporter, "what Scelba talked about in Washington is still, and probably will remain forever, a deep secret, but certainly he kept mum about oil."

Mr. President, I think there can be no disputing the fact that at the time of the oil crisis in Italy, when Mrs. Luce and Henry Luce were making very clear their preferences for having American oil companies granted the privilege of investing in oil in Italy, and interfering with the governmental oil monopoly policy of Italy, a majority of the Members of Parliament of Italy very clearly indicated they wanted the Italian oil monopoly to proceed without foreign intervention. Of course, Senators will remember that was the time, also, as I shall point out in a few moments, when the Italian Government was making it rather difficult for some of our oil interests in the Middle East.

What I wish to stress is that the incident which arose over the visit of Scelba to the United States left no room for doubt as to where the parliamentary lawmakers of Italy stood in regard to their desire, as a matter of national policy, to be allowed to operate their own oil interests without intervention, either from the Ambassador of the United States or her consort, or the powerful oil interests of the United States.

Next only to the Middle East, South America is a great exporter of oil. Oil is her lifeblood; there is probably no industry that is more sensitive in South America vis-a-vis the United States than that of oil.

A great deal of the development of the oil resources of South America is in the hands of American capital. In other countries, American development is being restricted.

Brazil is, like Italy, a nation with a government monopoly on oil. Mrs. Luce demonstrated in her previous assignment that the policies stated in Mr. Luce's publications on this subject are likely to show up as the policies of the American Ambassador.

As chairman of the Latin American Affairs Subcommittee, I cannot help but feel that sending Mrs. Luce to a South American country would tend on this score alone to arouse old fears about American imperialism and economic designs upon our neighbors to the south.

Let me say for the record that if this were the only reason I had for voting against confirmation of the nomination, I would vote against it. However, there are many other reasons, which I am bringing out in this speech.

I believe that the record of this nominee in connection with the oil controversy in Italy is such that she should not be sent to a Latin American country which also, as does Italy, has a government oil monopoly, and operates its oil interests under the rules, regulations, and laws of that governmental policy.

Enough is known about the delicacy of the oil problems of Latin America to know that few issues can so quickly stir up animosity against the United States as can the expression of any evidence on our part, or any possible reason to believe that evidence exists, that we will follow a policy which seeks to interfere in their oil policy.

We ought to have a career diplomat in Brazil. I can well understand that in connection with any proposal for a loan or any proposal for participation in a foreign aid program on the part of any country, we might very well, in negotiations in connection therewith, raise some question as to what the position of potential American investors would be in the particular country, whether the subject involved dealt with oil, mines, or the establishment of a manufacturing plant, steel mill, or whatnot.

That kind of problem ought to be negotiated specifically in carrying out the economic aid program and the loan program of our country. It should be a part and parcel of the policy of an embassy of the United States anywhere in the world to give the Communists no basis for the charge that our embassy becomes pretty much a propaganda center for undermining the oil policy or any other economic policy of the particular country, which has been established by the government. That is why I say we cannot treat lightly this unfortunate record of Mrs. Luce and her husband in connection with the oil policies of Italy and their attempted intervention therein.

I turn now to another objection.

MRS. LUCE'S EXTREME PARTISANSHIP ON FOREIGN POLICY ISSUES

During the recent hearings on this nomination by the Foreign Relations Committee, it was also brought out that Mrs. Luce has been among the most vitriolic opponents of the Democratic administrations, and particularly their foreign policies, in the entire Nation.

I raise this point not to refight old battles, but to indicate the extremes to which Mrs. Luce has gone, extremes that demonstrate her lack of the stability needed for a diplomatic job and that tend to undermine the position of the United States abroad. In my opinion, it is the uttermost hypocrisy to send her to Brazil, or even to Italy, in view of her statements about American foreign policies and the men who made them.

She said, in September 1952:

> Twenty years the mortal enemies of ours have been growing and thriving in the organism of the Democratic Party. There is only one way to dislodge them. We must shake them all out. Yes, the tree of government must be shaken hard. Then these rotten apples, these mortal enemies, will fall out before all from the top branches.

Mrs. Luce remarked that she thought this was "awfully good oratory," when she was questioned about it in the hearing.

And again, she said of President Truman in June 1948, that he had been hand-picked by the big city bosses "who are ready to stuff a ballot box or steal an election before you can say Missouri."

In the early days of the 1952 presidential campaign, in April 1952, Mrs. Luce said of Secretary of State Dean Acheson that he and what she called his "cabal of fellow travelers" had been the "prideful desire" of these "arrested adolescents" to ride "the Bolshevist wave of the future."

We all know the connotation of the phrase "fellow traveler." We can take judicial notice that Mrs. Luce knew the connotation when she used the term. She seems to object to my use of the word "subversive" to describe her public utterances. I repeat that charge on the floor of the Senate today. I believe the speech to which I refer was highly subversive.

We have before us at all times the rattlesnake danger of Communist subversion. We must be on guard at all times against the cells of Communist subversion. The FBI has done a pretty good job in spotting them. They are pretty well known. We stand united, I am sure, in the Congress and in the country, against subversion.

But there are other types of subversion which also threaten the fabric of this Republic, and this is an example of the type of subversion which seeks to give the American people the impression that Dean Acheson was a Communist fellow traveler, a subversive. I care not how anyone tries to dodge or avoid the issue, or to edge about it.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. MORSE. The Senator from Alaska was engaged in other official business when I began my speech. I announced at that time that I would not yield until the conclusion of my speech, and then I would be glad to yield for questions so long as any Senator desired to question me. I wish to place the formal part of my speech in the RECORD in continuity, and then I shall be glad to discuss it with my colleague.

In her speech of April 1952, Mrs. Luce continued:

> Dean Acheson and his unhappy supporters have been proved wrong in a prolonged misjudgment, a misjudgment carried across 10 terrific years, which has brought about the death of our sons and could have as its result, in our time, the death of freedom.
> If a general loses a division, he is shot. When Acheson as Under Secretary of State lost 100 million people a year to communism, including the friendly 500 million Chinese—he was promoted to Secretary of State.

I call that subversion—blatant subversion—on the face of the language. There is a subtle, sinister implication in that language to call it an unpatriotic course of action on the part of the Secretary of State and then, in a little forensic stab, to say that when a general loses a division he is shot but that Acheson was promoted to Secretary of State.

Oh, it has been said—and probably will be said again—that the senior Senator from Oregon is pretty rough in his speech sometimes. However, I have never applied for a diplomatic post. We must base our judgment today on the diplomatic ability of this nominee. Rough as I may be in political debate at times, I always document my charges.

Thus in campaign speech after campaign speech, when I have talked about the political immorality of the Eisenhower administration, for example, I have defined my terms by example after example of what I am willing to have history judge to be its political immorality.

As I would have no hesitation in supporting the nomination of a great patriot, Dean Acheson, one of the great Democrats of our party of all times, let history be the judge that I do not intend to sit in the Senate today and vote to confirm the nomination to a diplomatic post of a nominee who has besmirched and has tried to smudge the memory of one of the greatest Presidents in the history of the Nation, Franklin Roosevelt.

I do not intend, as a Democrat, I may say to my Democratic colleagues, to vote to confirm such a nomination. I say these attacks on Acheson, Truman, and Roosevelt on the part of this nominee constitute sinister subversion. I shall stand by it and shall be proud to have my descendants read that I stood by it.

Again, in September 1952, she said of the administration in a nationwide radio and TV broadcast billed by the Republican National Committee as an exposé of Communists in Government that American troops in Korea were being hit with weapons "stolen by the Communists who have infiltrated into our Government."

I call that subversion.

She went on to say that the Government from 1932 to 1952 had not guarded against the danger of Communist infiltration because some of the guards appointed by the administration were themselves the thieves of our security.

I call that subversion.

Mrs. Luce was quite explicit in telling the world just where the Communists were in the Government. She said they worked in Army Air Force Intelligence, the Bureau of Naval Ordnance, the Justice Department, the Federal Reserve, the School of Military Government, the Aberdeen Proving Ground, the wartime Office of Strategic Services, the Office of War Information, the code rooms of the London and Paris Embassies, and every branch of the State Department.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, the article entitled "Truman Is Challenged To Act on Red Problem." The article was published in the Washington Times Herald of October 1, 1952, and quotes Mrs. Luce.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TRUMAN IS CHALLENGED TO ACT ON RED PROBLEM—INFILTRATION WIDE, MRS LUCE SAYS

NEW YORK, September 30.—Former Representative Clare Boothe Luce charged tonight that the Red underground operated in at least 23 vital U.S. Government agencies during the last 20 years and stole "just about" every American secret.

The former Congresswoman from Connecticut, in a nationwide radio and TV broadcast billed by the Republican National Committee as an exposé of Communists in Government, said Communists worked in such sensitive spots as Army Air Force Intelligence, the Aberdeen Proving Grounds, the wartime Office of Strategic Services, the Office of War Information, the code rooms of the London and Paris Embassies, and every branch of the State Department. Also the Bureau of Naval Ordnance, the Justice Department, the School of Military Government, the Federal Reserve, and the American-British-Chinese Stabilization Fund.

QUOTES FBI CHIEF

Mrs. Luce quoted FBI Director Hoover as telling a Senate group in 1951 that 394 persons were dismissed as a result of investigations into Communist agents in Government, and that 2,991 resigned during the probe.

The speech was scheduled as a followup of a statement yesterday by Gen. Walter Bedell Smith, head of the supersecret Central Intelligence Agency, that he was "morally certain" that Communists have infiltrated every Government agency.

Recordings and newsreels of hearings of the House Un-American Activities Committee were interspersed through Mrs. Luce's speech to illustrate the points she made.

Mrs. Luce asserted the Government during the last 20 years has not guarded against the danger of Communist infiltration because "some of the guards appointed by the administration were themselves the thieves of our security."

SEES EFFECT IN KOREA

She charged that American troops in Korea today are being hit with weapons developed in the United States and "stolen by the Communists who have infiltrated into our Government."

Mrs. Luce charged that Governor Stevenson in an Albuquerque speech a few weeks ago said there aren't many American Communists and "they aren't on the whole, very important."

Mrs. Luce charged that while the infamous Ware cell—which she called the "general staff of the original Communist underground in the United States"—was operating in the Agricultural Adjustment Administration Governor Stevenson joined the legal staff of the AAA.

I thought we had answered the threat of McCarthyism in America. I thought we were on record against McCarthyism. I do not intend to retreat today, in my opposition to the tactics and techniques of McCarthyism, even though it may now be bespoken by Clare Booth Luce. I do not intend to vote to confirm her nomination to an ambassadorship, for that among many other reasons.

One is moved to wonder why Mrs. Luce so cheerfully became a part of a State Department in 1953 which she had said 6 months earlier had Communists in "every branch."

American boys were dying at the hands of Communists in the Korean war when these subversive statements were made. I do not propose to condone or to forgive them by granting a reward for that type of subversion by way of an Ambassador's post in Brazil. The war in Korea was fought by the United Nations against Communist invaders from North Korea and China. The United States and the Republic of Korea furnished the great majority of the United Nations forces, and we supported, of course, the great bulk of the expenses to defray the cost of that war.

But it was the U.N. that authorized the action by which Americans were sent. In April 1951, 25 nations besides the United States and Korea had offered military aid to the United Nations for use in Korea. In December 1951, 15 nations besides the United States and Korea had combat units there.

Mrs. Luce apparently would have had the world believe that this effort to halt aggression, undertaken by the United Nations, was the result of evil machinations on the part of the American President and Secretary of State.

But no partisan statement of Mrs. Luce's matches in unreasonableness and damage to her capability as an Ambassador her declaration in the 1944 Presidential race that the late Franklin Roosevelt "is the only American President who ever lied us into a war because he did not have the political courage to lead us into it."

I would have every Democrat in the Senate—yes, every Republican in the Senate—pause, ponder, and reflect on that malicious, sinister, subversive charge of the nominee against the memory of one of the great leaders, not only of America, but also of a historic period in the world, Franklin Roosevelt.

To my Democratic colleagues I say, "You can vote to confirm her nomination if you want to, but the senior Senator from Oregon will not. He will never have his descendants read that when the name of Clare Boothe Luce came before the Senate he gave any approval, direct or indirect, to a person who demonstrated such a lack of judgment and diplomatic capacity as to make the statement that Franklin Roosevelt lied us into a war."

Her statement which Senators will now read in the hearings on her nomination, namely, that her language was intemperate, and that she apologizes now, years later, for it, does not change the fact that she has yet to retract her charge. I want every Democratic Senator to note that fact when he comes to vote on this issue, because that is a subversive statement; it is an unsupported statement; it is a statement, in my judgment, which proves beyond the shadow of a doubt that a person having such instability, a person having such poor judgment, a person so lacking in diplomatic tact, has no place in the U.S. Embassy in Brazil as our Ambassador.

CHARGE AGAINST ROOSEVELT REMAINS UNDOCUMENTED

I am sorry to say that the vote which we take here will be followed around the world as a vote for or against a very great President of the United States, so far as his reputation is concerned.

It is true that politics can become heated in any campaign. But those who make unfair, unreasonable heated charges in a political campaign, particularly about our foreign policy leaders, are seldom selected to represent the United States in an important country, one that came to our defense when the United States was attacked at Pearl Harbor.

Let us look at the alleged documentation of her 1944 campaign statement which she submitted to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mrs. Luce's first citation is of the American historian Charles A. Beard. Of him she says:

> Since yesterday I have found my thesis adumbrated in great detail in a volume entitled "President Roosevelt and the Coming of World War II" by one of the foremost American historians, Charles A. Beard.

Apparently, committee and Senate Members are expected to read this entire volume to get out of it what Mrs. Luce wants us to get, namely, that Roosevelt lied us into World War II.

I had read Beard's work long before I listened to Mrs. Luce; I have rechecked it since. In her documentation there is no indication of what Beard said, nor any specific case of falsification documented by Beard, to substantiate Mrs. Luce's charge, and she cannot produce one.

In a letter to the Washington Post, published on April 23, 1959, Professor Bernadotte E. Schmitt, an emeritus professor of modern history at the University of Chicago, describes Mrs. Luce's use of Beard as an authority in this way:

> Beard's book is now recognized as the work of a bitter old man who allowed his prejudices to get the better of his historical training.

I do not happen to share that evaluation of Beard's work; it is a substantial piece of writing, in my opinion. But I point out that Beard does not support a claim that "Roosevelt lied us into war."

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in my remarks the entire letter of Professor Schmitt.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Apr. 23, 1959]

Mrs. Luce is pleased to quote the late Charles A. Beard in support of her theory that FDR lied us into war. She does not refer to Herbert Feis' "The Road to Pearl Harbor" or the two volumes by Professors Langer and Gleason; these authors tell quite a different story.

Beard's book is now recognized as the work of a bitter old man who allowed his prejudices to get the better of his historical training. Adm. Samuel Eliot Morison, whose qualifications as a historian are admirably displayed in his multivolume history of the U.S. Navy in World War II, disposed of the Beard volume in an article in the Atlantic Monthly shortly after its appearance; he showed how Beard had lifted evidence out of its context and written a thoroughly tendentious book.

BERNADOTTE E. SCHMITT.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, secondly, Mrs. Luce cites Robert Sherwood's "Roosevelt and Hopkins," and refers the committee to chapter 8, dealing with the third-term campaign.

I have the Sherwood book, and I have read chapter 8, as Mrs. Luce directed. I ask unanimous consent to have the pages dealing with foreign policy issues in the 1940 election campaign printed at this point in my remarks. The excerpt deals with Roosevelt's use of the phrase that American boys would never be sent into a foreign war.

There being no objection, the portion of the book was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

This was the signal that was needed to proclaim that "The Champ" had gone into action. This Philadelphia speech, reread after 7 years, does not appear to qualify as one of Roosevelt's better efforts. But it was effective at the time, and the gleeful roars of the partisan crowd in Convention Hall that greeted each precision punch were as important when broadcast as anything specific that he said. Roosevelt did not once mention Willkie's name in this speech, nor at any other time during the campaign, nor did he ever mention Dewey 4 years later. Shortly after this speech, Willkie broadcast from the New York Herald Tribune Forum and listeners noted that he sounded shaken. Willkie's confidence in the triumph of his cause had been almost fanatical, but by now the politicians, supported by newspaper publishers for whose opinions he had more respect, were beginning to bring home to him the possibility that defeat stared him in the face. Aside from his own personal ambition which had led him to seek the nomination and to drive himself unsparingly in the campaign, he would have been less than human if he had not come to believe his own words and those of other Republican orators to the effect that the reelection of Roosevelt would be an unutterable calamity, to be prevented by any and all means, fair or foul. His principal advisers in the first part of the campaign were the same amateurs who had backed him for the nomination and helped him to win it—honorable, intelligent men like Russell Davenport who despised the Old Guard reactionaries and isolationists as they despised the cynical men (like Hopkins of the free-spending New Deal). The Republican national chairman, Congressman JOSEPH W. MARTIN, and other hard-boiled veterans of innumerable "smoke-filled rooms," scorned these amateurs and told Willkie vehemently that his high-minded advisers were making him an easy mark for Roosevelt. The Republican professionals begged Willkie to abandon this nonsense about a bipartisan foreign policy—to attack Roosevelt as a warmonger—to scare the American people with warnings that votes for Roosevelt meant wooden crosses for their sons and brothers and sweethearts. Willkie succumbed to these heated urgings from men who loved him no more than the professional Democrats loved Roosevelt but who knew they must win with him or suffer another 4 years in the political wastelands where no flowers of patronage could bloom. When Willkie started to shout charges that American boys were already on the transports—that we should be involved in a foreign war within 5 months if Roosevelt won—the campaign really descended to the lower depths and became, for 2 impassioned weeks, pretty much of a national disgrace. Willkie knew that these charges were contemptible, and when some of them were repeated to him by the isolationist Senator Bennett Champ Clark, during Willkie's testimony in favor of lend-lease a few months later, he dismissed them with disarming candor by saying, "In moments of oratory in campaigns we all expand a little bit."

However, there was no doubt about the immediate efficacy of Willkie's discreditable attacks on the war issue. The advice of the Republican professionals that the only way to get votes was to terrify people proved unhappily sound. The effects of this were felt powerfully in the White House during the last week of October. I had to read the letters and telegrams and reports that flooded in and, being a neophyte in such matters, I was amazed and horrified at the evidences of hysteria. Of all the communications, the most disturbing were those from newspapermen who, even though most of them worked for Republican papers, were personally devoted to Roosevelt and were doing all they could privately to help him. They reported mounting waves of fear throughout the country which might easily merge into tidal proportions by election day and sweep Willkie into office. There were all sorts of other reports from all over: notices from insurance companies to policyholders that Roosevelt's election would make their policies relatively worthless; telegrams to doctors warning that Roosevelt's election would mean the socialization of medicine; an extremely solvent bank advertised in the Chicago Tribune: "In a last stand for democracy, every director and officer of this bank will vote for Wendell Willkie"—a warning to depositors that they had better do likewise if they wanted to protect their money. There were various other scarecrows designed to frighten workers, farmers, housewives. Some of these, however, had been set up by the Republicans in 1936 and had fooled practically no one. The fear of war was another matter; it was something new and unreasoning and tending toward a sense of panic. Or, at any rate, so the reports indicated. Reading them, it was difficult to avoid the dismaying thought that perhaps the American people were ready to stampede along the road which led to Bordeaux and so to Vichy even before the panzers arrived on our home soil; it seemed possible that the strategy of terror had won its greatest victory here, that the Nazis had made good their boast that the conquest of the Western Hemisphere would be an "inside job." Even more alarming reports were coming into Democratic National Headquarters in New York and were relayed, perhaps in somewhat magnified form, from there to the White House. All the messages said much the same thing: "Please, for God's sake, Mr. President, give solemn promise to the mothers of America that you will not send their sons into any foreign wars. If you fail to do this, we lose the election."

Strangely enough, the previous Willkie arguments which had most effectively bruised Roosevelt had tended to charge him with a kind of isolationism. Willkie likened Roosevelt to Léon Blum, who had attempted to steer France toward social progress rather than preparedness; he identified himself with Winston Churchill, whom he quoted often, Churchill having made some remarks a few years before in disparagement of the American New Deal. Willkie tried to assign to Roosevelt a share of the guilt for the Munich surrender and the fall of France, and for guilt for the torpedoing of the London Economic Conference 7 years earlier. Most of all, Willkie blamed Roosevelt and his socialistic administration for the present military weakness of the United States—and those accusations stung Roosevelt worse than any others because he knew all too well just how frighteningly weak we were. Roosevelt spent a great deal of time answering these earlier accusations even though they hardly tallied with the later charges that American troops were already on the transports headed for Europe or Asia or both. The diversity of Willkie's attack and its fine disregard for consistency were bewildering even to Roosevelt and he was forced for a time to take a defensive position, where he was at his worst.

On October 28, Roosevelt went to New York City and made a regular campaign tour of four boroughs, speaking at two ceremonies, the ground-breaking for one tunnel and the dedication of another, both timed conveniently for this occasion by La Guardia. There were short speeches also at Hunter College and Fordham University, at the Queensbridge housing project and Roosevelt Park, and the grand windup with a rally at Madison Square Garden that evening. The night before, Mussolini had contributed to the drama of the moment and, although this was certainly not his intention, had thereby helped Roosevelt, by launching his shameful and ultimately (for Italy) disastrous invasion of Greece. But Roosevelt did not denounce this; he made no further reference to a "stab in the back," for by now the Italian-American vote was of substantial importance, particularly in New York and other large cities. He said, I am quite sure that all of you will feel the same sorrow in your hearts that I feel—sorrow for the Italian people and the Grecian people, that they should have been involved together in conflict—" an unassailably safe statement. Ironically enough, two paragraphs later in the same speech, he quoted Theodore Roosevelt's famous term, "weasel words."

That Madison Garden speech was one of the most equivocal of Roosevelt's career. The first two-thirds of it was a reply to Willkie's charge that the administration had neglected our national defense, Roosevelt reading the record of Republican opposition to all attempts to increase the Armed Forces and to give aid to embattled Britain. The last third of the speech was a reply to the charge of warmongering. Here, Roosevelt went to the length or depth of taking credit for the neutrality law and other measures which he had thoroughly disapproved and had fought to repel and had contrived by all possible means to circumvent. While boasting of the neutrality law as part of the administration record, he deliberately neglected to make any mention of his own quarantine speech; in a campaign as irrational as this one, he felt it necessary to soft-pedal the fact that he had been ahead of other world statesmen in telling the world the truth.

This speech was brightened by one fortuitous catch phrase. In citing the voting records of such prominent Republicans as Congressmen Joe Martin, Hamilton Fish, and Bruce Barton, the three names fell into such an euphonious pattern—Martin, Barton, and Fish—that Roosevelt repeated the phrase later in the speech, and when he did so, the crowd roared the names with him. Two days later, in his Boston speech, Roosevelt mentioned Martin, and immediately someone in the gallery shouted "What about Barton and Fish?" and the crowd thereupon took up the chant. American crowds love to indulge in organized exercises of derision. Willkie said later, "When I heard the President hang the isolationist votes of Martin, Barton, and Fish on me, and get away with it, I knew I was licked." (I must say that I doubt that statement; it was a virtue of Wendell Willkie's that he never knew when he was licked.)

The day after the New York appearance, Roosevelt was back in Washington for a momentous ceremony; the drawing of the first numbers under the Selective Service Act. This lottery would determine the names of the first 800,000 men—roughly 5 percent of the total registrants—to be drafted into the Army. This would have been a tense, nervous occasion at any time; with the current state of the world, and with the word "warmonger" being thrown about so recklessly it was all the more harrowing. Roosevelt had to choose his words with extraordinary care. This was no moment for trick phrases. The Nation was listening breathlessly for the broadcast announcement of the fateful numbers as they were drawn. With his marvelous gift for finding homely, old-fashioned words to fit new circumstances, Roosevelt did not refer to selective service as a "draft"—certainly not "conscription"—he called it a "muster," thereby evoking race memories of the rugged farmers of Lexington and Concord taking their flintlock muskets down from above the fireplace. Roosevelt had prepared himself with letters from leaders of the Protestant, Catholic, and Jewish faiths, supporting selective service as a democratic procedure, and he quoted from these in his broadcast. The best of these—and, in view of the uncertainty of the Catholic attitude, the most important—was from Archbishop (later Cardinal) Francis J. Spellman, who wrote:

"It is better to have protection and not need it than to need protection and not have it. * * * We really cannot longer afford to be moles who cannot see, or ostriches who will not see. * * * We Americans want peace and we shall prepare for a peace, but not for a peace whose definition is slavery or death."

Those were stronger words of justification of Roosevelt's position than any he himself uttered in this campaign.

It seemed as though the fear-of-war hysteria, as expressed in the messages to Washington, reached its peak on this day. The Gallup poll indicated that Willkie was steadily gaining in strength. Roosevelt himself was inclined to shrug this off on the theory that Gallup's conclusions could be colored by wishful thinking as well as those of anyone else. But the Democratic leaders were becoming more and more jittery and attributing everything to the peace mania. It seemed that Roosevelt had gone about as far in the New York speech as one could go in the provision of reassurance, but the frightened politicians protested that he had not gone far enough; they demanded that he provide absolute guarantee to the mothers of America that their sons would not fight.

On October 30, we were on the Presidential train going up into New England, with stops for short speeches at New Haven, Meriden, Hartford, and Worcester, and the final speech at the Boston Arena. That Boston speech was a terrible one to prepare and also to remember. Every time the train stopped more and more telegrams were delivered stating almost tearfully that, if the President did not give that solemn promise to the mothers, he might as well start packing his belongings at the White House.

Roosevelt as always worked hard on the speech between stops. He sat in a low-backed armchair in his private car, the latest draft of the speech on his lap, with Missy LeHand, Grace Tully, Hopkins, Rosenman and me, all working with carbon copies. We came to a passage which gave assurance to the mothers and fathers that their "boys" would be well fed and well housed in the Army and their health well guarded. Hopkins handed the President a telegram from Ed Flynn containing the usual urgent request.

"But how often do they expect me to say that?" Roosevelt asked. "It's in the Democratic platform and I've repeated it a hundred times."

Whereupon I remarked, "I know it, Mr. President, but they don't seem to have heard you the first time. Evidently you've got to say it again—and again—and again."

So it was put in, as follows:

"And while I am talking to you mothers and fathers, I give you one more assurance.

"I have said this before, but I shall say it again, and again, and again:

"Your boys are not going to be sent into any foreign wars."

That passage has been given almost as much quotation (in the isolationist press) as Roosevelt's somewhat complementary observation that "The only thing we have to fear is fear itself."

Rosenman, whose duty it was to remember everything, mentioned the fact that the Democratic platform had added the words, "except in case of attack." Roosevelt said he could see no need to tack that on now. "Of course we'll fight if we're attacked. If somebody attacks us, then it isn't a foreign war, is it? Or do they want me to guarantee that our troops will be sent into battle only in the event of another civil war?" He was plainly sick and tired of these jugglings of euphemisms, as well he might be.

The Boston speech provoked a political issue over the use of a personal pronoun. As a gesture to the Boston Irish, Roosevelt paid tribute to one of them, Joseph P. Kennedy, who had just returned from his post at the Court of St. James. Roosevelt described him as "my Ambassador." Both Hopkins and Rosenman protested this, asking if it would not be better to say "our Ambassador." But Roosevelt insisted that "my" was correct and he was technically right, for an Ambassador is the personal representative of the head of one state to the head of another. That explanation did no good whatever once the fatal pronoun was out. Every Republican orator from then on pointed to the word "my" as proof of Roosevelt's colossal egotism and dictatorial ambitions.

Before the Boston speech, Roosevelt went for a rest and quiet dinner at the apartment of his son John on the Charles River. An adjoining building was some sort of club for undergraduates of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. They had displayed a huge banner inscribed with the words "We want Willkie"— and when the President was pushed out in his wheelchair, the students chanted, "Poppa—I wanna be a captain," which was the popular, taunting reference to the commission given to John Roosevelt's brother, Elliott. While waiting for the President to come out at that time I was collared by Boston police because I could not give a satisfactory explanation of my presence there. While being led away, I was fortunately spotted by General Watson and Captain Callaghan, the naval aide, and rescued. They turned me over to Colonel Starling, of the Secret Service, and I rode to the arena in the open Secret Service car which, bristling with submachine guns, followed the President's car through the Boston streets. Passing through Back Bay, the crowds seemed none too friendly and there were occasional catcalls and boos for Roosevelt. But, after the turn from Boylston into Tremont Street, and thence through Scollay Square, the crowds increased tremendously in numbers and enthusiasm.

After this Boston speech—which, I think, ranks below even the one at Madison Square Garden—the President seemed to return to form. On October 31, he was able to give some attention to the war, having only one nonpolitical speech to make, at the dedication of the National Health Center in Bethesda, Md. The following morning the Presidential train left for Brooklyn. We all felt cheerful on that trip—it was an undefined feeling that the worst was over—and the speech that night was a vast improvement over its unworthy predecessors in this strange campaign. Roosevelt had abandoned the defensive, he had stopped listening to the party prophets of calamity, he was going into the attack with the confident buoyancy and vitality that were his.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I also ask to have printed at this point in the RECORD Sherwood's reference to that incident as it came up again in 1944.

There being no objection, the reference was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

At Soldier Field in Chicago, the President's open car, with the tray of microphones laid across it, was placed in the middle of the football field, with something over a hundred thousand people in the enormous stadium surrounding it. The distances were so great that he would be in the middle of a sentence before the reverberations of the cheers or laughs provoked by the preceding sentence had come back to him. Standing by his car, I had the impression that some remote sections of the gigantic crowd present could not have a very precise idea of just what it was that he was saying; however, that did not bother him as long as his words were getting through clearly over the radio. On the train going back to Washington that night, Roosevelt was strongly urged by advisers, principally Frank Walker, to schedule another speech, preferably in Cleveland, Ohio, during the forthcoming, final week of the campaign. Roosevelt refused to do so. He was in high good humor and it was plainly evident that he had no worries whatsoever as to the outcome of the election. But he was later inclined to regret this decision, for he figured that had he gone to Cleveland he might well have carried Ohio and thereby brought about the defeat of Senator Robert A. Taft who, as it turned out, was reelected by a very narrow margin.

During the next week Rosenman and I had some talks with various Democratic political leaders, who seemed to be greatly alarmed that Dewey was making dangerous progress in his campaign to hang the Communist label on the Roosevelt administration. It was said that the hatred and fear of communism were much greater than any of the emotions inspired by nazism or fascism. There were charges that Roosevelt had secretly begun to sell out to Uncle Joe Stalin at Teheran and that after the war he would complete the process of delivering the American free enterprise system over to Communist control. We asked if anybody were taking any part of this seriously—aside from the Polish-Americans who were naturally concerned for the future independence of their homeland—and we were told that the Red scare was having an ominously positive effect in the Middle West, especially in the rural districts. Then we asked what were the farmers' principal causes for complaint at present. The reply was, "Today the farmer for the first time in his life goes down to Main Street on Saturday night with his pockets full of money and he cannot find anything to spend it on." We did not know how to cope with that problem, but when we reported these conversations to the President he did not seem greatly disturbed. He said in his Boston speech: "When any political candidate stands up and says, solemnly, that there is danger that the Government of the United States—your Government—could be sold out to the Communists—then I say that candidate reveals shocking lack of trust in America. He reveals a shocking lack of faith in Democracy—in the spiritual strength of our people."

Roosevelt himself was at his most unsolemn in this speech. He poured his own brand of ridicule on his opponent. He said, "Everybody knows that I was reluctant to run for the Presidency again this year. But since the campaign has developed I tell you frankly that I have become most anxious to win." Merriman Smith, the United Press White House correspondent, has written that Roosevelt's attitude toward Dewey was one of unvarnished contempt—and I can only add that Smith is a notoriously accurate reporter.

Hopkins later wrote: "The President told me he meant it when he said that this was the meanest campaign of his life. He said he thought they hit him below the belt several times and that it was done quite deliberately and very viciously. He was particularly resentful about the whispering campaign which he believes was a highly organized affair."

Traveling to Boston on this occasion evoked some painful memories for me of the trip 4 years previously when Roosevelt was being urged and even tearfully begged to give assurance to the mothers of America that their boys would never be sent into any foreign war. I asked the President if he would, please, as a special favor, make reference to that earlier Boston campaign speech, and he did so, in these words: "We got into this war because we were attacked by the Japanese—and because they and their Axis partners, Hitler's Germany and Mussolini's Italy, declared war on us. I am sure that any real American would have chosen, as this Government did, to fight when our own soil was made the object of a sneak attack. As for myself, under the same circumstances, I would choose to do the same thing—again and again and again."

The crowd instantly recognized this allusion, for that phrase had been dinned in their ears for 4 years, and they roared their approval.

During the final week before election, five of us in the White House put $5 each in a pool on the President's electoral vote. The guesses were as follows: Watson, 400; Rosenman, 431; Hopkins, 440; Early, 449; Sherwood, 484. (I had clear possession of the high field.) The correct figure was 432, so Rosenman, who was holding the stakes, kept them.

Hopkins cabled bulletins to Churchill and Beaverbrook before and during election day. Although describing himself as "the world's worst political forecaster," he did not hesitate to predict that "this will not be merely an election; it will be a census" for Roosevelt. He informed Beaverbrook that if this prediction proved wrong "I will underwrite the British national debt and subscribe to the Chicago Tribune."

On the afternoon of November 7, he cabled Churchill, saying, "I have no reason for changing my opinion that it will be a Roosevelt landslide. The voting is very heavy in industrial centers. We are not likely to know definitely before 10 our time, which will make it pretty late even for you." Apparently Churchill remained up most of the night to get the news. Hopkins' final bulletin consisted solely of the words "It's in the bag."

There were no evidences of tension at Hyde Park on election night that I could discern, for the first reports of the turnout of voters in New York City had given clear enough indication of the outcome. All that the President appeared to worry about was the size of his majority, which, naturally, he hoped would be overwhelming. It was not quite that; it was not a landslide when judged by previous Roosevelt standards. But it was big enough and it produced a considerable increase in Democratic strength in Congress—which, however, proved of little value to Roosevelt in the few months that remained to him, for the conservative coalition still held the balance of power on Capitol Hill.

During this election campaign, on October 8, there had come the sudden shocking news of the death of Wendell Willkie. He had served a great purpose in times of direst peril, but that purpose was lamentably far from being completed. It was my belief in 1943 and early in 1944 that if Willkie were to win the Republican nomination Roosevelt would not run for a fourth term. I had no tangible basis for this belief, and it was a doubly hypothetical surmise because it was evident for a long time to Roosevelt that Willkie had no chance whatever of being nominated. Greatly as the Old Guard lords of the Republican machine hated Roosevelt, they had come to hate Willkie even more, and, be it said to his eternal credit, Willkie went out of his way to court their hatred by scorning their support.

After returning to Washington, the President, Mrs. Roosevelt and Hopkins had a talk about the future, of which Hopkins wrote:

"Mrs. Roosevelt urged the President very strongly to keep in the forefront of his mind the domestic situation because she felt there was a real danger of his losing American public opinion in his foreign policy if he failed to follow through on the domestic implications of his campaign promises. She particularly hoped the President would not go to Great Britain and France and receive great demonstrations abroad for the present, believing that that would not set too well with the American people.

"She impressed on both of us that we must not be satisfied with merely making campaign pledges; the President being under moral obligation to see his domestic reforms through, particularly the organizing of our economic life in such a way as to give everybody a job. She emphasized that this was an overwhelming task and she hoped neither the President nor I thought it was settled in any way by making speeches."

It has often been said that Mrs. Roosevelt acted as the President's "eyes and ears," and so she did—but there were many others, particularly Hopkins, who helped in performing that function. There was no question of doubt, however, concerning the uniqueness of Mrs. Roosevelt's position as the keeper of and constant spokesman for her husband's conscience, and she continued to perform these duties after his death.

Mr. MORSE. Sherwood presents an unvarnished account of that episode. But it can in no reasonable way be interpreted to read that President Roosevelt "lied us into a war."

Or does Mrs. Luce believe that what happened at Pearl Harbor was a foreign war, one that we should have ignored? Does she think that the bombs which rained down upon American ships in a peaceful harbor, and upon the men and women and children of an American Territory were a foreign involvement to which we should have closed our eyes? That is the only interpretation I can put upon Mrs. Luce's words that Roosevelt "lied us into a war." There is simply no evidence that Roosevelt lied to anyone, or that the attack on Pearl Harbor was a part of a foreign war the United States should have ignored.

The same goes for Mrs. Luce's other references: Basil Rauch's "Roosevelt: From Munich to Pearl Harbor," and "The Roosevelt Leadership, 1933–45," by Edgar Robinson.

Last week, following the hearings, I received a telegram from Basil Rauch, who is a professor of history at Barnard College. The original is here, if any Senator wishes to inspect it. The telegram reads as follows:

APRIL 23, 1959.

Senator WAYNE MORSE,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.:

The statement by Mrs. Luce misrepresented my book "Roosevelt from Munich to Pearl Harbor." My book proves on the basis of the documents that those who make charges against President Roosevelt such as Mrs. Luce have abused the facts of history.

BASIL RAUCH,
Professor of History, Barnard College, Columbia University, New York, N.Y.

That is how flimsy her documentation is. She made a subversive statement. She has been grasping at straws, trying to find some authentic support, responsible support, for the inexcusable, subversive untruths which she bespoke at the time she was a Member of Congress; at the time she sat in the other body; at the time she had a solemn obligation, in the midst of the war, when American boys were dying by the thousands. Even under those circumstances she made the false statement that Franklin Roosevelt "lied us into a war."

I say: God have mercy on her soul, so sinister and evil was that unpatriotic, subversive conduct on the part of this nominee.

I shall await with great interest the votes of Democrats as well as Republicans on this nomination, because a time comes when we, too, have the duty to render moral judgments in the Senate, and to hold aloft for the inspiration of the generations to follow us the idealism for which I plead today. We should give real meaning to the advice and consent clause of the Constitution of the United States and make clear to this President that if he has the audacity and the bad judgment to send such a nomination to the Senate without, apparently, reflecting upon the nominee's record, if he ever knew it, we will not confirm her nomination.

Then I thought of her catch-all attempt to escape from my question at the hearings, when I asked her to come forward with documentation of her subversive falsehood about Franklin Roosevelt. It was very typical of one who seeks to "weasel out" from an indefensible position, when she was unable to present one specific documentation to support her claim that President Roosevelt "lied us into World War II."

Mr. President, what did she say in an attempt to get out of her indefensible position—due to the fact that apparently she does not care to say to the committee, "Not only did I use intemperate language, but I made a mistake of judgment." No, Mr. President; she would stand by her mistake of judgment. She said: "further evidence to support the core of my statement" could be found in these volumes.

Mr. President, she might just as well have said, "Senators, go over to the Congressional Library and see if you can find something to support what I said. I haven't found it; I haven't presented it to you; I haven't documented it. But there are some volumes, over there, critical of Franklin Roosevelt. So go over there and see if you find in them something that might support what I said."

Mr. President, with that statement, she read herself out of court, so far as I am concerned. She did not meet the test. She did not document her charge. But she said to us, in effect, "Go over to the Library and see what you can find in those volumes." Nowhere in her presentation did she say what it was.

But, Mr. President, in order that the Senate and the public may judge for themselves, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD, in connection with my remarks, excerpts from both volumes which deal with the period to which she referred.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The President placed national interest above campaign politics in his statement that he would keep at his task and would not campaign. For the Nation, under the President's leadership, despite the peaceful declarations of the Democrats, was mobilizing for possible war. This situation fitted the President's temper of mind. He was appealing to the people in a national cause. Previous alinements upon domestic issues seemed of less and less significance. It was now all-important to go forward in efforts to preserve the Nation—in the world of nations; to do so by preparing for defense while avoiding war. But at all costs, the Nation was to be strong in face of possible enemies abroad.

Just before the meeting of the Republican National Convention, the President had called into his Cabinet two outstanding Republicans, Harry L. Stimson and Frank Knox. Stimson had been Secretary of State in the Cabinet of Herbert Hoover. Knox had been Vice Presidential candidate of the Republicans in 1936.

The President toured the industrial plants engaged in production of war materials, and he spoke to audiences of the national needs in face of danger.

The President was pleading for peace and freedom through national unity. His aides in planning and writing his speeches—Sherwood, Hopkins, Rosenman, and others—presented the central theme effectively. The President's speeches were masterpieces for a public man playing—as none before so daringly—a leading role on the world stage. At Boston on October 30, he said:

"I have said this before, but I shall say it again and again and again.

"Your boys are not going to be sent into any foreign wars.

"They are going into training to form a force so strong that, by its very existence, it will keep the threat of war far away from our shores.

"The purpose of our defense is defense."[10]

Yet three matters continued to seem of transcendent importance to routine partisans: the President's candidacy violated the "no-third-term" tradition; experienced leaders within his own party still opposed his candidacy; continued violent disagreement and uncertainty within the administration lamed efficient American Government action in a world at war.

According to a number of the most experienced commentators, the election of 1940 was the bitterest in half a century. This was not surprising. Three objectives were stated and restated by the Democrats: defensive measures against aggression, measures to insure greater economic well-being, and measures for the social welfare of the people.

The Republican candidate, Wendell Willkie, presented a program different in detail rather than in principle. This was historically sound, for the Republican Party, notwithstanding its recent record in the Congress and the pronouncements of many of its leaders, could rightly claim all three of the Democratic objectives in its own past history.

Too little attention has been given the changing moods of thousands of private citizens as the war engulfed one after the other of the countries of western Europe. A commentator said of June 21, 1940, "This is the longest day and the darkest day" in the history of our own people. Why could this be said? The aggressive advance of Hitler, the catastrophic fall of France, the mounting siege of Britain—brought many in America to fear that the United States was now in grave danger. An important change in the attitude of businessmen was noted after May of 1940. Hating war and loath to be dragged into it, nevertheless many of them chose to support the President in the election of 1940.[11]

General use of the radio by 1940 was thought to change the entire problem of campaigning. A huge electorate spread over a continental area could be reached as never before. By voice on the air, presidential candidates of the major parties could reach millions who might never see them. Yet it was obvious that personal presence was still important, particularly in the case of an individual appearing for the first time as a candidate for the Presidency. Wendell Willkie and his managers took this view.

After his nomination and prior to the formal opening of his campaign in mid-August, Willkie made numerous appearances in the Mountain West and Middle West. In September he began a tour that continued until the eve of the election, including 18,500 miles by train, 8,800 by plane, and 2,000 by automobile. With the exception of northern New England and the South, he appeared in every section of the country, speaking in 32 States. In New York, California, Wisconsin, Indiana, and Illinois, he appeared many times. He made more than 500 addresses.

Much of the time Willkie seemed to stand by himself, except for self-appointed aides. His was therefore a weak position. Facing the test of meeting innumerable audiences, he needed the support of organization that dealt in masses, that is, experienced party workers who knew how to reach the voters. He impressed all by his frankness, but the audience was too vast to be won by personal approach.

Although, as has been said, in September and the first half of October the President's addresses were incidental to trips of official character, he nevertheless appeared to the crowds who heard him as the candidate of the Democratic party.

On October 23 Mr. Roosevelt began an intensive campaign confined to nearby points in Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Ohio—all States with heavy industrial population. He made nine major addresses. His voice was harsh and strident in his fighting mood on foreign policy. He said he was placing the truthful record before the people. No one but the President could do this. He was the record.

Hard-hitting and defiant, his appeals, composed by a battery of experts in public relations, were addressed by a master political salesman to small businessmen, to small investors, to farmers and laboring men, and to racial and religious minorities. Always the consummate actor in a great drama—and none was so packed with unbearable emotion as this one in 1940—Franklin Roosevelt was superbly successful in reaching those members of his huge audience who felt that here indeed was the most moving performance of all time.

Yet Sherwood wrote of this: "Of all the political battles in which he had been involved, his campaign of 1940 is, I believe, the one that Roosevelt liked least to remember."

Traditionalists, with a small sense of the world that had developed so rapidly since 1937, quite honestly continued to say that the election of Roosevelt was improbable because the sober sense of the American people would lead them to reject the third term. They would vote to clean up the mess in Washington, and, most of all, they would defend America—but without war.

The decision of the voters in November returned Mr. Roosevelt to office. The outcome as recorded in the county vote in States where he had campaigned intensively, particularly in the city areas, revealed the probable effect of the two campaigns as planned by the contestants. The sharpness of the issue was reflected in the small vote for minor party candidates, which reached the lowest point—except for 1928—since the opening of the century.

Yet to what extent the outcome of the election was a judgment upon the President's policies, it is impossible to say. His program of accomplishment had been challenged in detail, in method, and in cost; yet not—as Mr. Willkie saw it—in basic objective either in domestic policy or in foreign relations. To the majority of traditional Republicans, it seemed that Willkie lost because he did not appear to differ sufficiently from the President.

It may be said with considerable truth that as the "conservatives" had no candidate in this election, so too, the "radicals" had no candidate. On the whole, both candidates were near the middle-of-the-road on domestic matters: Roosevelt left of center and Willkie right of center. On foreign policy, as has been seen, there was by late autumn no clash between them.

In the election, Mr. Roosevelt polled more votes than in 1932 (even with the American Labor vote in New York, he had fewer than in 1936). He had 53.9 percent of the votes cast, by comparison with percentages of 60.2 in 1936 and 57.4 in 1932. It was, however, a national endorsement, for the President carried every section of the Nation except one, and captured the electoral votes in 38 States. He won heavy supporting majorities in both Houses of Congress.

A close student of his campaigns concluded: "The setbacks of his second administration, the third-term issue, and the war scare had reduced his vote, but he kept together most of the divergent elements that had supported him in previous campaigns." [12]

Another commentator observed: "Emergencies by their very nature present abnormal political conditions. By way of illustration, most observers believe that the emergency of 1940 was a more deciding factor in the reelection of Franklin D. Roosevelt for a third term than was any popular departure from the anti-third-term conviction.[13]

History records the fact that 44.7 percent of the voters supported the Republican nominee. They comprised a motley array of interests, but their opposition to Franklin Roosevelt was the principal bond of union. They include pacifists and isolationists.

As in the two previous campaigns, a majority of the newspapers of large circulation were opposed to Mr. Roosevelt's candidacy. Unquestionably the largest proportion of the educated classes opposed his continuance in office. The upper-income groups were opposed. In the judgment of those opposing the President, his record in office was not such as to warrant their approval.

Many factors entered into this disapproval. Foremost among them were Mr. Roosevelt's socialistic objectives, his slap-dash methods of administration, increasing manifestations of personal rule, and seeming disregard of the costs of Government expansion. One judgment stands above all others. His opponents did not trust him.[14] But that the masses did trust him was overwhelmingly demonstrated.

Such a division of response requires more than passing mention. The arguments urged by responsible opponents of the President were based upon factual surveys of huge indebtedness, widespread unemployment, and appalling inefficiency in administration. However much these revelations aided in preparing a case, they were of little avail in reaching the majority of the electorate, who considered them of secondary importance.

Perhaps the outstanding result of Franklin Roosevelt's influence on American life had been in giving first place to what was termed the "human aspects" of politics. The President and his supporters had insisted that the call for American self-government simply meant "Let the people decide." This was accompanied by continuous attack upon those who would make Government an efficient instrument in paying its way, in limiting its objectives, and in requiring definite results.

Commentators on the outcome of the election could not foretell the results of the people's decision, however much time and thought they gave to envisaging the future. Not only was the atmosphere of the campaign of 1940 unlike that of 1932 and of 1936, but the general attitude toward the President—both for and against—was of a different order. He has been President for 8 years, and most of the charges against him were so familiar as to have little influence except upon those who made them.

The new factor—not present in either previous campaign—was that created by the President's foreign policy. He was, most of all, the representative of the United States in the world. No one in reality could rival him in that capacity. His was a new role for an American President.

This much, however, was certain. Emphasis upon the New Deal was gone, despite the attempts of Mr. Roosevelt—at this time and later—to merge it in the larger issue at stake in the world. The leader chosen for the Presidential term 1941–45 would be the leader in the role that the United States would play in the international affairs of that period. It was in his hands to determine the direction of events, insofar as they could be determined by action of the United States, because he had the endorsement of the American people and a fixed term of office. Mr. Roosevelt had already indicated that world affairs were America's business, and he intended to have a leading part in their settlement.

This conviction was expressed repeatedly in the weeks following the election. In his press conference of December 17, the President said:

"In the present world situation, of course, there is absolutely no doubt in the mind of a very overwhelming number of Americans that the best immediate defense of the United States is the success of Great Britain in defending itself; and that, therefore, quite aside from our historic and current interest in the survival of democracy in the world as a whole, it is equally important from a selfish point of view of American defense, that we should do everything to help the British Empire to defend itself." [15]

In the meantime, the peril to England was increasing. In his Fireside Chat of December 29, 1940, the President said:

"Never before since Jamestown and Plymouth Rock has our American civilization been in such danger as now. * * *

"I want to make it clear that it is the purpose of the Nation to build now with all possible speed every machine, every arsenal, every factory that we need to manufacture our defense material. We have the men—the skill—the wealth—and above all, the will. * * *

"We must be the great arsenal of democracy. For us this is an emergency as serious as war itself. We must apply ourselves to our task with the same resolution, the same sense of urgency, the same spirit of patriotism and sacrifice as we would show were we at war." [16]

Securing nomination and election for a third term in 1940 was one of the most significant achievements of Franklin Roosevelt's career. He was Commander in Chief of a Nation not yet in a war, but in fact at home and abroad using great power to force its will upon the world in defeat of the dictators. Thus the American people came to the end of the most fateful, most tragic, and most terrible year thus far in the history of modern man.

As the President said in his Christmas message, mature people could not be merry. But millions did echo his thought that they could be happy in that they were done with doubts; they were now without fear. But to thoughtful men and women who read of London in flames, the future seemed dark indeed.

* * * * *

At the same time that the President won liberal support for his policy of aid to Russia, it became evident that numbers of Americans were willing to underwrite British and French imperialism, but not Russian communism. However, in the autumn of 1941 the forces opposing fascism in general were suddenly united.

It was not, as some said, adroit politics on the part of the President that made American defense his first call. Any President would have stood first of all for American defense. All of the vitality of an aroused patriotism was available for defense of America. As the danger increased, nevertheless, it was the prestige of Presidential office that attracted supporters to the President's program, for it was an unaccustomed program for Americans.

So, too, the arguments of the isolationists and of the America First group appealed less and less as the people saw that dictators lived in a world of continuous and spreading war. Abhorring war, fearing and detesting dictators, the majority of Americans wanted the free nations to win because they were—despite all that could be said of differences—going in the same direction.

But to some, known as isolationists and critics of the President, the realinement in Europe seemed to renew the opportunity of the United States to remain aloof from the war. Americans did not want to save communism, and then save Europe for communism—these persons asserted.

Yet, however much this point of view appealed to conservatives, it did not appeal to liberals who believed that out of this war might come the crushing not only of the Fascist dictators but also that of imperialism. This would lead to the ultimate triumph of the two great "democracies," the United States and the U.S.S.R. On his trip to Russia in 1942, and after his talk with Stalin, Wendell Willkie was reported as saying that the future belonged to America and the Soviet Union. He outlined a plan for not "stirring up Russia" by opposing her.[24]

Of the President's Navy and Total Defense Day address on October 27, 1941, stating that "we Americans have cleared our decks and taken our battle stations," Admiral Leahy wrote later: "To me, this was as nearly an open declaration of undeclared war as it would be possible to formulate. The various legislative and executive actions that had followed in rapid succession during the preceding 6 months caused me to wonder if the President really thought he was fooling anyone about our not being at war." [25]

The President was eventually to win over his adversaries at home because he was attacked by his adversaries abroad. But American entrance into the war actively on the side of the Allies—through attack by the Axis on the United States—had not yet come about as the autumn of 1941 deepened.

Throughout the period just discussed, the eyes of the American people had been upon events in Europe. The signing by Japan of a treaty of alliance with Germany and Italy on September 27, 1940, had, however, made them aware that it was not only in Europe but in the Far East that American interests were endangered.

It was recalled now that early in the second year of Mr. Roosevelt's first term in office, the Japanese had warned that American interest in the free development of China was unwelcome. Three years later, when the conflict between Japan and China burst forth in midsummer of 1937, much evidence of American public opinion in favor of China was revealed. The administration had maintained a neutral position.

However, in December 1937 had come an unprovoked attack by the Japanese upon Americans operating the gunboat Panay on the Yangtze River. Although the American Government had asked apology and received it with damages, there remained a residue of deep suspicion of Japanese intentions.

This was justified, for in the next year other incidents occurred involving maltreatment, by the Japanese, of Americans in China. The American Government charged the Japanese with violation of the "Open Door." The Japanese Government stated bluntly on November 3, 1938, that it was interested in the development of reconstruction in East Asia along Japanese lines. This new order for Asia, linking China and Manchuria to the Japanese system,[26] was formally rejected by the American State Department. Japan now knew full well that the United States stood across its path in the Far East.

Had the American people known—as their leaders did—of the real character of the militaristic Japanese Cabinet that came to power in September of 1941, they would have realized that Japan was as actively their enemy in the Pacific as Germany with its striking submarines was in the Atlantic. The real conflict had now become global and the basic issue was the same everywhere.

For the time being, it was to the interest of the Axis to keep the United States out of active participation in the war. When either Germany or Japan felt that the interests of the United States should be challenged, Americans might well expect a direct attack.

Meanwhile, uncertainty prevailed as to the role of Russia in the Far East. It was well known that Russia feared Japan. President Roosevelt, in a message to Premier Konoye on July 6, attempted to induce Japan to refrain from attacking Russia from the east, now that Hitler had attacked from the west.[27]

Japan's opportunity in the Far East was not like that of Germany in Europe. Nor was it like that of Britain in the world. An American policy to save Russia could not be matched by one to save China. China's status as a world power was such as to make for an unusual partnership in diplomacy and in war as measured against partnerships with European powers. China was in this global war, but not of it.

Furthermore, the President discounted the Japanese fear of communism in China. He told Ambassador Nomura that "the people of China were constituted very differently from those of Russia and had a philosophy that stabilized and guided them along much broader lines. China," he said, "was not really communistic in the same sense as Russia, and Japan had an undue fear of communism in China." [28]

Although the President referred to his "patience" in dealing with Japan, it would seem that by mid-summer of 1941 he had despaired of a peaceful settlement in the Pacific. He had, however, opposed a statement of British-American accord for the Far East when it was proposed by the British at the Atlantic Conference in August. As the President related to the Congress on December 15, "In July of this year the Japanese Government connived with Hitler to force from the Vichy Government of France permission to place Japanese armed forces in southern Indo-China, and began sending her troops and equipment into the area." [29] The President had thought of this, which he said "caused us very great concern," as "parallel with the Hitler methods in Europe." [30]

Mr. Roosevelt on July 26 had frozen Japanese assets in the United States, at the same time placing an embargo on the shipment of aviation fuel, gasoline, and oil to Japan. Explaining to a press conference at the time that oil had gone hitherto to Japan "with the hope—and it has worked for 2 years—of keeping war out of the South Pacific," [31] the President made it clear that he was stiffening the position of the United States against Japan.

The rapid development of tension in relations with Japan during the autumn brought a virtual ultimatum on November 20, when the Japanese Government "presented a new and narrow proposal, which called for supplying by the United States to Japan of as much oil as Japan might require; for suspension of 'freezing' measures; and for discontinuance by the United States of aid to China." [32] Thus, it was American support of China—based on a long tradition in American diplomacy—that finally forced a breakdown of negotiations with the Japanese:[33]

The administration favored increasing aid to the Allies. Yet there was certainty that the people of the United States would not voluntarily enter the war. The administration had adopted a policy in the Far East that stood across the path of Japanese advance. If the administration maintained that policy, Japan might choose to attack the United States. If the Japanese did so—in such a way as to arouse the American people—the purpose of the President would be served.

The question remains: Did President Roosevelt expect an attack on Pearl Harbor? Did Washington anticipate such an attack? The evidence now available suggests that, although both Washington and Hawaii should have anticipated the possibility of a surprise attack, there was no definite expectation of the precise attack that came suddenly on December 7, 1941.

The arguments of those who hold the President responsible for the disaster are that: The administration did have evidence of the imminence of such an attack; they purposely refrained from transmitting this to the military and naval commanders on Hawaii in order to insure a Japanese attack; and that if Hawaii had been informed it is possible the Japanese would have refrained from attack there. The matter has had much discussion.[34]

"On the night before Pearl Harbor when Harry Hopkins suggested that the United States might strike first, Roosevelt * * * almost repeated Wilson's words when he said: 'No, we can't do that. We are a democracy of peaceful people. We have a good record. We must stand on it.'" [35]

The America First Committee on December 6 succinctly stated that "The administration, and the administration alone, will be completely responsible for any breakdown in relations with Japan. The administration has taken it upon itself to demand actions from Japan that in no way concern the national interests of the United States. None of our territorial possessions are in any way involved." [36]

Nevertheless, it is clear that the President's policy by no means seemed to the American people to justify the attack on Pearl Harbor which came on December 7, less than 24 hours after Mr. Roosevelt had dispatched a personal appeal to Emperor Hirohito to avoid war in the Pacific. The United States Senate Committee investigating in 1945 the Pearl Harbor attack concluded that "The President, the Secretary of State, and high Government officials made every possible effort, without sacrificing our national honor and endangering our security to avert war with Japan." [37]

At the same time that the Nation as a whole rallied to defense, there continued under cover of this new apparent unanimity,[38] deep divisions on the war aims and the peace to follow.

Whereas the basic policies of Mr. Roosevelt had not justified the direct Japanese attack, the United States had stood across the path of Japan in the Far East, just as the United States had stood between the Axis and victory in Europe. Thus, the President had led the Nation into a position which would inevitably be challenged. The opponents of such action by the United States had at the center of their protest a simple program of nonparticipation in international affairs. They were logical in representing accurately a basic historic and enduring nationalism of deep influence upon the American people. It must be remembered that the President had not taken this position of opposition to the Japanese advance in the Pacific as rapidly and completely as many of his advisers, notably Secretary Stimson, would have done.

A profound and far-reaching result of American entrance into the war—however involuntary—was the alliance with the forces of communism. A war measure, in order to defeat the Axis, it was called in Britain and in America. A "win the war" atmosphere was conducive to startling results. It obliterated for the time being, for millions of people, their active antagonism to communism, as it strengthened the forces in the United States favorable to communism. This seemed to prove to those who fought the President and all his policies that they had been right in distrusting him and his purposes. So even during the war, the basic struggle of opinion in the United States was deepened.

The President's foreign policy had carried the American people into a world from which they now could not retreat. Yet he looked upon the important decisions of the year, viewing them in perspective, as constituting a program for the defense of the United States. He said each move had been forced upon him by events outside the Nation and beyond his control.

Now that he was directing a nation at war, he hoped the United States might give direction to a world willing ultimately to live at peace. So the stage was set in Washington for the drama that was to enter a new phase with the end of the year. The financial-industrial might of America would supply American armies and the people would supply the personnel of those armies. But the great instrument of the people's power in Washington—the administration—came to be manned by experts and advisers who were prepared, as they said many times, to build a new world. And for this they were to pay dearly.

CHAPTER XV—DESIGN FOR VICTORY

The President was fully aware of the changed situation now that the United States was in the war of nations but not yet prepared for global war. "His terrible moral problem," as Frances Perkins said, "had been solved by the event" of Pearl Harbor.[1] Mr. Roosevelt laid the groundwork for every subsequent explanation of his conduct in his address to the American people, by radio, on December 9, 1941. "The sudden criminal attacks perpetrated by the Japanese in the Pacific provide the climax of a decade of international immorality," he said. "Powerful and resourceful gangsters have banded together to make war upon the whole human race. Their challenge has now been flung at the United States of America."[2]

By the Japanese attack upon its possessions in the Pacific and the declaration of hostilities by its enemies in western Europe, the United States was plunged into war. No longer was President Roosevelt preparing for defense, and giving aid to participants in the war already raging. He was now in truth Commander in Chief of a Nation at war.

Throughout the foregoing discussion of Mr. Roosevelt's foreign policy from 1937 to 1941, emphasis has been placed upon his public utterances. When it has been possible to discover exactly what he said in private conversations, this has been included. But on the whole, there is doubt—and presumably always will be—as to the President's innermost thoughts. Thus one may only surmise what must have taken place in many a conversation of which there is no record. The President, with all his interest in history, did not keep such records and at times advised others against so doing. The policy was intensified as the Nation engaged in war.

American participation in World War II imposed upon the President a role of personal leadership for which his utterances had long prepared both his constituents and the leaders of nations with whom he had to deal. This leadership was expressed primarily in conferences, as will be seen. In these conferences and in preparation for them, the President depended upon his experts.

Prior to American participation in the war, the President had repeatedly called attention to violation of agreements, violation of boundaries, and wholesale disregard of long-accepted international practice. He had previously been able only to protest. Now he could do more. He could throw the influence of the United States in the balance on behalf of better order. He could furthermore use power to meet power. He must fight fire with fire. Being the man he was, he could do this with great moral indignation.

The President who, without asking the Congress for a declaration of war, had prepared the way to war by his vigorous attacks upon the dictators, who had provided aid to the Allies through the lend-lease arrangement; who had, further, encouraged practices that brought about attacks upon American ships and citizens—had also done more. In August of 1941, he had held an all-important conference with Prime Minister Churchill. He had authorized policies in the Far East in support of China. In all these ways he had expressed the view of convinced internationalists and had been applauded by them. He had finally appealed, as well, to extreme nationalists. But he had been opposed by all isolationists.

Deeper than this political alinement, which was in fact a very unstable one, was a fundamental disagreement as to the President's purpose. How far could a President carry the Nation into war by preparing for war, by the use of diplomatic pressures, by the supply of arms to favored belligerents, and by the practice of threatening language? President Roosevelt must bear all of the responsibility for the decisions that provided these measures. To defenders of the President, they were measures to avoid war. To opponents of the President, they were measures that led inevitably to war.

In the view of the masses of the President's fellow citizens, war had finally come by action of enemies that he had long warned were planning the destruction of the United States. Americans were now not disposed to question any longer the steps by which they were forced into a position of defending themselves. Overwhelming was the evidence in popular polls that the people thought the President had done everything possible to avoid the war.

The record seemed to be a confused one, however, and time was to show, by the gradual unfolding of factual evidence, that many mistakes had been made by the administration. Yet, in the months that followed Pearl Harbor, it was difficult to show that war could have been avoided except by the surrender of positions that few Americans were willing to surrender.

Had the United States been permitted to continue to wage the war by proxy Americans might have been left relatively unharmed and free to prepare for the inevitable conflict, if not in war, certainly in diplomacy, that would find them in basic opposition to the victorious Axis powers, or the victorious power of communism.

But the conflict had come to the United States. Americans had allies as well as enemies. The American people must win the war. On January 1, 1942, the United States, with China, Britain, and the Soviet Union, as well as 22 other nations, signed the Declaration of the United Nations.

* * * * *

So matters stood during the American presidential election. Toward Japan, as in other spheres, the administration had strengthened its policy in the midst of the campaign. Isolationists hit upon the possibility of American naval cooperation with Britain at Singapore as their chief target in the administration's Far Eastern policy, but this possibility had been fended off by the administration.

DOWN TO THE HUSTINGS

During the presidential campaign, the administration's actions in the foreign sphere spoke louder than Roosevelt's campaign speeches, with one glaring exception. In spite of this exception, which will presently be discussed, no one doubted that Roosevelt stood for maximum measures against the Axis short of war, and that the Republican Party, if not Willkie himself, favored a less advanced position. The degeneration of the campaign into a competition for the anti-war vote did not lead Republican isolationists to vote for Roosevelt. But Willkie's vigorous championship of aid to Britain, repudiation of appeasement, and charge that Roosevelt took dangerous chances and uselessly antagonized the Axis did seem to bring some internationalist-minded voters to his side without loss of the isolationist vote.

Fear of this was one thing that led Roosevelt to suspend his elevated role of Commander in Chief touring defense projects and, during the last 2 weeks before election day, go down to the hustings. Another was that he feared Willkie more than any of his earlier rivals for office and found it difficult to cope with Willkie's fervent and confused attacks. Willkie, for example, accused him of planning to send troops abroad immediately and also of having neglected the country's defenses so shamelessly that it had no means to fight if attacked. Willkie's earnestness and colorful personality captured the public imagination. He later told a Senate committee that his most hysterical charge against Roosevelt, that he was plotting to send American boys to the shambles of the European trenches by April 1941, was a bit of campaign oratory. Roosevelt could not similarly laugh off his statements once the campaign was past, and he did not attempt to match Willkie's tactics of terrorizing voters; but Willkie did lead him to oversimplify his foreign policy in order to throw off the charge of warmongering and to retain the support of the isolationist minority of the Democratic Party.

Still his first oversimplification was not so "equivocal" as Robert Sherwood in his book "Roosevelt and Hopkins" declares. Sherwood writes that in the Madison Square Garden speech on October 28 "Roosevelt went to the length or depth of taking credit for the neutrality law and other measures which he had thoroughly disapproved and fought to repel and had contrived by all possible means to circumvent."

Actually Roosevelt only took credit for certain clauses of the Neutrality Act, but not for the arms embargo. The "other measures" Sherwood refers to were evidently the specified clauses of the Neutrality Act itself. Roosevelt said:

"We made it possible [by the Neutrality Act] to prohibit American citizens from traveling on vessels belonging to countries at war. * * *

"We made it clear that American investors, who put their money into enterprises in foreign nations, could not call on American warships or American soldiers to bail out their investments. * * *

"We made it clear that ships flying the American flag could not carry munitions to a belligerent; and that they must stay out of war zones. * * *

"In all these ways we made it clear to every American, and to every foreign nation that we would avoid becoming entangled through some episode beyond our borders."

[1] The Roosevelt I Knew, p. 380.

[2] Public Papers, 1941, p. 522. The President, in his address to the Congress "Asking That a State of War Be Declared Between the United States and Japan," had referred to Japanese attacks against Malaya, Hong Kong, Guam, Wake Island, and Midway Island, as well as the attacks on Hawaii and the Philippines. (Ibid., pp. 514–515.)

It was a fact, as has been shown in this book, that Roosevelt and Hull had consistently proposed and supported these measures. What they had opposed was that other clause of the Neutrality Act which provided for an arms embargo on aggressors and victims alike. Neither in the Garden speech nor at any other time did Roosevelt "take credit" for the arms embargo. On the contrary, he took credit in the Garden speech for repeal of the embargo and belabored the Republicans for opposing repeal in Congress:

"The Republican campaign orators and leaders are all now yelling 'me too' on help to Britain. But this fall they had their chance to vote to give aid to Britain and other democracies—and they turned it down.

"This chance came when I recommended that the Congress repeal the embargo on the shipment of armaments and munitions to nations at war, and permit such shipment on a cash-and-carry basis. It is only because of the repeal of the embargo law that we have been able to sell planes and ships and guns and munitions to victims of aggression.

"But how did the Republicans vote on the repeal of that embargo?

"In the Senate the Republicans voted 14 to 6 against it. In the House the Republicans voted 140 to 19 against it. * * *

"Great Britain and a lot of other nations would never have received one ounce of help from us—if the decision had been left to Martin, Barton, and Fish."

The President did not stress that he had signed the 1935 and 1937 Neutrality Acts even though they included the arms embargo. But he had already publicly expressed regret for ever approving the arms embargo, and perhaps it was forgivable that he did not repeat that confession in a campaign speech.

In the Garden speech he was interested in contrasting examples of Republican "mistakes" with the administration record, a normal partisan procedure. The facts of Republican majority opposition to rearmament and support of the arms embargo contrasted fairly with the administration record, and Republican complaints after the fall of France that the administration had not gone even further in pursuit of the policies Republicans had tried to obstruct made the records of Congressmen Martin, Barton, and Fish fair game for Roosevelt. He simplified, but did not equivocate on his own record. Willkie said later: "When I heard the President hang the isolationist votes of Martin, Barton, and Fish on me, and get away with it, I knew I was licked." The President got away with it for the same reason Republican orators got away with blaming Roosevelt for the acts of other members of his party and administration. If Wilkie felt it was unfair to hang isolationist votes on him, voters were bound to be concerned over the certainty that if the Republicans won the election in 1940, Hamilton Fish, of New York, would, as the President warned in his Garden speech, become chairman of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Roosevelt enjoyed a legitimate debater's triumph when he read to roaring crowds the Republican record of votes in Congress on policies they now claimed to support. The discrepancies he most stressed involved rearmament and aid to Britain. Although Willkie and the party platform proclaimed a Republican change of heart on these issues, isolationist Republican Congressmen did not do so. Roosevelt illustrated in his Boston speech the ability of Republican Congressmen to ignore the party platform:

"For listen to this: Last summer, only a few weeks after the Republican national platform had been adopted endorsing commodity loans for the farmers, the Republican Members of the House marched right back into the Halls of Congress and voted against commodity loans for the farmers, 106 to 37."

To counterbalance such evidence of Republican equivocation, Willkie found the President guilty of violating his campaign promises of 1932 to balance the Federal budget and provide sound money. This was the main Republican indictment of the administration's record. Willkie linked it with his accusation that the President in 1940 plotted war:

"I ask you whether his pledge for peace is going to last any longer than his pledge for sound money.
